The 1980s-era movement started by young fans of punk and hardcore music was unapologetically clear-headed: no alcohol, no smoking, no drugs. Now that lifestyle – known as "straight edge" – is making a comeback.

Inspired by a song of the same name, the movement developed a reputation for intolerance in the 1990s when a few straight-edgers turned militant, starting fights with anyone who challenged their views. Two were convicted in a 1998 killing in Salt Lake City.

These days, a small but growing core of young people who live the straight-edge life, also known by the abbreviation "sXe," are trying to reclaim a more positive image by promoting a range of causes, from pacifism and environmentalism to racial diversity.

"There are so many facets of straight edge – so many different kinds of people who can adopt this lifestyle and define it for themselves," says Monika Seitz, a 24-year-old straight-edger who recently moved from San Diego to Columbus, Ohio. But the common thread is a vow to avoid tobacco, alcohol and drugs.

Seitz – who figures she's had "one beer total and a couple of cigarettes" since high school – recently helped form a club for straight-edgers across the country who are into vintage scooters.

Other young straight-edgers have posted Web sites and online message boards to spread the word about the movement's positive attributes. And at least one school, Wheaton College in Norton, Mass., has sanctioned a school-owned residence with a

'Rivers and Tides' showcases Andy Goldsworthy's magnificent talents

'Rivers and Tides'
Directed by Thomas Riedelsheimer
Playing at Pleasant Street Theater

In the time it takes to read this sentence, Andy Goldsworthy's moment may well have come and gone.

The artist in Goldsworthy manipulates his environment with the understanding it will be undone by time. He builds, labors and obsesses on baron shorelines and in lush fields, a lonely audience to rock piles and puzzles of leaves and twigs. They are brought together as oddities in natural contexts, and no matter how methodically he tunes his natural instruments, the end product of these delicately executed means always remains the idea of creation itself.

Director Thomas Riedelsheiner provides Goldsworthy a quasi-permanency in "Rivers and Tides," a film of extraordinary patience that allows the artist's work a motion his books, though striking documents, only suggest. We're brought alongside Goldsworthy's gentle hands composing desolate pieces of driftwood into a whirlpool-shaped community, and then left to stutter for a reaction when it's stolen away by the tide. We're present as he threads together chains of leaves that unfurl and crawl along the rivers that consume him. He repeats the importance of their symbolic presence as a mantra throughout the film, time and again reminding us of the flow of the veins apparent in all of life, and the relationship between man and nature that his work humbly accentuates.

"When I build something, I often take it to the edge of its collapse, and that's a very beautiful balance," he says in a touching moment, sitting underneath a curtain of twigs he's woven by hand and planted from the limb of a tree. A moment later it collapses, and the audience – as it does at all such moments throughout – audibly gasps. It's unpretentious high-drama, and Goldsworthy greets such temporary defeats with reserved sighs and a slouching posture. Four times we see him fall back onto a pliable shore and study the ruins of a rock sculpture until his understanding of it is enough that he succeeds; the tide washes in and the egg-shaped mound, fully submerged, maintains its poetic reserve.

Goldsworthy studies his landscapes with a quiet appreciation - "I need the land" – and Riedelsheiner does the same with his direction. Often we're left with the still-image of the artist deep in thought, or alone with his works long after he's left them to simply be. Riedelsheiner's camera is elegantly uprooted in these moments, gliding along like much of Goldsworthy's work, shooting intimately and revealing in increments – over time and physical space – the methods by which his art unravels.

The film also takes us home with Goldsworthy to Penpont, Scotland, revealing the artist as a reserved installation in his own family, and throughout the streets of his modest village as he collects material and conversation from neighbors. A later scene in the South of France, during the construction of a museum piece, shows the artist wiping away the final imperfections of a large, clay wall. The material comes straight from the earth and is bound by human hair collected from the floors of his village barbershop. "This way, my village is in my work," he says. He is, of course, absolutely correct; every step his art takes both nudges a preconceived boundary away and turns him around toward home, where he returns to gather his greatest inspirations.

"Rivers and Tides" is an extraordinary slideshow of natural contradictions and human dedication. It appeals to our instincts because Goldsworthy chooses to work where many of us spent our childhoods desiring to be; by rivers and in trees, with rocks under the rain and outside in the snow. He's tempted by the uncertainty of the moment, of all moments, and lures us in on the same mercurial ticket. It's a strong narrative that needs little dialogue and no plot – just the simple beauty of always Being There.

Cargill announces $6.8 million in arts and community grants

MINNETONKA, Minn. (AP) – The Cargill Foundation gave a boost to the Twin Cities cultural scene, announcing $6.8 million in grants to nine arts and civic institutions for construction projects.

The Children's Theatre Company will receive $2.5 million. The grant will be earmarked for a new stage to help the Minneapolis-based theater expand its work with teenagers and preschoolers.

Other grants include $1 million each to the Minneapolis Central Public Library, the Guthrie Theater and Walker Art Center.

Cargill on Monday also announced grants of $500,000 each to the Minneapolis Institute of Arts and the Minnesota Historical Society's Mill City Museum. The company is also giving $100,000 each to the MacPhail Center for Music, Goodwill-Easter Seals and the Salvation Army of Minneapolis.

San Francisco bids farewell to last all-jazz club

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) – The last club to preserve the North Beach neighborhood's tradition of straight-up jazz late into the night jammed for one last time.

Jazz at Pearl's, which served up homegrown jazz seven days a week, closed its doors early Monday morning — but not before one last 12-hour session on the storied stretch of the Bohemian district it shared with strip joints, palm readers and Beat-generation landmarks such as City Lights bookstore.

"Jazz at Pearl's is about the music, and the people who come to hear the music," said jazz guitarist Bruce Forman, who played in the house band for 10 years. "It's committed to jazz, not dinner or whatever else happens in other clubs."

Even on its last night, the club's founder, 72-year-old Pearl Wong, had a firm handle on the 110-seat room. She swung easily around tables in the hot, crowded room while taking orders, greeting customers and chatting up the regulars she knows from a lifetime in the business.

"It was always hard, financially," said Wong. "I learned to do everything. Cook's out, I'm cooking. The cocktail waitress is out, I do that, and bartending, bookkeeping, whatever it takes."

The club lost its lease after 13 years and a heated back-and-forth with the landlord.

"Eventually I just threw up my hands," said Sonny Buxton, who has relied on his 50 years of West Coast jazz experience to book the club's acts.

"There comes a time when you just have to let it go. I didn't expect to have tears flow, but they did."

Local musicians, jazz aficionados and big-name acts mingled for the final jam session Sunday night and Monday morning. They said they would miss having a place of their own to hang out.

NEW YORK (AP) – The city Parks Department plans to sell 1,000 vintage seats from Yankee Stadium for $1,000 apiece.

"They're apparently hot-ticket items," department spokeswoman Megan Sheekey told the New York Post in Monday's editions.

The seats were removed from the stadium while it was undergoing renovations in the mid-1970s and are stored in shipping containers at an agency warehouse.

The Parks Department's plan is intended to help the city narrow its $3.8 billion budget deficit.

Fox dating show has strong premiere

NEW YORK (AP) – "Mr. Personality," the Fox reality dating show with Monica Lewinsky as host, displayed a dominant personality with viewers for its premiere Monday night, according to Nielsen Media Research figures.

In its time period, "Mr. Personality" placed second, with 12.2 million viewers, to CBS' back-to-back "Everybody Loves Raymond" episodes, which averaged 13.8 million viewers. NBC's "Third Watch" and ABC's "The Practice" ranked third and fourth, respectively.

In the 18-to-49-year-old demographic, "Mr. Personality" decisively won, with a 5.7 rating and 14 share, compared to CBS (4.7 rating, 12 share), NBC (4.1 rating, 10 share) and ABC (2.7 rating, 7 share). A ratings point represents 1,067,000 households, or 1 percent of the nation's estimated 106.7 million TV homes. The share is the percentage of in-use televisions tuned to a given show.

"Mr. Personality" features a single woman wooed by 20 masked men, with Lewinsky by her side for support. Lewinsky first gained national attention as a White House intern who had a sexual relationship with President Clinton.

Actress Catherine Zeta-Jones gives birth to girl

LOS ANGELES (AP) — It's a girl for Catherine Zeta-Jones and Michael Douglas.

The Oscar-winning actress gave birth to Carys (pronounced KEHR-iss) Zeta Douglas on Sunday morning in Ridgewood, N.J., near the couple's Manhattan home. The baby weighed 6 pounds, 12 ounces.

"They're all doing fantastic," Cece Yorke, the actress' Los Angeles publicist, said Monday.

The couple also has a 2 1/2-year-old son, Dylan Michael. It's the second child for Zeta-Jones and third for Douglas, who has 24-year-old son, Cameron, from a previous marriage.

Zeta-Jones, 33, won this year's best supporting actress Oscar for "Chicago" and sang a duet with Queen Latifah during last month's ceremony.

Douglas, 58, won the best actor Oscar for 1987's "Wall Street." He and his actor-father, Kirk, co-star with Cameron in the new comedy "It Runs In the Family" opening Friday.

The couple married in November 2000 and costarred in the film "Traffic."

Brother Records Inc. sues former Beach Boy

LOS ANGELES (AP) – Brother Records Inc. is suing former Beach Boys singer-guitarist Al Jardine for using the band's name when he tours.

The Superior Court lawsuit, filed Monday, claims Jardine is touring under: Beach Boys Family & Friends; Al Jardine, Beach Boy; and Al Jardine of the Beach Boys.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco ruled Jan. 28 that Jardine can't use the Beach Boys name, which belongs to Brother Records, a company jointly held by Jardine, Mike Love, Brian Wilson and the estate of Carl Wilson. Love is the sole licensee to perform under the name. Brother Records wants a court order preventing Jardine from using the name, $2 million in court costs, and unspecified damages from loss of earnings because of unfair competition pitting Jardine's concert appearances against Beach Boys lead singer Love's.

Brother Records said Monday that the 60-year-old Jardine "did not agree to abide by terms of a proposed license" so he was denied use of the name. Recorded messages left after business hours for plaintiffs' attorney Alfred G. Rava and Jardine attorney Jeffrey Benice were not immediately returned.

The issue has been in litigation since 1998. Jardine appealed a 2002 ruling in favor of Love, whom Jardine says excluded him from Beach Boys concerts in 2001. Jardine is seeking $4 million in damages.

DiCaprio gets Russian Film Fest award

LOS ANGELES (AP) – The Russian International Film Festival has awarded actor Leonardo DiCaprio its Tower Award for his contribution to world cinema.

DiCaprio, a Russian film aficionado, accepted the award from festival director Stas Namin before an intimate gathering including his grandmother, Yelena Smirnova, who emigrated from Russia 40 years ago, and his father, George DiCaprio.

The "Gangs of New York" and "Catch Me If You Can" star said he was a fan of Sergei Eisenstein and introduced one of his favorites from the director, "Battleship Potemkin," at the festival Sunday.

"I respect Russian culture and Russian cinema, especially Eisenstein, (Andrei) Tarkovsky, and (Sergei) Paradzhanov," the 28-year-old actor said. "I'm definitely going to catch some more movies at this festival."

The festival began Friday at the ArcLight Hollywood theaters and runs through Thursday. It includes Russian movie artwork, photography and posters. Among the films being screened is Eisenstein's classic, "Ivan the Terrible."

"By showing these movies together in a single exhibition, students, filmmakers, industry leaders and cinema lovers will discover the unique vision and artistry of Russian masters of moviemaking," Namin said.

The festival was organized by the Stas Namin Cultural Center in Russia, the American Film Institute and Seven Arts Productions.

MTV to remake "Wuthering Heights"

NEW YORK (AP) – First, MTV updated "Carmen." Now, the cable music channel is offering a modern take on "Wuthering Heights."

Erika Christensen, who played a high school stalker in last year's "Swimfan" and a drug-addicted teen in 2000's "Traffic," will star as Cate in a musical version of the Emily Bronte novel.

Erika Christensen will star in a musical version of the Emily Bronte novel, "Wuthering Heights."

Mike Vogel will play a homeless musician named Heath with whom Cate falls in love, and Chris Masterson (Fox's "Malcolm in the Middle") will play Edward, whom Cate agrees to marry instead.

Christensen, Vogel and Johnny Whitworth, as Cate's brother, Hendrix, will make their on-screen singing debuts in the film, which is scheduled to begin production in May in Puerto Rico, MTV said Monday. It's set to air during the third quarter of this year.

A previous MTV original film, "Carmen: A Hip-Hopera," starred Beyonce Knowles of Destiny's Child in a contemporary version of the classic opera.

American Music Awards will shift to an earlier date; Grammys are expected to do the same

Sharon and Ozzy Osbourne host the 30th annual American Music Awards on Jan. 13, 2003.

LOS ANGELES (AP) — American Music Awards organizers plan to shift the show from its usual January date to November of this year, cutting the nominations window by about two months, a spokesman for the show said.

The Grammys, which air on CBS, also will switch from their traditional late February position to a few weeks earlier, according to the music industry trade newspaper Billboard. Grammy officials did not immediately return a call for comment Monday.

The American Music Awards, which are broadcast on ABC, planned to break from the early year crush of award shows long before the apparent Grammy decision, Paul Shefrin, spokesman for AMA producer Dick Clark, said Monday.

Ratings were down for the American Music Awards this year, when Ozzy Osbourne and his family were hosts. The show had just 12.9 million viewers — the smallest audience since Nielsen Media Research began keeping records for the show in 1974 — down from the 16 million who saw it in 2002.

Entertainment awards ceremonies have crowded the schedule for early 2004 since Oscar planners decided to hold their event nearly a month earlier, from late March to Feb. 29.

The Screen Actors Guild, the Directors Guild of America and the British Academy of Film and Television Arts are among the other groups that have moved up their awards ceremonies to remain competitive.

Jazz great and civil rights leader Nina Simone dies at 70

By NEKESA MUMBI MOODY
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – Nina Simone, whose deep, raspy, forceful voice made her a unique figure in jazz and later helped chronicle the civil rights movement, died Monday at her home in France, according to her personal manager. She was 70.

Clifton Henderson, who was at Simone's bedside at her death, said she died of "natural causes" in her sleep after a long illness. He refused to provide the name of the town where she lived.

"She inspired other singers to do what they believed in," Henderson said, saying the musician would also be remembered for her activism. "She'll definitely be looked at as a civil rights movement leader."

Norah Jones, India.Arie, Peter Gabriel, Sade and Aretha Franklin, who rerecorded one of Simone's most famous songs, the anthem "To Be Young, Gifted and Black," were among the artists who cited her as an influence.

"She was ahead of her time as a concert-level piano player who sang, wrote and spoke her mind," India.Arie wrote in an email to The Associated Press. "I aspire to be more like her."

Born Eunice Kathleen Waymon in 1933 in North Carolina, Simone was one of eight children in a poor family. She began playing the piano at age four and was classically trained, attending the Juilliard School in New York for one year. She had hoped to attend the prestigious Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, but was rejected – one of many disappointments she would attribute to racism.

She turned to singing jazz and popular music as a way to make money, performing in nightclubs in Philadelphia and Atlantic City, N.J. In the late 1950s Simone recorded her first tracks, including "Plain Gold Ring" and "Don't Smoke in Bed." But she gained fame in 1959 with her recording of "I Loves You Porgy," from the opera "Porgy & Bess."

Simone later wove the turbulent times of the 1960s into her music. In 1963, after the church bombing that killed four young black girls in Birmingham, Ala., and the slaying of Medgar Evers, she wrote "Mississippi Goddam," whose searing lyrics included the lines: "Oh but this whole country is full of lies, You're all gonna die and die like flies."

After the killing of The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., she recorded "Why? The King of Love Is Dead."

"That's what separated Nina from the other singers," friend and jazz concert promoter George Wein told the AP on Monday. "Nina took civil rights and the movement, the fight to another level, and made it part of her persona."

In a 1998 interview, Simone blamed racism in the United States for her decision to live abroad, saying that as a black person, she had "paid a heavy price for fighting the establishment."

She left the United States in 1973 and lived in the Caribbean and Africa before settling in Europe. She didn't return to the United States until 1985 for a series of concerts.

Wein said she was extremely bitter.

"She was a black woman who never could relate to the position of what it was to be black in America. She couldn't understand it," he said. "She was an unhappy person."

Simone enjoyed perhaps her greatest success in the 1960s and '70s, with songs such as "I Want a Little Sugar in My Bowl" and "Four Women," a song about four black woman with varying skin colors and lifestyles. One of the verses reads, "My skin is brown-And my manner is tough-I'll kill the first mother I see ... What do they call me? My name is PEACHES."

Though she was a gifted songwriter, Simone also recorded songs from artists as diverse as Leonard Cohen and the Bee Gees and made them her own. Perhaps one of her more popular covers was her version of "House of the Rising Sun."

While she had a regal presence onstage, she could often be temperamental; she had a reputation for chewing out audience members who interrupted her performances with conversation or loud drinking or talking.

"As an entertainer, she had the world in her hands, but she never knew how to grab it," said Wein.

'Rockin' out' questions why women can't rock these same albums unless they like the music, because most of the time female listeners are jealous of the female rockers and won't buy their album.

On the other hand, why do you think The Beatles sold so many albums? They created good rock (a plus for dudes and chicks), and they were good looking (a plus for chicks). The rest is history.

I'm guilty of this too. I first started to like the Goo Goo Dolls in middle school because I thought lead vocalist Johnny Rzeznik was cute. Little did I know that I would end up liking their music too.

So ladies and gents, does this mean that female rock groups are doomed forever? Will sexy male rockers rule the charts and will female rockers only be recognized because they are "cute" or because a band member is on drugs and does weird things in public?

It seems that things won't change for a long time – if they ever do. I guess that the day women in general don't have to be sexy to be noticed will be the day that a female rock group will be successful based on their music and not their sex appeal.

Sumara Marblestone is a Collegian Columnist.

Lead vocalist Courtney Love is one such female musician viewed as a grungy, sexual, naughty chick.

'Straight Edge' movement seeing renewed interest from youth

"straight edge" theme.

Geoff Bickford, a senior who lives in the house, says he and six others formed the so-called "X" house "to offer some sort of a sanctuary to ourselves and others who want to escape the typical weekend activities of a college town."

Schuyler Brown, a trendspotter who specializes in youth for the ad agency Euro RSCG, has noted the movement's latest revival, which she says has been inspired by more than a "just-say-no" mentality.

"They've bought the message, but on their own terms," Brown says, noting that many straight-edgers are rebelling against alcohol and cigarette companies that market to them.

Many straight-edgers are also vegetarian or vegan and some promote monogamy, another aspect inspired by the lyrics to "Straight Edge," the song by the now-defunct band Minor Threat that launched the movement.

Anna Tran, a 21-year-old student at the University of Utah, goes as far as calling her straight-edge life "something like a religion."

"Being straight edge should open your eyes to different points of view, open your eyes to view life on a deeper level," Tran says.

She says she was annoyed when she and her friends – singled out because of their dark clothing, "rocked out" hair and tattoos – were questioned by security guards at the 2002 Winter Olympics. Salt Lake officials had added straight-edgers to a list of potential terror threats.

There were no violent incidents there. But some law enforcement officials still worry about youth who take the movement to a confrontational extreme.

"On the surface, the ideals and beliefs sound pretty doggone good," says Brad Harmon, a detective with the Salt Lake County sheriff's department who helped convict two straight-edgers in the killing there. "But when you start getting into a cause and there's friction against the cause, then something's got to give."

One professor at the University of Utah who once followed the movement said she dropped her study of it after receiving personal threats from more militant straight-edgers.

Meanwhile, Michelle Etheridge, a 16-year-old Canadian straight-edger from Vernon, British Columbia, says raucous behavior among "crews" of teenage boys who call themselves straight edge has caused more than one classmate to drop the label. Mostly, she says, the boys' antics – jumping off low buildings and other stunts akin to those on the MTV show "Jackass" – are aimed at one-upping one another.

Other serious straight-edgers bemoan the fact that it's now possible to buy straight-edge T-shirts and other merchandise online and even at some mall stores.

"It seems like a fad," says Scott Foster, a 31-year-old from Coplay, Pa., who's been straight edge for years. "Now it's a good way to rebel against society without ... losing your car privileges."

Drugs common in baseball

NEW YORK (AP) – Baseball players are still using muscle-building drugs and amphetamines despite the sport's new steroid-testing plan, The New York Times reported in Tuesday's editions.

Players have switched from using steroids to drugs like human growth hormone, The Times reported, citing interviews with 40 current or former players, baseball executives and medical officials.

Some players told the newspaper that the union is jeopardizing the health of its members by not allowing mandatory testing of certain drugs.

This spring, 16 members of the Lowell, Mass., White Sox were ready to submit a drug test so they could be named as testing positive for steroids. Their idea was to send a message that more extensive monitoring is needed.

Players on an unidentified National League team also considered refusing to be tested, The Times reported.

Former San Diego Padres All-Star Jim Gwynn said that more attention needs to be focused on amphetamines. He estimates that 50 percent of position players use "greenies" routinely.

"People might think there is a steroid problem in baseball, but it's nowhere near the other problem, the other, it's a rampant problem," Gwynn told the paper. "Guys feel like steroids are cheating and greenies aren't.

"Sooner or later, it's going to get out that there's a greenie problem, and it's a huge one," Gwynn said. "Guys feel like they need an edge. It didn't seem like there was a lot of it earlier in my career, but I know that coming down to the end of my career, it was rampant on my club."

Last year, former players Jose Canseco and Ken Caminiti also made claims of widespread steroid use in baseball.

New York Mets pitcher Tom Glavine, the NL player rep to the union, called Gwynn's comments "irresponsible."

"I have a problem with all these guys that aren't playing anymore now coming out and saying that all these problems exist," Glavine told the paper. "If the problems were there and they were so prevalent, how come nobody said anything when they were playing?

"Is there stuff going on? Sure," Glavine said. "Is it 50 percent? I don't think so."

There is no testing for amphetamines in the labor agreement reached between players and owners last summer.

The policy calls for all players to be tested for steroids once during the 2003 season, and for 240 players to be tested at random again. If more than five percent test positive, a second step will go into effect in 2004, in which players could be subject to penalties for testing positive. In 2003, however, players who test positive for steroids would not be penalized – or even identified.

It is a weak drug policy when compared with the NFL, NCAA and International Olympic Committee, all of which test for more than just steroids and have more stringent penalties.

Staples card to feature Lewis, Tyson

LOS ANGELES (AP) Heavyweight champion Lennox Lewis and Mike Tyson will fight at Staples Center on June 21, but they won't be facing each other.

Staples Center President Tim Leiweke struck a deal with promoter Don Shaw to hold a doubleheader at the arena, featuring a title defense by Lennox Lewis with an undercard headed by Mike Tyson in a non-title bout, the Los Angeles Times report a on Tuesday.

The deal was completed Monday by the California State Athletic Commission which agreed in an informal poll to grant Tyson a license without a hearing. No further steps will be required, said Van Gordon Sauter, chairman of the commission.

Lewis is expected to defend his World Boxing Council title against Kirk Johnson although it was still possible top contender Vitali Klitschko would be the opponent.

Lewis missed a deadline last week to file the WBC rematch, his plans.

He is pursuing legal action to keep the boxing council from stripping him for refusing to fight Klitschko.

Tyson, a former heavyweight champion, will face Oleg Maskaev.

AMERICA EAST TO ADD UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND, BALTIMORE COUNTY

BOSTON (AP) – The University of Maryland, Baltimore County will join the America East conference in all the school's sports beginning in the 2003-2004 school year conference officials announced on Tuesday.

The addition brings the conference's total membership to 10 institutions.

"The institution is a natural fit for the conference with an academic and athletics mission similar to our current members," commissioner Chris Monasch said in a statement. "The mid-Atlantic location of UMBC combined with our present membership in New York and New England positions America East as a significant mid-major conference in this part of the country."

UMBC, which has an undergraduate enrollment of roughly 9,300, has won the Northeast Conference's Commissioner's Cup as the top over all athletics program for four straight years.

It fields teams in each of the 21 of American East-sponsored sports but golf.

SMITH PROMOTED TO CHARGERS GM

SAN DIEGO (AP) – A.J. Smith was promoted to general manager of the San Diego Chargers on Tuesday, 11 days after predecessor John Butler died of cancer.

"John Butler and I talked shortly after he was diagnosed," team president Dean Spanos said. "We both agreed that if John couldn't be here, his successor was already in place. A.J. is the perfect man for the job."

Smith was to be introduced at a news conference Tuesday afternoon. He was Butler's right-hand man with the Chargers and the Buffalo Bills; they worked together for 21 seasons, with three organizations.

Butler, 56, died of lymphoma on April 11. He was originally diagnosed with lung cancer in July.

A few hours after Butler died, Spanos announced that the 34-year-old Smith would run the Chargers' draft this weekend.

Spanos said last week that he would move quickly to announce Butler's successor but wanted to hold off for a few days out of respect for Butler, who was buried Wednesday in Sidney, Ill.

Curreri named Rookie of the Week

University of Massachusetts freshman outfielder Frank Curreri has been named the Atlantic 10 Conference Baseball Rookie of the Week, it was announced today by the league office. Curreri is the second Minuteman to be named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week this season.

In six games last week, Curreri went nine for 21 (.429) with seven extra base hits (three doubles, one triple and three home runs, for a 1.095 slugging percentage) and eight runs batted in. All three of his homers and seven of his eight RBIs last week came in Atlantic 10 contests, while he totaled four multi-hit games on the week. Curreri hit his first collegiate home run in the 10-8 victory over Fordham last Monday, and scored a career-high four runs in Thursday's 13-3 victory at Holy Cross. He then finished the week by providing nearly all of the offense in UMass' 7-2 win over Rhode Island. In that game, Curreri went three for four with a double, two home runs and a career-high six runs batted in. For the season, Curreri is now batting .333 with three home runs and 14 runs batted in.

Frimpong-Boateng honored for league's fastest times

University of Massachusetts senior Kwesi Frimpong-Boateng shared the Atlantic 10's Performer of the Week honor with Rhode Island's Colin Aina after recording the league's fastest times this spring in both the 100-meter dash and the 200-meter dash last weekend at a five-way meet at Connecticut.

He won the 100-meter dash by posting the A-10's fastest time in the event this season at 10.60, and although he was second in the 200-meter dash, his time of 21.63 was also the fastest by an A-10 performer in that event this spring, too.

Frimpong-Boateng's marks were good enough to qualify him for next month's New England Championships and the IC4A Outdoor Championships.

Maura McGarritty scored a pair of goals in Saturday's 14-13 win over St. Bonaventure

However, the Minutewomen did not let the turf issue bother them, and won 14-13 when Emery scored the game-winner with just over 30 seconds remaining in regulation.

Robinson scored six goals and added one assist in an up-and-down game that saw the Minutewomen pull ahead 10-6 in the first half. But they lost the lead in the second after being outscored 7-4.

"We made a quick transition from turf to grass," said Bolduc, who was pleased with the way the Minutewomen played on the foreign surface.

Doyle had 10 saves versus the 12 saves by Bonnies goalie Kristen Beahm.

The Minutewomen saw their four-goal lead evaporate when St. Bonaventure went on a 7-3 scoring run that tied the game at 13. Emery's game-winning goal was the first UMass score in nearly 12 minutes.

"The girls were tired after not playing on grass for a year," Bolduc said. "Making that transition is hard on your legs. We are really excited about the tournament, optimistic."

The Minutewomen have one game remaining in their A-10 schedule and two for the year. Their next game is scheduled for 1 p.m. Thursday at North Carolina.

Bengals' first draft pick just more terrible luck

By DAVE GOLDBERG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK (AP) – Nothing goes right for the Cincinnati Bengals, even when they own the No. 1 choice in the NFL draft.

Yes, the Bengals will have the first pick. And they don't really want it.

Cincinnati has talked to the agent for Southern California's Heisman Trophy-winning quarterback Carson Palmer and the agents for Marshall QB Byron Leftwich and Kansas State cornerback Terence Newman. Typically, money already is an issue – Palmer wants far more than Bengals president Mike Brown is willing to pay.

New coach Marvin Lewis would prefer a defensive player. He can always snare a quarterback to develop like Chris Simms or Dave Ragone in the second round while Jon Kitna tries to help the Bengals approach .500.

They've already been burned with a high-pick QB – Akili Smith, third overall in 1999. Even Smith acknowledges that.

"It's been the worst script in the history of quarterbacks," he says.

Lewis, who made his reputation as a defensive coordinator, prefers Newman. He could get the CB or defensive tackle Dewayne Robertson of Kentucky if Cincinnati trades down.

The guess here is the Bengals stay put and take CARSON PALMER, QB, Southern California.

2. DETROIT. Nothing goes right for the Lions, either. They want CHARLES ROGERS, WR, Michigan State, although there are questions about a drug test he took at the combine.

3. HOUSTON. The Texans decide not to trade up for Rogers and take ANDRE JOHNSON, WR, Miami, giving David Carr, last year's No. 1, a target.

4. CHICAGO. Kordell Stewart is a decent stopgap at QB and the Bears might get Chris Simms in the second round. DEWAYNE ROBERTSON, DT, Kentucky, fills an urgent need.

5. DALLAS. Bill Parcells loves Lawrence Taylor clones. But Terrell Suggs' disappointing times in the 40-yard dash mean Parcells instead will go with TERENCE NEWMAN, CB, Kansas State, an instant stopper as a position that killed the Cowboys last season.

6. ARIZONA. The Cardinals got Emmitt Smith to sell tickets. They'll try to sell more with a local, TERRELL SUGGS, DE, Arizona State, whose 4.85 40-yard dash times don't wipe away his 24 sacks last season.

7. MINNESOTA. The Vikings would love to take Suggs, Robertson or Newman. They "settle" for JIMMY KENNEDY, DT, Penn State, whose only problem is a tendency to eat too much.

8. JACKSONVILLE. Mark Brunell can't go on forever. BYRON LEFTWICH, QB, Marshall.

10. BALTIMORE. Brian Billick won a Super Bowl with Trent Dilfer. KYLE BOLLER, QB, Cal, has been moving up the draft board.

11. SEATTLE. The Seahawks were the worst team in the NFL against the run last season. KEVIN WILLIAMS, DT, Oklahoma State.

12. ST. LOUIS. The Rams still need defense. With Aeneas Williams a major question mark and Dre' Bly gone, they take MARCUS TRUFANT, CB, Washington State.

13. NEW YORK JETS. The Jets' linebackers are aging and slow. BOSS BAILEY, LB, Georgia, is neither.

14. NEW ENGLAND. Bill Belichick has added defense through free agency and gets more: JOHNATHAN SULLIVAN, DT, Georgia, to play next to former college teammate Richard Seymour.

15. SAN DIEGO. The run on defensive linemen continues with WILLIAM JOSEPH, DT, Miami.

16. KANSAS CITY. The offseason has been devoted to improving the defense. ANDRE WOOLFOLK, CB, Oklahoma, is the latest addition.

17, 18. NEW ORLEANS, Another couple of picks to package and move up. Or the Saints will take TROY POLAMALU, S, Southern California, and JEROME McDOUGLE, DE, Miami.

19. NEW ENGLAND. More defense: E.J. HENDERSON, LB, Maryland.

21. CLEVELAND. The Browns have done nothing about their OL since they returned to the NFL in 1999. ERIC STEINBACH, G, Iowa.

22. NEW YORK JETS. They signed Curtis Conway to replace Laveranues Coles, but TAYLOR JACOBS, WR, Florida is the long-term solution.

23. BUFFALO. The Bills gave up their first pick for Drew Bledsoe, then got this one for Peerless Price. KENNY PETERSON, DT, Ohio State, helps the defensive rebuilding.

24. INDIANAPOLIS. Another defensive unit that needs help. MIKE DOSS, S, Ohio State.

25. NEW YORK GIANTS. GM Ernie Accorsi has moved up in the first round the last two years and it could happen again. MICHAEL HAYNES, DE, Penn State provides much-needed DL depth.

26. SAN FRANCISCO. Defensive line needs rebuilding. But there are DLs lower, and BRYANT JOHNSON, WR, Penn State is needed to complement Terrell Owens.

27. PITTSBURGH. Tommy Maddox is fine for now, but the Steelers' future is REX GROSSMAN, QB, Florida.

28. TENNESSEE. Eddie George won't go on forever. LARRY JOHNSON, RB, Penn State, the first running back in a draft that lacks quality at the position.

30. PHILADELPHIA. A pass rusher to replace Hugh Douglas. CHRIS KELSAY, DE, Nebraska.

31, 32. OAKLAND. Jerry Rice and Tim Brown are nearing the end of superb careers. KELLEY WASHINGTON, WR, Tennessee, and a classic Raiders pick: WILLIS McGAHEE, RB, Miami, who would have been in the top five if he hadn't torn up his knee in the national title game.

Forget the hills, tough weather a marathon foe

By RIK STEVENS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – Turns out there is a running god.

He or she just doesn't like me very much.

After freezing my bunions off training for Monday's 107th Boston Marathon, the sun aimed his happy face at us. The noontime mercury in Hopkinton read 70 degrees, turning the course into a sweaty, 26.2-mile gun check.

Final score: Mother Nature, 1 – Me, zip.

I finished the race in 3 hours, 19 minutes, 52 seconds. It's my slowest time at this distance, and 20 minutes off my goal of a sub-3 hour Boston. I can honestly say it was the hardest race I've ever run.

I went out exactly where I wanted to be, serenaded first by Massachusetts State Police Sgt. Dan Clark, who belted out a Star Spangled Banner punctuated by the fly over of two F-15 fighter jets from a nearby air base.

After the patriotic send-off, we were off, a bobbing, weaving, waving mass of sweating humanity surging step by grueling step toward Boston. I wore bib number 2311.

My first miles were dead-on 6:45 – the pace I needed to run a 2:56. I kept it up through the 6.2-mile mark, but the heat and bright sun were sucking the life out of me.

By eight miles, I knew I was in trouble. My legs were dead and, much worse, nausea kept me from refueling along the way.

Not a good combination.

I went from "sub-3" to "cross the finish line in an upright posture."

I should have stopped, but stubborn pride, determination and, just may be, a fear of failure, kept me chugging along.

When racers think of Boston, they think of Heartbreak Hill, that 600-meter, spirit-draining mound between miles 20 and 21 in Newton. It's the final hump of the feared Newton hills – roughly four miles of pain adorned with chalk messages of inspiration:

"If you believe it, you can do it."

"Go, Daddy."

"It's all downhill from here."

Funny thing is, as bad as I felt, I mastered these monsters, passing more runners than passed me. At the top, marked by another chalk message reading "YOU DID IT," I turned, jogged backward and blew a kiss to that devil.

"Yo, that was smooth 2311," hollered a fan who saw my gesture of respect and, probably, farewell.

That was the last of the smooth, though. I stumbled and clanked home, limping along Beacon Street, passing Kenmore Square, picking up Commonwealth Avenue then turning onto Hereford Street. In the five miles from the top of Heartbreak Hill, I stopped three times, my left hip cramping and refusing to go another step.

Then the magic moment, the turn at the top of Hereford where my wife and two daughters – plus my eldest daughter's college friend – waited worriedly. I hobbled over to them and gave each a big kiss. A gentleman in the crowd excitedly grabbed my hand in one of the best handshakes I've ever shared.

Down the Boylston Street canyon, a deafening alley of fans and music, my tired and bloodied feet a metronome for the final movement.

The finish line. Stop running. Start crying. Not tears of disappointment but of relief and accomplishment.

Hey, silver lining though: I had always wanted to see the inside of the medical tent in Copley Square.

That's where the spirit of this race was exemplified. The volunteers make this event what it is, offering constant, heartfelt encouragement with every cup of water along the route, then taking care of us when we crash hard.

My temperature had dropped to 94.5 – medically speaking "not good."

I was shaky and shivering. The medical personnel – volunteer doctors, nurses, physical therapists and athletic trainers – treated me like I was the only runner in bad straits. I wasn't. The tent was filling up.

They pumped me full of hot beef bouillon and Gatorade, wrapped me in blankets and warm towels and took great care of me until I was ready to walk. I'm indebted.

The disappointing finish can never tarnish the memories of the event. On virtually every step of the way, you are treated to one heart-grabbing moment after another:

Jason Pisano straining to push his wheelchair backward with withered legs. And you thought you were hurting.

The kids who line the route, holding out water, tissues, oranges and tiny fingers just hoping for a low-five.

The guy who stops at mile 24, swears he can't go on and raises the roof when he shambles forward on aching legs.

The hugs and tears at the family reunion area.

Ah, shoot, I think I just talked myself into running this thing again.

Wild West only side with chance

Adam Leroy

Spring is here, and for basketball junkies that means just one thing — the NBA Playoffs. This week the second season got under way in the NBA as 16 teams striving towards the same goal — dethrone the Lakers.

Surprisingly, some of the more trivial topics this week revolved around who should play and who wouldn't.

Dikembe Mutombo finally returned to action after missing 36 games with a wrist injury.

That was the good news for the New Jersey Nets. The bad — Mount Mutombo isn't going to get his pick of "there" for maybe the rest of the playoffs. Tragically, his beloved older brother died suddenly while sitting on the phone last week. Dikembe was going to make the trip back to Zaire, but his father told him that his "second" family needed him here. So — let's hope basketball can be an escape for the Nets center during this tough time.

Preseason the team against the Knicks top opening round is the Milwaukee Bucks. Gary Payton, Desmond Mason and one of his worst playoff performances in Game 1 going scoreless through the fourth quarter. Was Jason Kidd too much for the Glove? Maybe but Payton, Mason and teammates Sam Cassell and Kenny Anders had other matters on their mind. Literally right after the game the three Bucks flew on a plane from Toronto to settle some legal matters. They surrendered to police on charges of assault for a fight the team had outside a strip club in Toronto. All three were later released and rejoined their teammates in New Jersey for Game 2.

Meanwhile O'Neal was going to miss the beginning of the playoffs for two reasons. One, his grandfather passed away, and the other because of the birth of his third child. What did you big man name his child? Shaquille Rashaun O'Neal. Baby Shaq weighed in at 13 pounds and takes a lot after his dad. So truth to that, but did Kidd have to be a plump little champion. Shaq was able and ready to play Game 1 and looked to be in his usual fine form.

Now, with all that out of the way, lets talk some basketball.

Can anyone dethrone Kobe, Shaq and the Lakers? Not by the way L.A. played in Game 1 on Sunday. The Lakers were dominant from the opening tip, led by some spectacular moves by Kobe and some dunks by the big man. The one question for the Lakers, as always, is how reliable the supporting cast of Rick Fox, Derek Fisher and Robert Horry will be? If Sunday is any indication, the supporting cast will not be a problem. When they are hitting their threes, the Lakers are unstoppable, and that is just what they looked like while taking home court away from Kevin Garnett and the Timberwolves.

Minnesota is the same old story, except this year it has home court in the first round. So much for that. Within a quarter, the game was over. KG has got to get his potential MVP self out. Fast, because he won't accomplish anything in the Western Conference. He is a top five player in this league, and has had an MVP-type year, but he cannot compete with the big bruisers like Shaq and Tim Duncan. He needs to take a lesson from the likes of Stephon Marbury and get himself out of there and come out fast, where he would be the only stud in a big-man depleted conference.

The Lakers' biggest competition and threat is Sacramento. Not only are the Kings the deepest team in the league, they are the only team that truly believes it can beat the Lakers. "Playing is one part of basketball — believing is the other. The Kings have the inside-outside game, and give the Lakers the most trouble because they stretch the defense with their potent offense. These two clubs also hate each other. They have met in the playoffs for the last three years and there is absolutely no love lost between them. The real finals will be when the Lakers and Kings meet, and let's hope they do because it will be an awesome series.

Utah plays the Kings in the first round, but must we talk about the old Chevy that just won't die? Malone and Stockton are future Hall of Famers, but they need to start making summer reservations.

The Blazers and Mavericks matchup is quite possibly the most intriguing series. Dallas started the year off as a powerhouse, but is looking more and more like a joke as the year continues. The Mavs are still good and very dangerous, but playoff basketball is about the defense, and Dirk Nowitzki, Michael Finley and Steve Nash do not exactly strike fear into me with their tenacious "D." But watch out for Shawn Bradley — he's a force to be reckoned with!

If the Portland players can stay out of legal trouble, they can be a team that gives anyone problems. Talent is not an issue for this club. Staying focused is where this team needs improvement. It is experienced and loaded with talent, so no teams should take this team lightly. Just enforce strict curfews and give them their pacifiers and they will give any team a run for its money — or drugs.

The Suns and the Spurs are the final match-up in the West. Phoenix won a crazy game 1 with two 3-point shots — one to send the game into overtime and the other was a running heave by Stephon Marbury as time expired in OT. It's not that the Spurs are good, but they have a beast by the name of Tim Duncan on their team. The Spurs will most likely find a way to get home court back, but with former MVP David Robinson possibly sidelined with a sore knee, this series could get very interesting.

This is where the giants play. Shaq and Kobe have the bragging rights, and it is up to Nowitzki, Garnett and Duncan to make humanity at peace and beat the Lakers. Welcome to the wild-wild west.

Coming soon, the Eastern Conference, otherwise known as the runners-up in the 2003 NBA playoffs.

Softball drops rare conference game

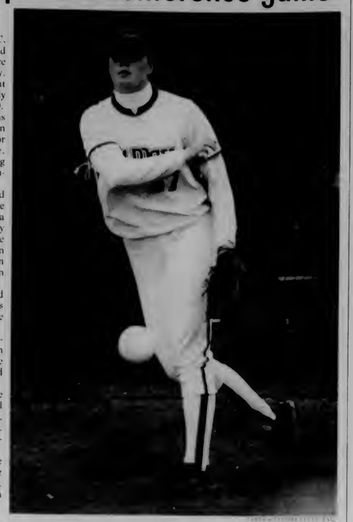
a double to left field. Junior K.C. Budrewicz pinch-ran for Holtz and advanced to third base on a sacrifice hunt by freshman K.L. Kelley. Sophomore Hilary Puglia brought Budrewicz home on a sacrifice fly out to put the Minutewomen up 4-0.

The final run of the game was scored in the seventh inning when senior Anna Perey drove in junior Nicole Wilson from third base. Wilson had reached third after being hit by a pitch and stealing consecutive bases.

Game two of the twin bill had initial indications that the Minutewomen were poised for a sweep of the Flyers. With two away and a 4-0 lead in the bottom of the seventh inning, the Minutewomen were only one out away from extending their A-10 regular season winning streak to 53.

Sophomore pitcher Kelli Arnold dominated for the first 6 2/3 innings of the game, but failed to record the final out before it was too late.



Down to its final out, Dayton rallied with four hits, the last of which was a two-run home run by Cassie Gross that tied the score at 4-4 and sent the game into extra innings.

"Once that game was tied, we needed to go out and establish and benchmark what needed to happen, and we didn't do that," Sortino said. "We were kind of waiting for something to happen."

Following UMass' debacle in the seventh inning, Sortino put Holtz back on the mound in the eighth. The decision came despite having a third pitcher, freshman Jenna Busa, fresh in the bullpen.

"When the game became so close in extra innings, I thought it was too difficult of a situation to put [Busa] in at this point in time of her development," Sortino said. "I thought because it was a conference game that we needed to go with a win and I just felt like we needed to bear down and come back with what we know."

Holtz continued her dominance on the mound for UMass until the 12th inning, when Dayton kicked its offense into another gear. Dayton's Shannon St. Clair and Angie Barney led off the 12th inning with back-to-back singles. Holtz quickly settled down and retired the next two batters, leaving just one more out to free herself from the jam. However, a single by Weinheimer scored St. Clair and ended UMass' A-10 regular season winning streak at 52 games.

Kaila Holtz earned her third A-10 Pitcher of the Week Award Tuesday. The senior went 2-1 with a 0.38 ERA in 18.2 innings last week.

The Minutewomen gave themselves plenty of opportunities to take the lead in the extra frames. UMass stranded a total of five baserunners in the 12th inning alone. The inability to capitalize with runners in scoring position was something Sortino pointed toward when dissecting this emotional defeat.

"You've got to give yourself a chance. In some cases we hit the ball at some people, but I felt that we were looking for somebody else to get it done," Sortino said. "People just needed to step up and say 'OK, now it's my turn. I'm going to do it.' It just felt like one of those days where we were just waiting and waiting and waiting but nothing was happening."

Although the facial expressions along the UMass bench after the game led Sortino to believe her team was in a state of shock, she was anxious to get back on the field, and more importantly, back on the winning track.

"Right now the players have to look at what's happening and take stock in what we are doing and what we need to do better," said Sortino. "Streaks don't mean anything other than they sound good. It's the moment at hand that counts, not how many games you've won in a row."

The Minutewomen will return to the field on Wednesday when they host Connecticut at the UMass Softball Complex. UConn pulled out a 1-0 upset against UMass in Storrs last week.

Tennis places second at A-10s

By ANNA EDWARDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts tennis team finished second at the 2003 Atlantic 10 Women's Championship in Baltimore on Saturday after powering its way to the final against No. 2 seed Temple.

Both the Owls and UMass displayed solid play throughout the three-day tournament to earn individual victories in the quarter and semifinals, promising an exciting finale on Saturday.

However, this anticipation was quickly dashed as Temple defeated the Minutewomen 4-1, with UMass unable to find its form and upset Temple's smooth play.

The A-10 crown was the Owls' third conference title and its first since 1995. With this, the Cherry and White received an automatic bid to the NCAA Women's Tennis Tournament. This regional tournament will be held May 9-11 at a site yet to be determined.

"We played an extremely difficult schedule this season, but all that mattered is the conference championships," Dixon said. "Everybody stepped up the intensity and this was an outstanding result from the team."

Both teams had a lot to play for in this final, and with a history of success at the A-10 tourney, the Maroon and White was trying to earn its second title in three years. However, straight-set victories by senior Danira Penic and freshman Mia Marovic at the top singles positions cruised the Owls to victory.

UMass junior Jafra Depontes never found her form in the No. 1 singles and was swept by Penic, 6-0, 6-2 in her second loss of the tournament. Depontes, who spent most of the spring season recovering from a shoulder injury, never settled into her game during the A-10s, which deprived spectators of superb tennis.

"It was tough for her," Dixon said. "She had a long lay off due to her shoulder, which made it hard to play her best tennis."

Sophomore Stephanie Price suffered her only defeat of the tournament against Marovic, 6-2, 6-1 in the No. 2 singles slot, while sophomore Sasha Edelstein was defeated, 6-1, 3-6, 2-2 (DNF) by freshman Ana Maslesa at No. 3 singles.

The Maroon and White's only victory in the final came from freshman Dorothy Iwanowicz, who won all of her tournament matches in No. 5 singles. She powered her way to a straight-set defeat of senior Rene Deyzel, 6-1, 6-4.

The A-10s concluded a victorious season for Iwanowicz, who has improved her play throughout the spring, and, according to Dixon, looks set to be a real power base for the Minutewomen next season.

"Dorothy is really one of the mainstays of the program," Dixon said. "She has improved mentally and physically and is really understanding the game now."

Defending champion and No. 3 seed Richmond finished third in the championships after defeating No. 1 seed Xavier 4-1.

Richmond was predicted to be a real threat in the tournament, but it struggled against Temple in the semifinals on Friday, losing 4-2 after play was delayed due to weather conditions.

George Washington was awarded fifth place after a 4-1 victory over Dayton.

The Maroon and White's journey to the final was colored in success, as it beat George Washington in the quarterfinals, 4-1, and Xavier, 4-2, in the semis.

Defeating George Washington was expected of UMass, after a 6-1 victory on April 12 put the Minutewomen as the favorites for this match. As predicted, the Maroon and White topped the Colonials in all singles matches – apart from the No. 4 position – and in the No. 1 and 2 doubles slots.

"The George Washington game was tough, our biggest match, so we were fired up," Dixon said. "It was a mental fortitude kind of match."

Victory was sweet against Xavier, which dominated the top spot for the championships. On paper, Xavier was seen as one of the favorites – along with defending champion Richmond – to win this year's title due to a strong contingent of young but talented players.

However, being placed in the same half as Xavier was a blessing to the Maroon and White, which knew it was a make or break situation.

Atlantic 10 Performer and Rookie of the Year in 2002, Lauren Clary, entered the A-10s with 24 singles wins for Xavier. The sophomore had also tallied 25 wins in doubles with teammate Stephanie Bauer.

Clary lived up to her record by defeating Depontes 6-1, 7-6, (7-3) in the semifinal on Friday. Depontes struggled in the first set, but the second set allowed her to challenge Clary to a great battle, with Clary's experience and solid performances over the spring proving too beneficial.

Price was victorious against Bauer in No. 2 singles, defeating her opponent in straight sets, 6-4, 6-3. After a rocky start for Edelstein, she powered her way through to defeat freshman Kristin Clary, 6-7 (8-6), 6-1, 6-0 in the No. 3 singles match, which decided the victory for the Minutewomen.

"Xavier hates playing us because we are a fight-hard team," Dixon said. "They don't like it when a team doesn't give up."

It was this passion and mental dominance that granted UMass victory over Xavier.

"God smiled on us," said Dixon.

The A-10 championship wrapped up a season for the Maroon and White that began in defeat but closed with victory.

Up next for the Minutewomen will be a fundraiser on May 3 at the Varsity Courts.

Off to Fenway

UM heads to Beanpot

The Massachusetts baseball team (14-11 overall, 8-4 Atlantic 10) returns to action on Wednesday when it faces Harvard (12-17) in a 2:00 p.m. game at Fenway Park in the semifinals of the Beanpot Baseball Classic.

UMass will then face either Boston College (18-16) or Northeastern (17-15) at Fenway on Thursday. The consolation game is set for 2:00 p.m., followed by the championship game at 5:00 p.m.

UMass posted a 4-2 record last week, and has won 10 of its last 12 games, while taking over first place in the Atlantic 10 East Division. The Minutemen opened the week with a 10-8 victory at Fordham, before dropping a 20-8 decision to Connecticut at home. UMass rebounded to defeat Holy Cross 13-3, then took two of three game from Rhode Island over the weekend. The Minutemen won the opener 4-1, before the Rams came back to take the second game 7-1. UMass then won the rubber game of the series 7-2.

This is the eighth appearance for Massachusetts in the Beanpot Baseball Classic, where the Minutemen have compiled a 10-3 mark. UMass has won the Beanpot crown outright on three occasions (1986, 1997 and 2000) while sharing the title with Harvard in 1996. The Minutemen lost in the championship game during both the 1999 and 2001 seasons, while last year they played in the consolation game for the first time, defeating Harvard 5-3 for third place.

In total, the Minutemen have played 15 games at Fenway Park over their history. The first UMass game at Fenway came on June 6, 1966, as the Minutemen fell to Boston College, 6-5, in the NCAA District 1 Playoffs. UMass would return to Fenway for the NCAA District 1 Playoffs in 1973, but had no luck again, falling to Harvard by a score of 4-2 on May 25, and then 8-7 to Providence on May 26. UMass finally snapped the Fenway jinx with its 13-2 victory over Harvard in the semifinals of the 1986 Beanpot. All told, the Minutemen sport an all-time record of 9-6 at Fenway Park.

UMass enters Tuesday's game with an all-time record of 14-22 against Harvard, including three straight victories. The Minutemen and the Crimson have gone 6-6 against each other since the beginning of the 1996 season, but UMass has won all five games which were played as part of the Beanpot. The Minutemen stand 28-16 all-time against Boston College (2-3 in the Beanpot) and 37-30 against Northeastern (3-0 in the Beanpot).

Freshman righthanded pitcher Matt Torra turned in another outstanding performance on the mound against Rhode Island on Sunday. He threw his third complete game of the season in the 7-2 victory, allowing only one earned run on five hits while striking out four. For the year, Torra now owns a 3-3 record with a 5.22 earned run average and 24 strikeouts, while throwing a team-high 39-2/3 innings.

Junior righthanded pitcher Eric Chown had another outstanding performance last week against Rhode Island. He threw a five-hit complete game against the Rams on Saturday, allowing only one run while striking out six in the 4-1 victory. The win was Chown's fourth straight, as he now stands 4-0 with a 3.12 earned run average against Atlantic 10 Conference foes. Overall this season, Chown now has a 4-2 record with a 5.71 earned run average and 31 strikeouts in 34-1/3 innings. He leads the team in strikeouts and is tied for the team lead in victories.

Softball drops rare A-10 game

By JEFF BOYD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts softball team witnessed something on Saturday that it had not seen since April 30, 2000.

With two outs in the bottom of the 12th and runners in scoring position, the Minutewomen could only watch as Dayton's Tracie Weinheimer singled up the middle to drive in the winning run for the Flyers.

The loss dropped UMass to 7-1 in the conference and put an end to its 52-game Atlantic 10 regular season winning streak.

If any team in the A-10 has been a thorn in the side of UMass' winning streak over the years, it has been the Flyers. Dayton was the last team to beat the Minutewomen before the streak, and gave UMass a 10-inning scare in a game last season. If any team was capable of disrupting UMass' dominance over the A-10, it had to be the Flyers.

"It's very tough to play there," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "It's a tough place to go. I thought that we did what we needed to do. But the thing is that we didn't finish. We just didn't finish. Period. End of story."

UMass' trip to Dayton was not a completely inauspicious experience. The Minutewomen were successful in their first game of the doubleheader with the Flyers, as senior Kaila Holtz stole the show in UMass' 5-0 victory.

Holtz was dominant both at the plate and on the mound for the Minutewoman in game one. With two runners on base in the first inning, Holtz blasted her fourth home run of the season, giving UMass a 3-0 lead. Holtz's three RBIs would be more than enough run support, as she went on to pitch her seventh shutout of the season.

"I thought that Kaila gave us a great effort on the mound on Saturday," Sortino said. "She was very greedy with her at-bats at the Tplate. I thought that she swung at good pitches and I think that she put the ball in play very well."

Junior Aisha Franke got the UMass offense rolling in the first inning with a one-out single. Franke then advanced to second base after senior Brandi Cross drew a walk, setting the stage for Holtz, who cleared the bases with her home run.

Holtz continued her tear at the plate in the sixth inning with

Lax wins a pair

For the first time in four years, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is ranked No. 2 in the Atlantic 10. The Minutewomen achieved this goal by defeating Duquesne and St. Bonaventure last weekend.

"We are very happy right now," UMass coach Carrie Boldue said.

The first game followed the typical pattern for UMass victories, as the Minutewomen fell behind early but rallied to come back with an 11-5 victory over Duquesne.

The Dukes took a 5-2 lead in the first half at the 18:25 mark, but by the time the first half ended, the score was knotted at five.

UMass' Hope Zellinger contributed to the victory with a hat trick – including the game's first and last goals – and one assist, giving Zellinger at least one point in all but two games this season.

The effort was the fourth hat trick of Zellinger's season. In all four of the games that Zellinger has scored three or more goals, the Minutewomen have won.

Jada Emery also contributed to the 11-goal outburst with two scores of her own. Lydia Robinson, Maura McGarrity and Emery all scored two goals against the Dukes.

Kelli Kurtz led the Minutewomen in draw controls with four.

Cyndi Doyle made five saves and allowed five goals to provide solid defense of the UMass cage. Her defense helped her out, allowing only 16 shots for the entire game and just six in the second half. The Minutewomen out shot the Dukes by a lopsided 33-16 mark, doubling Duquesne's output for the game.

Duquesne goaltender Sarah Pacini managed to save 17 of those 33 shots in a losing effort.

After the victory in Pittsburgh, the Minutewomen ventured north to upstate New York to face St. Bonaventure.

"St. Bonaventure has a really good team, [but is] very young," Bolduc said. "I like the way the coach is handling the situation."

One of the advantages that the Bonnies hold over an away team is that the field is not the artificial turf UMass is used to.

Investigators: fire appears accidental

Art and office may be salvageable

By DAN LAMOTHE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Fire investigators led by State Trooper Frank Hart secured the site of the New Massachusetts Foundry Building that went up in flames Tuesday night yesterday, determining that it appears that the fire was accidental in nature.

Investigators sifted through rubble yesterday, finding much of the artwork in the building salvageable and an office on the east end of the building containing thesis work for students relatively intact, according to University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMPD) Detective Brian Davies.

"They saved a lot of things that are of value to the people working in there," he said.

The building, used mainly for welding by Art Department students working with metal projects, was released to the state building inspector late yesterday afternoon after the fire investigation was complete.

UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald said that building investigators will spend the next 24 to 48 hours deciding how to handle any hazardous materials that may be in the building and what to do with the building next.

"There are students that do have art projects still within the building so we were trying to be cognizant in that and respective of that [in regards to demolition]," Archbald said.

Archbald mentioned a kiln and pipes within the building specifically that may contain asbestos.

UMass spokesperson Barbara Pitoniak said that she did not have damage estimates for the Foundry available.

Pitoniak said that Art Department Chair Ron Michaud will meet with the 14 students in the welding class housed in the Foundry today to discuss with them options the department is considering for the rest of the semester for the class.

"They're anxious to go back into the building to see if they can salvage some stuff," she said. "The students are obviously upset and probably need some time to get through this period."

Pitoniak said that in addition to the 14 people on the class list, there were tools and artwork by other students housed in the Foundry.

UMPD officers monitored the building throughout the night into yesterday, according to Davies.

"We were able to account for all the students and instructors [who use the building]," he said.

The New Massachusetts Foundry Building was one of the oldest on campus and, according to Davies.

"There aren't a lot of wood structure buildings on campus," he said. "It's amazing it lasted as long as it has."

Several other wooden structures housing academic programs on campus have burned down over the last 20 years. Fisher Laboratory, a three-story wood-frame building located near Orchard Hill, suffered $50,000 in damages on April 23, 1985, after flames completely engulfed it. The Hampshire Gazette reported that flames shot out of cellar windows and from the roof of the building.

The fire started when a welder using a torch to cut through a refrigeration pipe ignited the insulation behind a wall, according to the Collegian. The building was deemed unsafe and razed in 2001.

Another large fire gutted the William S. Clark International Center on Clark Hill Road on April 11, 1991. State fire officials said that the fire was likely intentionally set. Over $500,000 in office equipment, furniture and records were destroyed in the blaze. The International Programs housed in the building were moved to the Goodell building.

Scott Eldridge II and Jamie Loo contributed to this story.

Reich awarded as Distinguished Citizen Scholar

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Former United States Secretary of Labor Robert Reich speaks to students at the Fifth Annual Citizen Scholars Recognition Ceremony held in the top of the Campus Center yesterday.

By JESSE HIRSCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Robert Reich, former candidate for Massachusetts governor and Secretary of Labor under President Clinton, spoke to a room full of University of Massachusetts students, parents and faculty last night about the importance of leadership, politics, and activism.

Reich was given the Distinguished Citizen Scholar award by the UMass Office of Community Service Learning's Citizen Scholar Program.

He began by addressing the importance and the role of leaders in our changing society.

"You are already leaders," he said, "whether or not you have any kind of formal authority. A leader is someone who doesn't allow the people around him or her to deny problems exist; a leader commands public attention, often in subtle, behind-the-scenes ways, and refuses to let go of that attention."

Reich then proceeded to talk about the obstacles standing in the way of leaders like this.

"Denial is one of the greatest obstacles to accomplishing change. You may be surrounded by friends who suffer from depression, eating disorders, domestic abuse, and many other problems," he said. "And this may drive you to immerse yourself in studying, TV., drugs and alcohol, and having fun. Which is fine, don't get me wrong. But if it's at the cost of facing what needs to be faced, the cost can be huge. And it's up to you to change that."

The students honored, and who were honoring Reich, are part of a program intended to "enact change through active service in the community," according to John Reiff, director of the UMass Office of Community Service Learning. Robert Reich was chosen as this year's Distinguished Citizen Scholar because he "is someone who represents the merging of scholarship and public service.

"He embraces the notion that we need to translate our ideas about how the world should be into political action," Reiff said.

Reich spoke on this idea directly.

"The life of the mind and of action cannot be separated," he said. "A life that analyzes things and constantly looks at the big picture is completely compatible with putting your principles to work, testing them, and testing yourself."

He also spoke of the importance of overcoming cynicism and feelings of powerlessness.

"Especially today, when we look around and see so many problems with the world we live in, we can often feel disenfranchised and powerless to affect change," he said. "Just remember that nothing happens without one or two or five or twelve totally dedicated people like yourselves. As long as you have that, you can always make a difference."

However, Reich also emphatically cautioned the audience that this change will not come overnight.

"I know a small group of people in the mid-seventies who were working on legislation for workers to be able to leave their jobs for family issues such as childbirth or a spouse's illness," he said. "They were trying really hard, but then they faded out of sight through the eighties, or so I thought."

Reich said that it wasn't until 1993 that President Clinton signed the Family Medical Leave Act.

"To really want something, you need courage, patience, and tenacity like these people. You can't give up when it doesn't happen right away."

He also tried to counter the 'gloom' he saw in reaction to many of today's

Officials warn of SARS in Toronto and Beijing

By BARRY BROWN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

TORONTO (AP) – Global health officials warned travelers Wednesday to avoid Beijing and Toronto, where they might get the SARS virus and export it to new locations.

Canadian officials angrily said they would challenge the health advisory and declared their nation's largest city still "a safe place." Toronto is the first location outside Asia targeted in efforts to contain the disease.

In Beijing, Chinese officials said all public schools would close Thursday for two weeks, affecting 1.7 million children. Thousands of people trying to flee the outbreak packed the capital city's train station and airport.

Dr. David Heymann of the World Health Organization said the new travel alert, which includes China's Shanxi province, was necessary because "these areas now have quite a high magnitude of disease, a great risk of transmission locally .. and also they've been exporting cases to other countries."

The advisory, which says any unnecessary travel to those locations should be postponed, will be reviewed again in three weeks, he said. Previously, WHO warned against non-urgent travel to Hong Kong and the Chinese province of Guangdong, where the virus was first reported last November.

Dr. Paul Gully, director general of Health Canada, said he would challenge WHO's assertion in a letter.

"Toronto continues to be a safe place," he said.

Dr. Clifford McDonald, an official with the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, noted that the CDC had not issued the same strong advice. The CDC has warned travelers to take precautions when visiting Toronto.

And Toronto medical officer Dr. Sheela Basrur said the outbreak, while serious, "is contained — largely, in hospitals which is, frankly, where it belongs. So we don't have widespread community spread."

But Heymann, WHO's communicable disease chief, said Toronto had not contained the disease. A major reason for WHO's action, he said, is that a cluster of SARS cases among health workers in another country was traced to the Canadian city in the last week.

He would not say where the new cluster emerged, but there have been reports of at least three incidents of SARS being exported from Toronto. One involved a Toronto medical assistant who apparently spread SARS to her family in Manila before she died of it.

That case is the only reported one where an infected person from Canada is known to have triggered SARS in another jurisdiction.

Dr. Colin D'Cuhna, Toronto's

SGA meeting ends with quorum call again

By FERRON SALNIKER

For the second time in a row, a call for quorum shortly after 9:30 last night interrupted a proposal during the meeting of the Student Government Association.

The motion proposed to eliminate or reduce Wellness Special Interest Residential Programs (SIRPs) in the fall of 2003. The motion, proposed by senator Olaf Aprans, argued that wellness SIRPs are not being filled to capacity each year and with the creation of an alcohol free dorm, students will be placed in alcohol free housing that they did not request. Aprans said that the motion is designed to maximize student preferences.

Before quorum was called, several other motions were passed. A resolution was made that the senate will review applications for senators one week before appointees are to appear before the senate body for confirmation. The motion was designed to grant the senate more time to decide on an applicant and to allow senators to make more educated decisions. The motion did pass with some controversy, with many senators questioning the legality of the proposal and referring to federal law, arguing that it is illegal to release a personal file.

The senate approved President David Carr's two final members of the SGA Executive Cabinet. Russell Plato was appointed as the Secretary of Diversity, a position that was once removed.

"Russell came to me with a lot of great ideas," said Carr.

Plato presented his goals to the senate, highlighting plans to work on improving diversity in the admissions process through a focus on financial aid. He also mentioned plans to establish a monthly grounds table meeting with different groups on campus.

Many senators questioned the usefulness of the position, and argued that it had no importance. President Carr reassured senators, saying that the position was previously ineffective because it lacked direction from the president.

The senate also approved the appointment of the new Secretary of Registrar, Carla Moy, with little questioning. Moy's position will allow her control of RSO activity.

"Part of college is finding your niche," said Moy. " RSOs are what will help to do that."

Moy added that she is very interested in the work she will be able to do.

The senate also passed a motion concerning the Student Legal Services Office (SLSO). Undergraduates fund three quarters of the budget for the SLSO, the senators proposing the motion were concerned that the amount of time spent on undergraduate cases is not proportional to the funding. The proposal does not change the funding process but the SLSO is now responsible for keeping a log of time spent on undergraduate and graduate cases.

Another motion was passed reinstating the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and Minority Students (CCEBMS). The advising and support service was created in 1967 and was designed to focus on admission and retention of students of color. CCEBMS was eliminated in the summer of 2002, and advisors were reassigned to general advising offices. Senator Dahir's proposal to restore all aca-

House proposes education cuts

PROPOSED BUDGET CUTS

Here are some of the highlights from a $22.5 billion budget plan released Wednesday by the House Ways and Means Committee. The budget, which still must be approved by the full House, would:

- Cut about $150 million from state aid to local schools
- Raise $390 million in new and higher fees
- Eliminate a popular prescription drug program for the elderly
- Boost spending on lottery advertising by $5 million
- Trim $9 million from an education bonus system for police known as the Quinn Bill
- Partially repeal a state law limiting privatization of government services
- Cut $175 million from higher education programs
- Preserve the office of University of Massachusetts President William Bulger
- Reduce support services for formerly homeless mentally ill people
- Eliminate funding for a program to see if police use race to "profile" drivers
- Require welfare recipients with children two years or older to work for benefits
- Cut $52 million in state school bus reimbursements.

BOSTON (AP) - The House ignored Gov. Mitt Romney's plan to reorganize public higher education but proposed a budget yesterday that would achieve more savings than the governor's plan.

Some K-12 districts would lose up to 20 percent of their state aid under the House proposal, which aims to save $150 million by cutting aid to school districts across the state.

Education is among the many victims of the state's budget crisis. Budget writers in the Legislature and governor's office are facing a $3 billion deficit for the fiscal year beginning in July.

A nearly 20 percent reduction at each of the state's 29 college campuses would save $175 million. But the House plan preserves the office of University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, which would be phased out under the governor's plan, a source of strain between Romney and Bulger, the former senate president.

"We should reject good politics when we see it in favor of good policy," said Ways and Means Chairman Rep. John Rogers, D-Norwood.

The House also proposed a $30 million "efficiency incentive program" that offers funds for improved performance. Romney's plan had also called for greater accountability.

"That reflects what we were after in the first place, to make cuts from within rather than put them on the backs of students," Romney education spokeswoman Heidi Perlman said.

Romney's higher education plan calls for $100 million in cuts, $50 million in tuition increases, adding $44 million to financial aid, and administrative reorganization.

Perlman said 20 percent cuts to small community colleges might force them to increase fees.

UMass spokesman John Hoey, however said any talk of fee hikes is premature. "I don't think those kinds of options even begin to be considered until the end of the budget debate," Hoey said.

The five UMass campuses receive $89 million less than what they were budgeted for in fiscal 2003. UMass-Amherst, the flagship campus, would absorb about half the cuts.

Romney still plans to file a reorganization plan that does away with Bulger's office, Perlman said.

The proposed K-12 cuts would be offset slightly by a $59 million increase in special education payments to districts, restoration of $46 million in charter school reimbursements, and the creation of a $10 million education reform reserve or "pothole" account.

The House also proposed eliminating all transportation reimbursements to non-regional school districts, for a savings of nearly $52 million. Reimbursements to regional districts would be cut in half, saving $15 million.

The House also would save $40 million by reducing MCAS remediation funds, and $20 million by freezing a list of 380 schools awaiting state aid for construction projects.

Another $59 million would be saved by cutting early childhood education grants, grants to low-income cities for class reduction in kindergarten through third grade, early literacy programs, kindergarten expansion grants, universal school breakfasts, METCO, and teacher recruitment.

An 80 percent cut in MCAS tutoring funds is worrisome, Perlman said.

"This is not the time to be cutting programs that are specifically designed to help students meet the standards we set for them," she said.

About 6,000 high school seniors still have not passed the Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System test, making them ineligible for a diploma.

current events, such as the floundering economy and the war in Iraq.

"People ask me how I can be optimistic in the face of so many overwhelming problems. The answer is simple: when things seem to be at their very worst, when everything is at its gloomiest, that is when I've seen people get the most activated, exercising their democratic rights and effecting change. And I see that happening right now."

Reich ran for the Democratic seat in last year's Massachusetts gubernatorial election and was not successful. Both at the dinner ceremony and at an earlier seminar with a group of Citizen Scholars, he talked about the educational experience this proved to be.

"Don't underestimate the importance of speaking your mind," he said. "I learned that voters are tired of politicians who are insincere. Even if they don't agree with what you're saying, they will support you if they feel you are earnest. Not only did I learn that, but I also learned the amazing power of being surrounded by a mass of people who do support your values and see the world similarly to yourself. So even though I lost, it was not a negative experience."

He finished his speech at the Distinguished Citizen Scholar ceremony by congratulating the students involved in the program. "You have already done so much, and I am absolutely certain you'll just become better and better. God knows we need you; the world needs you."

Robert Reich will also be speaking to Five-College faculty members today at a breakfast presentation entitled "Politics and Principles."

commissioner of public health, said that means Toronto is "an exporter of sorts," but not enough for a travel advisory.

There is no treatment for severe acute respiratory syndrome, which has symptoms similar to pneumonia. It has killed at least 250 people worldwide, out of more than 4,000 infected.

Canada has been the most affected area outside Asia, with 140 cases and 16 deaths as of Wednesday, all in the Toronto area.

The disease has meant disaster for many businesses. Asia's aviation industry is in its worst crisis ever, some analysts say, with layoffs and thousands of flights canceled.

Hong Kong Chief Executive Tung Chee-hwa announced a $1.5 billion relief package Wednesday to try to help the territory's battered economy bounce back.

Even Chinatown restaurants in American cities have lost customers, despite the fact that there are fewer than 40 U.S. cases and no one has died.

In Toronto, near the New York state border, Wednesday's warning from WHO immediately piled on the misery. Mayor Mel Lastman was furious at the health agency.

Four top Iraqi officials caught

Air defense commander among the captured

By MATT KELLEY
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - American forces in Iraq captured four top officials of Saddam Hussein's former government yesterday, including the air defense force commander and the former head of military intelligence.

The highest-ranking official in the group is Muzahim Sa'b Hassan al-Tikriti, who headed Iraq's air defenses under Saddam. He was No. 10 on the U.S. list of the top 55 most wanted officials from Saddam's regime and the queen of diamonds in the military's deck of playing cards listing those officials.

Al-Tikriti, who was from Saddam's hometown clan which made up much of the former Iraqi inner circle, also reportedly helped train the paramilitary Fedayeen Saddam forces. U.S. officials have accused Fedayeen forces of committing war crimes including using civilians as human shields and killing Iraqis who wanted to surrender.

Pentagon officials said Wednesday it was too early to determine whether any of the officials would be tried for war crimes or other violations of international law.

The latest captures bring to 11 the number of top former Iraqi officials in U.S. custody. Another three in the top 55 are believed to have been killed, Pentagon officials say.

Gen. Zuhayr Talib Abd al-Sattar al-Naqib, the former head of the Directorate of Military Intelligence, surrendered to U.S. troops Wednesday, a senior Pentagon official said.

The directorate monitored the loyalty of Iraq's regular army, provided security at Iraqi military facilities and collected intelligence on military forces opposing Iraq. The Pentagon official said Naqib's American equivalent would be the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency.

Naqib was No. 21 on the 55 most wanted list and was the seven of hearts in the deck of cards produced by the U.S. military with pictures of Saddam's associates.

Naqib was a professional soldier who rose through the ranks of the Iraqi army, U.S. officials said. The military intelligence directorate he headed was separate from the Iraqi Mukhabarat, which gathered strategic intelligence and conducted covert operations aimed at maintaining government authority.

The 56-year-old Naqib told The Los Angeles Times in an interview before his surrender that he had no apologies for his involvement in Saddam's government. He also made it clear that he had not always agreed with the Iraqi leader. However, he had shared Saddam's Pan-Arabist ideas and had hope that Iraq and its military could be the force for creating an Arab nation, the Times report said.

Also captured Wednesday was Muhammad Mahdi al-Salih, the former Iraqi trade minister and No. 48 on the most wanted list. He was the six of hearts in the military's deck.

KHALID MOHAMMED/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Local Iraqis plead with U.S. Marines during a standoff yesterday, in Kut, 100 miles south of Baghdad.

Also Wednesday, allied special operations troops captured a Mukhabarat officer formerly in charge of American operations, a senior U.S. official said.

Jim Wilkinson, director of strategic communications for U.S. Central Command, identified the prisoner as Salim Said Khalaf al-Jumayli. He was not among the 55 most wanted.

Al-Jumayli is suspected of having knowledge of Iraqi intelligence activities in the United States, including names of people spying for Iraq, Wilkinson said in a statement from Doha, Qatar.

He offered no details about how the Iraqi was captured but said there was one Iraqi casualty during the operation. No Americans were hurt, he said.

Preventative measures are more constructive than hysteria

The World Health Organization issued a warning yesterday, advising travelers to curtail worldwide trips when possible to prevent further spread of the deadly SARS virus.

The advisory, aimed more specifically at Beijing, China's Shanxi province and Toronto, Canada, is expected to hold for three weeks, a period double the virus' incubation time, with the intent of focusing more directly on its transmission and better ways to prevent it.

"Recommending, as a measure of precaution, that persons planning to travel to these destinations consider postponing all but essential travel," reads a statement on the WHO website.

"The WHO travel advice is issued in order to protect public health and reduce opportunities for further international spread."

On the heels of last week's – though, by now, largely forgotten – announcements of a change in the national terror alert, Americans both at home and traveling abroad have been drawn out of their daily lives and raised to a new sense of awareness. At every step there's another caution flag: on every broadcast, another anchor waving us down with all the information we should be afraid of.

And what, exactly, is that?

There's little to discount the SARS virus as a legitimate concern; its means of transmission are so uncertain, so obscured as of now – it's the right course of action to prevent rather than hastily react.

But there's little in the way of knowing why it's such a concern. It's the same old story – we're being told to run from something we don't know.

It's times like these that rumors spread more readily than information, often enough traded as fact. And with the indication that the virus has been contracted in Toronto – a locale far more urgent than the original outbreaks that stemmed from China last year – it's placed an additional immediacy around the situation.

What we do know is that SARS has killed at least 251 worldwide and infected more than 4,200 more since it appeared. We know that it has closed schools in Beijing.

We don't know how to cure it, and in the meantime, we should educate rather than hastily react; and speak in preventative terms rather than nervous ones.

There is nothing that can be done at this time except take common sense pre-cautions. Hysteria over a virus that we have no control over at this point doesn't help anyone. Our focus should be on carrying on with our daily lives with just a little more hygienic conscience.

Like moths to a flame

Scott Eldridge II

Starting around 8 p.m. a potent fire ripped through one of the oldest buildings on campus, a wooden building used for metal related art courses that dated some 100-years-old. The building, which housed the projects and materials of metal fabricating art students (if that's even a classification), was virtually hollowed by the inferno. Fueled by some welding chemicals, and propelled further by a series of explosions, the fire pulled four local fire departments to the scene. Ninety minutes later it was under control and the crowds dissipated.

The crowds – hundreds of students poured out of their dorms to check out the blaze. The initial shock packed the hill and parking lot behind Health Services and the Durfee Conservatory.

Following the pop of an explosion and the sprinkle of glass from the building only 100 yards away, the crowd pushed forward not backward.

"We're not going to get hurt, we're too far back," said one girl. Apparently the drizzle of lit embers floating gracefully above her and the dozen of onlookers completing her viewing circle escaped her gaze.

Another student, watching from the edge of the UHS lot classified the towering flames as "cool" and the same explosion elicited an astounding "whoa!" Hardly what I was expecting from what, to me, was a potential disaster.

"I was expecting more from the collapse," said one resident of my dorm, now turning back – seemingly disappointed from the apparent end of the blaze.

"That's the old building, right?" asked one onlooker. "Yeah it's been condemned for years," his friend coolly replied. No worries, the building was old, he said – condemned even– it warranted the spectator sport mentality.

"Separated emotionally - not their work, not their building - the crowds surrounding the scene seemed to follow the trend with destructive news."

It was old – over a century on its footing – but it was not condemned. Instead it was the daily home of a group of art students who honed their skills with metal work and welding and all the other fabrication techniques far beyond my understanding.

Maybe ignorance is bliss, not knowing what purpose the "Conservation Building" served I may have been able to remark on the flames, the blasts, the collapse of walls and a roof.

"Was anybody hurt," asked a cautious observer the day after – judging his sensitivity accordingly.

"No."

"That was a cool fire then."

The general desensitized reply.

Separated emotionally – not their work, not their building – the crowds surrounding the scene seemed to follow the trend of all destructive news. As long as no one is hurt, or killed, a fire is cool.

As long as it isn't your car, your house, your family, it is fine to stand by and watch, and remark at how fantastic or how impressive the display.

Enough distance between you and the fire – perhaps the mileage from here to Rhode Island – makes disaster the butt of crude jokes and disconnected banter.

There seemed to be actual disappointment when the flames started to die down and the fire departments gained control. Let down, hoping for more of a display or more problems, whatever the reason it seemed that people were upset.

Flames died and interest went with it.

Back to the dorms, back to parties in rooms.

A day later, charred remains held the attention of only a few fire inspectors, detectives and a smattering of workers checking the aftermath after missing the action.

Weak effort by SCERA

Jamie Loo

So the rumors are true. They're back.

When I arrived home the other day, my engineering roommate (who could care less about the rest of the campus because she's an engineer) tossed a set of flyers at me from who she assumed were "SGA people." I looked at the flyers and was surprised to see that they came from the Student Center for Research and Advocacy (SCERA). SCERA helped to organize students last year around fighting the budget cuts and helped to organize the big Save UMass rally on the State House steps last year. Since then, I've heard very little about the agency's efforts aside from the occasional article in The Collegian.

My question is, where have they been for the past year?

After the Save UMass rally last April, students on the Amherst campus were aware and mobilized for anything up ahead. The end of the school year and the summer slowed down this momentum. But I had faith that once September rolled around, SCERA, Save Umass, and other groups would jump into action again. It made sense to me that they would capitalize on the energy left over from last semester to keep the pressure on our senators and representatives in State House. But they didn't.

And now, just days away from another planned demonstration at the State House, many students are just hearing about it for the first time.

"It's not like SCERA is a poor, start-up RSO or cash-starved entity of the SGA that needs RAs or other people to fund their activities."

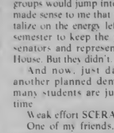
Weak effort SCERA. Weak.

One of my friends, who is an RA, said SCERA has made some attempts to do educational dorm events; however at the expense of the RAs. SCERA has asked RAs to organize the events, possibly buy food from their RA activity budgets and then SCERA will show up and do a spiel about the organization. Basically, RAs are being told to do all the work and SCERA will show up as special guests.

It's not like SCERA is a poor, start-up RSO or cash-starved entity of the SGA that needs RAs or other people to fund their activities. SCERA gets funding each year from the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF) to pay a few undergraduates to organize other students to advocate for the student body. A portion of our student fees this year, have gone to paying not only these particular students but also to fund the organization itself. I think the student body got a raw deal here; we paid for what to me, looks like a wasted year.

Don't get me wrong, I strongly believe in the mission statement of SCERA. I think it's great that we have an agency dedicated solely to empowering students on campus to advocate on the behalf of UMass and to encourage political activities such as voting. However, it seems that SCERA has fallen short of its mission this year and it's a damn shame.

A few years ago, some senators in the SGA proposed that we disband SCERA and use the money that funds the agency for other campus groups. SCERA at that time was barely functioning and was just allocating monies for small events. The saving grace of SCERA was a round of budget cuts, which convinced senators that we needed the organization more than ever to make sure the cuts didn't go any deeper. Which we honestly did, and SCERA rose to the challenge last year and proved those senators wrong. For the first time in years, SCERA was fulfilling its mission and mobilizing the student body to advocate for themselves, instead of depending on President Bulger and the trustees.



And yet all has been silence. SCERA organized two voter registration drives earlier this year, however this past week was the first time in months that I've heard of the group doing anything. It might be too little, too late, especially with a large demonstration looming next week. At this point it might be better not to rally, instead of sending a handful of students to Boston compared to the thousand we sent last year. It's pitiful. Romney will look out the corner office window and think UMass students don't care, as he comes up with another scheme to reorganize higher education.

I hate to discourage the concept of rallying at the State House because I think it did a lot of good last year. But I think this year there wasn't enough build up to it, or enough information to get students sufficiently concerned about the future of the school. SCERA could be a great organization if run efficiently, however if the organization continues on this track, the money may be better used for other groups in the future.

I could be wrong. Possibly there will be thousands of people at the State House on Tuesday, in which case I will eat this column and declare myself unworthy in a Wayne's World-like gesture. But for now I'll continue to lament about another campus organization, with a very important unfulfilled mission.

Basebrawl: National pastime no more

Matt Elder

Recently the acts of certain athletes in the game of baseball have been disgusting. These acts are the reason that baseball is no longer considered a pastime, as it's taken on a whole new number as what people are watching. The latest peek to get mad at baseball over ended that one, began in Los Angeles between the Dodgers. However,

Hockey – surprisingly for two teams far fought – and basketball is only second to the entire game of athlete. Rip Artest is pounding the next Dennis Rodman. Baseball, however, is still going to be the game of thugs and I'm not just talk[ing] about the fights. I bet $100 on a player to beaten senseless across the[ir] dugout while the Kansas City Royals were batting. Two drug and alcohol crazed fans attacked the Royals' first base coach and one of the men was yielding a knife.

Now happening this year in Oakland, was a fan throwing a cell phone at former Red Sox and current Rangers outfield Carl Everett. It ended up hitting him in the head. I am by no means president of the Carl Everett fan club, but come on here. Some officials are talking of banning cell phones from stadiums, but that's impossible and everyone knows it.

If this first trip back to Chicago "the South side" for baseball fans umpire Taz Diaz was attacked late in the game by a fan, assistant. It didn't take long for players of both teams to restrain the fan and rightfully so since a lot of players got cheap shots in as the fan was being held down. TV cameras showed him getting into the police car bandaged and bloodied.

Fans aren't the only ones out of control. Players need to get a grip. Recently Tino Martinez of the St Louis Cardinals one of the most mild mannered players in baseball charged at Diamondbacks pitcher Miguel Batista five minutes after he was hit by a pitch. Of course a brawl ensued. Years and years ago brawls were a once every other month thing and only happened if a player was hit in the head or something similar. Now there's always a brawl every other week or so, and a few during spring training (supposed to be their practice games).

Baseball is no longer our nation's past time. Increasing salaries and ticket prices (the Red Sox are the most expensive team to watch where a family of four can get to a game for maybe $200 sitting in the bleachers) have made the games go down in quality. Teams are expanding rosters are expanding, muscles are expanding and therefore, prices are expanding. Long gone are the days where a family bored on a Saturday can head to the ballpark for a few hours and watch a game.

"Brawls are erupting like at a bar, and the fans are drunk enough for that atmosphere."

As talks of steroids increase it makes fans wonder how clean the game is now. No longer is 50 homeruns a milestone. It's only a stat now. 100 RBIs is nothing you need to get 140 to be great. The competition isn't any good. The Yankees are the best again, and might buy more talent. Every four or five years we hear mumblings of a strike. Last year's All-Star game, a game that's supposed to be one of the best nights in baseball, ended in a tie because all of the pitchers were used up after pitching one inning each.

We have pitchers getting paid $1 million to pitch to a leftie in the 8th inning of a close game. Teams have bullpens with more people than Southwest Everyone is specialized, which is funny, considering the.

Yankees have three more home runs then the Tigers have runs.

Baseball isn't family oriented anymore. It's television oriented. Fans rush the field, willing to pay the small fine, to end up on Sportscenter. Players swing for the fences on a 0-2 count trying to be heroes. The sacrifice fly, something players used to be taught how to do and some were great at it, is a disappointing at bat for some people. Brawls are erupting like at a bar, and the fans are drunk enough for that atmosphere.

It's all disappointing, and it all contributes to why TV ratings are down the World Series isn't interesting, and teams like the Athletics and Braves (playoff teams a year ago) stadiums are half full. We need to cap player's salaries, not teams salaries, and we need to contact the teams who are in dire need of it.

I can only hope that in my lifetime I will see baseball where it was before I watched it. The quality was better, and it was more accessible to the fans. Now it's a bunch of over priced pansies wearing armor to bat (Barry Bonds) and complain at anything on the inner half of the plate. I'm glad most of the greatest players of all time are passed away, because true baseball fans wouldn't want them seeing this.

Drama, THRILLER & action

THE MATRIX: RELOADED

The long-awaited newest Matrix installment brings back Keanu Reeves and Laurence Fishburne as rebels who discover that they have 72 hours to find Zion and destroy its inhabitants. The film introduces new characters, like Jada Pinkett-Smith's Niobe as well as new conflicts and high-energy action. (May 15)

THE ITALIAN JOB

In what looks to be the next big action movie, Mark Wahlberg, Charlize Theron, Jason Statham, Seth Green and others take on Edward Norton and his buddies after he rips them off after a heist. This movie looks like it could be the next "Snatch." With a great cast, and a fast paced plot, this looks to be a big summer movie. (May 30)

WRONG TURN

"Buffy, the Vampire Slayer's" Eliza Dushku leads the cast of pretty young things targeted by a band of deformed, inbred cannibals when they make, well, a wrong turn in rural West Virginia. The legendary Stan Winston is handling make-up, and yes, this is yet another film that supposedly mimics late 70s shockers ("House of 1000 Corpses" and this fall's "Texas Chainsaw Massacre" remake being the others). (May 30)

PROZACNATION

The Miramax release, based on the best-selling Elizabeth Wurtzel novel, has an all-star cast. Christina Ricci, Jason Biggs, Jessica Lange, Anne Heche and Dawson's Creek alum, Michelle Williams star in this mid-1980's exploration of a Harvard first-year's bout with depression before the convenient availability of anti-depressants. (June 6)

FAMILY entertainment

POKEMON HEROES

The fifth installment of the Pokemon series, takes place in a mysterious city on the water. The film also introduces two new characters to the Pokemon family, Latias and Latios. (May 16)

FINDING NEMO

This is the next Disney/Pixar collaboration, starring a bunch of, well, fish. Nemo, a young clownfish, has been kidnapped, and his father must travel to Sydney, Australia to find him. Helped along the way by several fish, vegetarian sharks and some gnarly sea turtles, this movie looks to be a wet, wild ride for parents and kids alike. (May 30)

RUGRATS GO WILD

Get ready, the Rugrats are back for their third movie! Joined by the Wild Thornberrys (in their second feature length film) something amazing happens. Spike talks to Eliza. Voiced by Bruce Willis, the world will finally know what Spike thinks. This film should be fun for the whole family. (June 13)

FROM JUSTIN TO KELLY

You can only put it one way: it's the "American Idol" movie, with original idols Kelly Clarkson and Justin Guarini starring. Let's hope this is more "Grease," less "Grease 2." (June 13)

SPY KIDS 3-D: GAME OVER

Robert Rodriguez utilizes the same Hi-Def digital technology that George Lucas used for "Star Wars: Episode 2" for his third go round in the popular kiddie franchise. This time the pint-sized secret agents are battling an evil toy maker (Sylvester Stallonet and this time, their in 3-D! But will families embrace the movie after so many spy movies – for kids and adults – have popped up over this past couple of years? (July 25)

A look at the upcoming summer flicks

when one of Nick's (Black) get-rich-quick ideas actually succeeds. Nick's success brings out the green monster of jealousy in Jim (Stiller). The conflict is further instigated by a drifter, played by Walken (June 6)

HOLLYWOOD HOMICIDE
Harrison Ford and Josh Hartnett are two Los Angeles homicide detectives who moonlight as a real estate agent and yoga instructor respectively. The detectives investigate the slaying of a rap group, whose label executive has been rumored to have killed artists who have backed out on their contracts. In another twist, the head of the label executive's security is a former LAPD officer (June 13)

WHEN HARRY MET LLOYD: DUMB & DUMBER
Not "Another Teen Movie" co-star Eric Christian Olsen and newcomer Derek Richardson take over the respective roles Jim Carrey and Jeff Daniels played in this prequel set in high school. Eugene Levy lends support as the school's shady principal, with Cheri Oteri as Levy's cafeteria-lady lover. (June 13)

ALEX & EMMA
Loosely based on an anecdote from the life of author Fyodor Dostoyevsky (the movie was once titled "Loosely Based On A True Love Story"), Rob Reiner's romance stars Luke Wilson as a novelist who must write a novel in 30 days to pay off gambling debts and newly minted romantic comedy queen Kate Hudson as the stenographer he hires to help him write it. (June 20)

JOHNNY ENGLISH
Starring Rowan Atkinson, of "Mr. Bean" Fame, as well as John Malkovich and Natalie Imbruglia in her screen debut, Johnny English is a spoof of a spy thriller. Comic bumbles that risk national security are to be expected. (July 18)

HOW TO DEAL
Mandy Moore stars in her fifth movie (and third so far to be released) as a young women whose faith in love is shaken by her parents' separation and her best friend's pregnancy. Then she meets newcomer Trent Ford. Allison Janney and Peter Gallagher co-star. Moore made quite an impression thanks to 2002's sweet "A Walk To Remember;" let's hope she doesn't fumble in her second leading role. (July 18)

AMERICAN WEDDING
Are you ready for a third helping of pie? Perpetually embarrassed Jim (Jason Biggs) and kinky girlfriend Michelle (Alyson Hannigan) are getting married, and most of the gang's here to see them walk down the aisle. Eugene Levy and Seann William Scott (as forever horny Stifler) also return, in a movie directed by Bob Dylan's son, Jesse. (Aug 1)

THE BOSS' DAUGHTER
Ashton Kutcher is asked to housesit for boss Terrence Stamp, and sees it as his chance to get closer to Stamp's beautiful daughter, Tara Reid. Then houseguests Andy Richter and Molly Shannon show up in a comedy directed by David Zucker (of "Airplane" fame) and written by "Anger Management's" David Dorfman. (Aug 22)

MARCI X
This long delayed comedy stars Lisa Kudrow as a quote-unquote "Jewish American Princess" who inherits a hardcore rap label. Damon Wayans plays the uncontrollable rap star she must learn to control. (Aug 22)

Drama, thrills and chills to hit theatres this summer willing to bulk, the actor declined to participate and original director Rob Cohen followed suit. Now it's up to Paul Walker (the only returning cast member) and "Boyz N The Hood" director John Singleton to see if the can rev up the audience's engines again. This time Walker's young cop, now badgeless and on the run in Miami after letting Diesel's character go, must infiltrate a smuggling operation to redeem himself. Model-actor-rapper Tyrese (this time plays his partner in crime, Cole Hauser does the bad guy thing this go-round and Eva Mendes and newcomer Devon Aoki provide token love interests and eye candy. (June 6)

LOVE THE HARD WAY
A petty thief falls in love with an innocent woman. This romantic drama is notable for the fact its Adrien Brody's first film following his surprise Oscar win. (June 6)

THE HULK
Adapted from the popular Marvel Comic series, "The Hulk" is one of the most anticipated movies coming out this summer. Dr. Bruce Banner (Eric Bana) is exposed to a lethal dose of gamma radiation, but instead of dying, he turns into the monster/super hero the Hulk. This summer, expect planes, tanks, the army and bulk dogs to take on the Hulk. "The Hulk" also stars Jennifer Connelly as Dr. Betty Ross, Nick Nolte as Dr. David Banner and is directed by Ang Lee. (June 20)

28 DAYS LATER
Animal rights activists accidentally unleash a deadly virus that wipes out most of London and leaves the unlucky survivors to battle the flesh-eating undead in "Trainspotting" director Danny Boyle's shot-on-video chiller, written by Alex Garland (whose novel "The Beach" Boyle previously turned into a movie.) (June 27)

CABIN FEVER
Could Eli Roth's low-budget indie horror flick be the next "Blair Witch Project?" David Lynch gave his stamp of approval to Roth so it's quite possible that the movie some film festival patrons have declared as truly horrifying, may be our next horror hit. Once again, it's young people being stalked in the woods, but the killer here is a ghastly flesh-eating virus. Prepared to be disgusted, if not frightened. (June)

THE LEGEND OF SURIYOTHAI
Written and directed by Chatrichalerm Yukol, The Legend of Suriyothai is a historical epic. With a plot that spans nearly 60 years, the tale traces the political history of the Kingdom of Ayothaya. The film takes place in the 16th century, making for elaborate aesthetics as well as brutal combat. (June 20)

SINBAD: LEGEND OF THE SEVEN SEAS
Featuring the voices of Brad Pitt, Catherine Zeta-Jones and Joseph Fiennes, this animated feature takes some license with the content of the original seven stories of Sinbad. The film introduces two characters, Eris (Zeta-Jones), the Grecian goddess of Chaos and Proteus (Fiennes), the god of the sea. (July 2)

PIRATES OF THE CARRIBEAN: THE CURSE OF THE BLACK PEARL
Hopefully it will be better than "The Country Bears." Another Disney theme park ride gets turned into a movie, this time as a part-swashbuckling/ part-supernatural adventure produced by none other than Jerry Bruckheimer. "The Ring's" Gore Verbinski directs, Johnny Depp plays the drunken hero Jack Swann, shiny new heartthrob Orlando Bloom is the blacksmith who hires him to save his beloved (Keira Knightley) and Rush plays the skeletal bad guy after a magical pendant Knightley holds. (July 9)

THE LEAGUE OF EXTRAORDINARY GENTLEMEN
"Prepare for the extraordinary" in this movie based on the comic by Alan Moore. Now famous figures from contemporary literature form a team of heroes to save the world from madmen bent on world domination. The group includes Allan Quartermain (Sean Connery), Dorian Gray (Stuart Townsend), Mrs. Mina Murray Harker (Peta Wilson), Detective Thomas "Tom" Sawyer (Shane West) and others. (July 11)

THE EXORCIST: BEGINNINGS
Okay, so making a fourth "Exorcist" film is a dicey proposition. Yet (this prequel), which follows a young Father Merrin (here played by Stellan Skarsgaard) battling the demon Pazuzu in the recesses of Africa, looks like it may be interesting. Paul Schrader, of "Autofocus" and "Taxi Driver" fame, directs; acclaimed novelist Caleb Carr co-wrote the script. (July 18)

SEABISCUIT
Tobey Maguire follows up his star-making turn in Spider-Man with a truth-based period drama about an unlikely racehorse that becomes a star. Maguire plays Seabiscuit's jockey, with brand new Oscar winner Chris Cooper as the trainer. Yes, this is based on the unlikely non-fiction bestseller. (July 25)

MASKED AND ANONYMOUS
Bob Dylan takes his first acting role in years in an epic post-apocalyptic ensemble drama that is rumored to have been written by the singer himself. The story casts Dylan as Jack Fate, a singer who is sprung from jail for a benefit concert. The huge cast includes Allan Quartermain (Sean Connery), Dorian Gray (Stuart Townsend), Mrs. Mina Murray Harker (Peta Wilson), Detective Thomas "Tom" Sawyer (Shane West) and others. (July 11)

GIGLI
Also known as "Tough Love" (a permanent title is still being debated), this thriller is the movie on which tabloid couple Ben Affleck and Jennifer Lopez met. Both actors play hitmen, but will audiences be sick of the "Ben-and-Jen Show" by the time the movie comes out? (Aug 1)

S.W.A.T.
Yet another old TV show hits the big screen: Colin Farrell, Samuel L. Jackson, Michelle Rodriguez and J.J. Cool J are S.W.A.T. Team members who must prevent a criminal genius (Olivier Martinez) from escapine their possession. There are two directions this movie can go: "The Fugitive" (a good thing) or "The Mod Squad" (gulp!) Let's pray for the former. (Aug 8)

FREDDY VS. JASON
At long last it's here – the movie horror fans have been drooling over for more than a decade is finally seeing the light of a movie screen. "Bride of Chucky" director Ronny Yu updates the horror universe mythology by pitting burn-scarred Freddy (once again played by Robert Englund) against hockey-masked Jason over the right to slaughter Elm Street's prettiest teens. Monica Keena, Jason Ritter (son of John) and Destiny's Child Kelly Rowland are among the young, potential mincemeat for the scare flick titans. (Aug 15)

HIGHWAYMEN
In what could quite possibly become the summer's biggest scary sleeper, Jim Caviezel stars as a vengeful widower out to takedown a serial killer who uses a classic muscle car to run down lonely women along the highway. The director is Robert Harmon, known for his chilling 80s thriller "The Hitcher" and, most recently, "They." Buzz has already linked "Highwaymen" as this year's "Joy Ride." (Aug 27)

JEEPERS CREEPERS 2
The first film did reasonably well when it was released on this weekend two years ago – even breaking records as the biggest Labor Day debut ever. Now we get a second helping of the winged demon the Creeper as he looks for more juicy organs to eat – and he has set his sight on a stranded busload of high school jocks and cheerleaders. Victor Silva encores as writer/ director. (Aug 29)

Dixie Chicks fire back at critics, say they've been target of threats

By JOHN GEROME
Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) - Dixie Chicks' lead singer Natalie Maines says she spoke against President Bush and war with Iraq last month out of frustration and regrets her choice of words, but she makes no apologies for thinking critically.

"I'm not truly embarrassed that, you know, President Bush is from my state, that's not really what I care about," Maines says in an interview with ABC's Diane Sawyer for "Primetime Thursday," airing 10 p.m. EDT Thursday. "It was the wrong wording with genuine emotion and questions and concern behind it. ... Am I sorry that I asked questions and that I just don't follow? No."

At a March 10 concert in London, Maines told the audience in reference to Bush's push for military action against Iraq: "Just so you know, we're ashamed the president of the United States is from Texas."

Maines and the Texas-based trio's other members – Emily Robison and Martie Maguire, who are sisters – also tell Sawyer the fallout was too harsh for the offense and they've always supported U.S. troops even though they questioned the war.

"We know some of our fans were shocked and ... and upset, and we are compassionate to that," Maguire said. "My problem is, when does it cross the line? ... When is writing a threatening letter OK?"

Robison says she has received death threats and is concerned about her family's safety.

"You know, at our concerts this year we have to have metal detectors, and to me that's just crazy," she said. "But we have to take those precautions because this thing has gotten so out of control."

The interview airs a week before they begin their U.S. tour May 1 in Greenville, S.C., and they appear nude on the May 5 issue of Entertainment Weekly, with epithets such as "Traitors" and "Saddam's Angels" written on their bodies.

The Dixie Chicks declined a request to be interviewed by The Associated Press.

After Maines' remarks, radio stations began boycotting the Dixie Chicks, even though she publicly apologized for her statement in London.

The song "Travelin' Soldier," which was No. 1 on Billboard's country charts around the time Maines made the remark, tumbled completely off the charts afterward.

And sales of the group's latest CD, "Home," plummeted, according to Nielsen SoundScan, which tracks music sales.

For the week ending March 9, "Home" sold 146,000 copies. By March 23 it had fallen to 72,000 and by April 13 to 33,000. The most recent figures, for the week ending April 20, show a slight rebound to 45,000.

Even with the slide, however, "Home" remains the top-selling album on the Billboard country chart – 19 weeks at No. 1 – and No. 30 on the pop chart.

Most of the shows on their tour had already sold out before Maines' comments. Their agent, Rob Light, head of the music division at Creative Artists Agency, was unavailable for comment Wednesday but told Billboard this week that of the 59 shows, only six have seats left and those are all 85 percent to 90 percent sold.

Other entertainers have weighed in on Maines' remarks, with country singer Travis Tritt saying "harsh words and half-baked opinions" about the war damages troop morale.

But singer Vince Gill said: "There are political leaders that have said a lot worse things about George Bush than Natalie did. I kind of feel like she's been bashed enough."

Bruce Springsteen posted a statement on his Web site supporting the group: "For them to be banished wholesale from radio stations ... is un-American."

In Entertainment Weekly, Maines says she went through a range of emotions once the backlash started.

"It sort of felt like how people say it is when someone dies, how you go through every stage – angry, disappointed, confused. Some days I just feel proud."

Maines also said that when she saw rescued soldier Jessica Lynch's parents on television, she became "really emotional to think they might think we're not happy for them and that we don't support their daughter."

Robison says the controversy hasn't fractured the group as some might have assumed.

"Natalie's comments came from a place of frustration that we all shared – we were apparently days away from war and still left with a lot of questions," Robison said.

The Dixie Chicks have come under some criticism lately after remarks that lead singer Natalie Maines made regarding the war in Iraq.

Snacking enhances your memory performance

No, scientists haven't claimed anything of the sort; not that I can remember, at least. But where would our food-loving nation be without snacks? It seems like no matter where you go and what you do, there's someone out there to get you to try and eat something. And since most of us are beginning to get ready to study for finals, wouldn't it be lovely to find one more excuse to maximize procrastination? Surely, you can't think on an empty stomach, so break out the chocolate and the popcorn and have a go at these quick and easy recipes for study snacks.

Caramel Corn
1 bag unbuttered, unsalted popcorn
1 paper grocery bag
1/3 cup light corn syrup
2/3 cup brown sugar
1/2 cup butter
1 tsp. baking soda

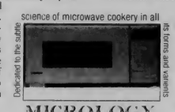
Prepare popcorn according to package instructions and set aside to cool. Scoop popped kernels into grocery bag and roll sides down to make life easier on yourself when you have to add the caramel in the third step.

Microwave butter, sugar, corn syrup and salt in a two-quart bowl for three minutes on HIGH or until boiling. Stir and microwave for another two minutes, stirring after each additional minute.

Stir in baking soda and pour the hot caramel over the popcorn. Roll bag closed, and microwave for two minutes. Shake bag like a paint mixer in an earthquake and allow caramel corn to cool before consuming.

Failure to do so will result in horrible mouth sores, the like of which you've never seen.

Peanut Butter Bars
1 cup peanut butter
1 12oz. bag chocolate chips
2 sticks butter or margarine
2 1/2 cups powdered sugar
1 3/4 cups graham cracker crumbs
2 tbsp. butter or margarine



Microwave peanut butter and two sticks of butter in a two-quart microwave bowl. Nuke on high for 40 seconds or until soft. Stir.

The peanut butter mixture shouldn't be melted at this point; also, it doesn't matter which type of peanut butter you use in this recipe.

Combine graham cracker crumbs and powdered sugar. Press into a nine-inch pie pan or nine-inch square, baking pan. Now this to me seems like faulty information because without shortening to act as an adhesive, the powered graham cracker crumbs will still be loose enough to fly out of the pan with the slightest breeze from an oscillating fan.

Combine chocolate chips, two tablespoons butter and peanut butter mixture. Microwave for three minutes on medium high or until melted.

Stir until smooth and spread the chocolate peanut butter mixture over the crumb dust. Refrigerate for at least a half hour before cutting into the pan and serving. Keep refrigerated.

As a final note to these recipes or any other microwave candy confections. Only use a candy thermometer that has been regulated for use at extremely high temperatures. Trying to test corn syrup with a normal thermometer will cause it to shatter and leave shards of glass and whatnot in your candy. And you wouldn't want to be known as that creepy person who likes to hide glass in candy and serves to neighborhood children now would you?

Also, when melting chocolate in any recipe remember that if any drop of water comes in contact with the melted chocolate, it will "seize" and become a gigantic, grainy inedible lump. To keep the chocolate smooth, add a shortening such as butter, vegetable oil or margarine.

It's a common formula: Golden girls and City

The salacious HBO show "Sex and the City" has been heralded by critics and audiences alike as the first show to take on issues affecting women and to have characters that women can actually relate to. But if you think about it, "Sex and the City" is just a push-up bra version of "The Golden Girls."

Just break it down. Each show follows the same premise: four single female friends living and losing in a big city (New York and Miami respectively).

The dilemma for the women on both shows is also the same: To find a relationship with a man that is as meaningful and fulfilling as their friendships with each other.

On each show, the friends have a designated meeting place. For Blanche, Rose, Dorothy and Sophia ("The Golden Girls"), it's the kitchen table where they gossip about love, sex and men. A diner is the hot spot for Samantha, Charlotte, Miranda and Carrie ("Sex and the City") to recap their wild nights and sexy mornings.

Both shows also have their ladies indulging in guilty pleasures – cheesecake for the golden girls and cosmopolitans for the city ladies.

One major issue that both shows champion is the fact that women can be sexy no matter what age. Society seems to think that women can only be beautiful up until their 20s, but these shows have women in their late 30s ("Sex and the City") and 60s ("Golden Girls"), showing that women can be sexy no matter how many candles on the cake.

When it comes to the characters, the creators of "Sex and the City" seem to have just dusted off the old recipe used by the creative minds behind "The Golden Girls." It seems all the ingredients you need for ratings heaven are a slut, a cynic, a saint and a surveyor.

Dorothy Zbornak (Beatrice Arthur) is the cynic on "The Golden Girls." Her character is a headstrong, career-oriented woman who always has a tough time in the romance department. Miranda Hobbes (Cynthia Nixon) marks her counterpart on "Sex and the City." She too is a career-minded woman with love hardships.

Blanche Deveraux (Rue McClanahan) is the slut on "The Golden Girls." She is the southern sex-crazed belle who has a hard time with the concept of monogamy. Samantha Jones (Kim Cattrall) takes this role on "Sex and the City." She is a northern sex-crazed socialite who is also repelled by monogamy.

Rose Nylon (Betty White) is the saint on "The Golden Girls." Her character is a naive, small-town girl living in a big city. She still believes in love conquering all. Charlotte York (Kristen Davis) is the saint on "Sex and the City." She too is a naive, small-town girl living in a big city who still believes she will find her prince charming.

Sophia Petrillo (Estelle Getty) is the surveyor on "The Golden Girls." She is the anchor for all of the friends and the one the girls share their problems with. Her remedy is to give advice with anecdotes. Carrie Bradshaw (Sarah Jessica Parker) is the surveyor on "Sex and the City." Also the anchor for all her friends, she listens to their troubles and gives advice. However, Carrie saves her anecdotes for her columns.

The reason that this formula works is because together each of these characters possesses the qualities that would make up the ideal woman.

The reason the "Golden Girls" was groundbreaking was because it was first. The show aired during the late 80s, which was a time when a lot of subjects were considered off limits for prime time television. "Sex and the City" is airing at a time when one has to search for topics not already uncovered and exploited.

It just goes to show, in order to consider something new, you have to know what is old.

HBO's racy hit "Sex in the City" follows the tried and true formula set by "The Golden Girls."

SHOOTING STARTS IN GERMAN FILM STUDIO FOR 'AROUND THE WORLD IN 80 DAYS'

BERLIN (AP) – Filming has started in Germany's historic Babelsberg Studios outside Berlin on the latest Hollywood version of Jules Verne's "Around the World in 80 Days."

The film, starring Jim Broadbent, Jackie Chan and Kathy Bates, is being directed by Frank Coraci ("The Waterboy"). It's the first large-scale Hollywood production to be shot at the studio, and with costs running around $100 million, it's estimated to be one of the most expensive films ever made in Germany.

Filming will also take place in and around Berlin and in the eastern German border town of Goerlitz, producers said Tuesday.

The 1956 film won five Oscars, including best picture.

Founded in 1917, Babelsberg was home to prewar stars such as Marlene Dietrich and Fritz Lang. After World War II, it fell on the communist side of Berlin and became the main studio for the former East Germany.

Roman Polanski's World War II drama, "The Pianist," which won three Oscars this year, also was filmed at the Babelsberg Studios.

NBC WINS 13 SPORTS EMMYS

NEW YORK (AP) – NBC's coverage of the 2002 Winter Olympics carried the network to 13 Sports Emmys. One year after it received no awards, NBC won 11 for its coverage of the Salt Lake City Games. The 13 overall Emmys marked a record for the network, topping by one the total from 1988 and 1996, when NBC broadcast the Summer Olympics.

"Salt Lake was the best Olympics ever," NBC Sports chairman Dick Ebersol said at Monday night's awards ceremony. "There was the great American spirit, the fantastic American athletes and a fabulous effort by the NBC-TV crew, who tonight were so richly embraced by their peers in the creative community." Compelling story lines about U.S. athletes in Salt Lake City dominated the 24th annual awards ceremony. NBC won awards for features on skeleton gold medalist Jim Shea and injured skier Bill Johnson.

The network also won awards for outstanding live sports special, editing, writing, music and several technical awards from the games. The award for studio host went to Bob Costas, for both HBO and NBC.

NBC's two other awards were for its NBA coverage and a special, "America's Heroes: The Bravest vs. the Finest," about a football game between New York firefighters and police officers who honored colleagues killed in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Recipients were judged by panels of peers in 28 categories.

The lifetime achievement award went to Roone Arledge, the ABC executive who launched "Monday Night Football" and oversaw expanded coverage of the Olympics; he died of cancer Dec. 5 at 71.

JUDGE DENIES SONY PICTURES REQUEST TO KEEP LAWSUIT SEALED

LOS ANGELES (AP) – A Superior Court judge rejected a request by Sony Pictures Entertainment to seal documents in a lawsuit that Marvel comics filed over Spider-Man.

Judge Alexander H. Williams III on Monday also rejected a Sony request to refer the case to private arbitration rather than a jury trial.

Williams said there was no evidence an open proceeding in the breach of contract and license merchandising lawsuit would hurt either side.

"I don't want to insult anyone," he said, "but this is a relatively routine, garden-variety contract dispute."

Phone messages left after business hours for Marvel attorney Carole E. Handler and Sony attorney Patricia L. Glaser weren't returned.

The New York-based comic book company sued Sony Pictures on Feb. 25, under seal, which means the lawsuit's contents aren't accessible to the general public.

Sony released last summer's megahit "Spider-Man," which collected nearly $403 million at the U.S. box office to become 2002's highest-grossing movie.

Marvel claimed Sony "cross-promoted" the superhero character in violation of their contract. Marvel also claimed that Sony reneged on agreements to use Sony companies to promote "Spider-Man" characters.

Montbleau charms on indie release

By Daniel Bourgeois
Collegian Correspondent

Somewhere in Boston tonight, at the bar or general area of some restaurant, a young man is quietly going to be setting up his equipment while the surrounding people continue to drink and mingle.

Most of these people have no idea who this mild-mannered 25-year-old is and are not there to see him play. As he takes his seat, picks up his guitar and introduces himself, in a very quiet, laidback tone, the people continue on as if he is not even there. Then he plays the opening riffs, his left foot starts to thump on the leg of the stool he is sitting on and he belts out the opening lines of whatever song he decides to start out with, possibly Zeppelin's "Going to California," The Beatle's "Blackbird" or maybe one of his originals. By the time he has sung the first few verses, conversations have stopped and eyes are transfixed on tonight's entertainment. Some linger longer than others, perhaps throughout his whole set, but for one moment in time, he has everyone's undivided attention. This crowd has just witnessed what the rest of the music world soon will…Ryan Montbleau.

By the end of tonight's set, Ryan Montbleau (pronounced Mont-bloo) will have a new batch of fans and will have sold and signed several copies of his debut album "Begin." "Begin," is a stunning twelve-song, independently released album full of barstool longing and more deep grooves than the yellow lot behind the Mullins Center. The album dips into a wide variety of musical styles, including folk, blues, reggae, funk, soul and acoustic singer/songwriter rock. The beauty of the disc is in how cleverly and effortlessly Montbleau weaves these styles together. With a guitar style similar to John Mayer and a voice that is vaguely reminiscent of Stevie Wonder in his prime, Montbleau takes all of these things and transforms them into his very own style. The result is an album that displays the strengths of an abundantly talented new artist that could easily give pop radio's elite a run for their money.

Within moments of pressing play on the CD player, you're immediately sucked in by the opening lines of the upbeat, acapella track "City" where he confesses his desires to move on to the big city and the bigger things that it may have in store for him. This truly sets the tone for the album – clever, unpredictable, and undeniably enjoyable.

The album's standout track is "Variety," a solo acoustic song about wanting to experience all that this life has to offer. "Open my eyes and make me wonder/ Show me all there is to see/ Give me music, give more people/ Dirty magazines and poetry/ Give me variety in all its forms/ Give me everything then give me more," he sings with the type of passion and sincerity that comes from deep within the soul, a place where most of today's artists couldn't reach even if they had a personal psychologist in their entourage.

Other brilliant tracks include "Just Perfect," a detailed and intimate account of the one that got away and "Small Doses," where he ponders his career's direction and what may become of him if he were to make it big. "All Wet" and "Roadtime Rag" are the type of songs that are best enjoyed from a hammock on a sunny Sunday afternoon, lemonade in hand.

Overall, the album remains consistent and rarely does it falter. Though it doesn't do justice to his live performance, it does serve as the next best thing. Montbleau has a knack for writing about, in vivid and crafty detail, the subjects that comprise every person's life. It is difficult to listen to "Begin," and not relate to it in some way. His lyrics come to life through both his powerfully soulful voice, and his ability to command the appropriate emotion from his acoustic guitar. The blend of musical styles provides something for everyone, but doesn't isolate the listener to the type of style they prefer.

Montbleau takes Howie Day and John Mayer's brand of singer/songwriter pop and raises the bar higher than many like-minded musicians could ever dream of reaching. As the title states, this album serves as the starting line for an extremely promising young musician and marks the beginning of what deserves to be a long, successful career of inspired and incredible music.

With two first-round picks, Pats may trade

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) – The New England Patriots have never traded two first-round draft choices for a better pick. That streak could end Saturday.

One factor is how much they want the player widely considered to be the top defensive lineman, Dewayne Robertson of Kentucky.

That's a strong position in the draft, and Robertson is a tackle, one of the Patriots' greatest needs. Only one team allowed more yards rushing and only 11 teams had fewer sacks last season when they missed the playoffs one year after winning the Super Bowl.

The Patriots have the 14th and 19th picks and already have bolstered their other defensive units.

They signed free agent linebacker Roseveh Colvin from Chicago and picked up safety Rodney Harrison off waivers from San Diego. And coach Bill Belichick would like a young tackle to take pressure off defensive tackle Richard Seymour, the sixth pick in 2001.

"There are a number of guys on the defensive line that are going to be considered pretty high on somebody's (draft) board," Belichick said. "Some guys are going to fit a lot better with some teams than others."

At Kentucky, Robertson played directly opposite the center, the same alignment the Patriots use.

So they may trade their first-round picks to Chicago for the fourth pick to take Robertson. Teams with the top three picks – Cincinnati, Detroit and Houston – are expected to take players at other positions, although the Bears also want a defensive tackle.

If the Patriots keep their picks, defensive tackles Jonathan Sullivan, who played with Seymour at Georgia, and Kevin Williams of Oklahoma State, could be available. Sullivan played over center more than Williams.

Another defensive tackle, Jimmy Kennedy of Penn State, is expected to be taken before both.

"Their skills are different and their strengths and weaknesses are different," Belichick said.

The last time the Patriots traded for a first-round pick was on the second day of last year's draft when they sent quarterback Drew Bledsoe to Buffalo for the 14th pick this year.

They also traded for a better pick in the first round last year and took tight end Daniel Graham with the 21st choice. They sent three picks to Washington, including the 52nd overall. Graham had just 15 catches and one touchdown as a rookie.

If the Patriots keep their first-rounders, they could take two defensive linemen.

"It's possible, I don't know if it's likely," Belichick said.

More likely, they would fill another need by drafting a wide receiver, preferably a tall one. Or if they're satisfied that running back Willis McGahee of Miami has recovered enough from a knee injury, they may draft him.

He would have been a much higher choice if he didn't get hurt in the Fiesta Bowl against Ohio State for the national championship.

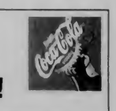
But other teams are interested after his impressive workout for NFL coaches and scouts in Coral Gables, Fla., on Tuesday, 15 weeks after reconstructive surgery on his left knee.

"We evaluate a player based on your team. We can't worry about what the rest of the league thinks about him," Belichick said. "Sometimes you end up accumulating talent, but it just doesn't fit on your team."

The Patriots' top three receivers are Troy Brown and David Patten, both 5-feet-10, and Deion Branch, who is 5-9.

So they could go for 6-0 Taylor Jacobs of Florida or 6-2 1/2 sophomore Kelley Washington of Tennessee. Washington played only four games last year, and had surgery to fuse two vertebrae in his neck, but most teams consider him to be healthy.

"We'll have to see what our medical people think about it," Belichick said.



If the Patriots take him, quarterback Tom Brady will have a target he's lacked in two seasons as a starter. And it could make the Patriots' decision to draft Brady in the sixth round in 2000 even better.

"Obviously, if we knew he'd turn out as well as he has, we should have taken him in the second round," Belichick said. "He had a lot of traits that we liked, and Tom has improved a lot since the day we drafted him."

Brady may never have gotten his chance if Bledsoe hadn't suffered a serious chest injury in the second game of 2001.

To succeed in the draft, Belichick said, "some of that's luck, some of that's definitely placing your money on guys that have things going for them, that have a chance to work out."

Wallace is Defensive Player of Year - again

By LARRY LAGE
Staff Columnist

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. (AP) – Ben Wallace of the Detroit Pistons won the NBA's Defensive Player of the Year award for the second straight season Wednesday.

Wallace became the sixth player to win the award in consecutive seasons, receiving 100 points for a total of 117 first place votes from a panel of sports writers and broadcasters. Ron Artest of Indiana, Kobe Bryant of Minnesota, Tim Duncan of San Antonio and Doug Christie of Sacramento rounded out the top five.

He received 90 points and Wallace received 3 points for 1,134 points, the highest vote total among the nine Defensive Player of the Year winners. Dennis Rodman (6-time winner, 1990-97) Wallace averaged 3.13 blocked shots per game to Artest's 2.79 blocks. Rodman averaged 3.37 block.

Sidney Moncrief, Dennis Rodman, Hakeem Olajuwon, Dikembe Mutombo and Mutombo and Moncrief also won the award in consecutive seasons.

Last year, Wallace was a nearly unanimous choice after becoming just the fourth player to lead the league in rebounding and shot blocking.

But he's pushing himself to be the most dominant defensive player in the league again this year – and love Dumas, the Pistons president of basketball operations. The hope is to see that people around the league have to game plan against him again.

Wallace's 18 rebounds a team high set Tuesday's defeat Detroit finish opponents 6-3 league low average of 87.7 points during the regular season.

The 28-year-old Wallace became the first undrafted player to be selected an All Star starter this season. He played in the game one day after his mother's funeral.

After missing two weeks with a sprained ligament in his left knee, Wallace finished with 13 rebounds and three blocked shots in the Pistons' loss to the Orlando Magic on Sunday in Game 1 of their first-round playoff series.

Before getting injured, Wallace was on pace to become the first player in NBA history to lead the league in rebounds and blocks twice. Last season, he joined Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, Bill Walton and Hakeem Olajuwon as the only players to lead in rebounds and blocks.

The seven-year NBA veteran, who went undrafted out of Virginia Union in 1996, averaged 8.9 points and helped the Pistons win their second straight Central Division title and earned the top seed in the Eastern Conference playoffs with a record of 50-32.

The Minutewomen were able to rally from a 2-0 defecit to down UConn Wednesday afternoon at the UMass Softball Complex.

Late rally leads Minutewomen past Connecticut

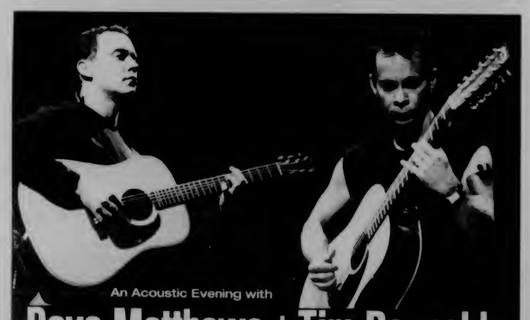
infield moved 20 feet from the plate, outfielder Anna Perry blooped a single over Schettini's head, moving two players into scorins to pad the lead.

Maroon and White Pitcher Kaila Holtz struggled early, but came on strong to finish the game with five hits, two walks and one earned g position.



With two outs and the game tied at two, Robustelli ripped a single to right, scoring two runs and giving UMass a 4-2 lead. Denis' double in the fifth scored Cross and Hilary Puglia, adding two insurance runrun allowed while racking up eight K's.

"The win is big to us, because of the rivalry," Sortino said. "A lost to UConn could have been a nail in the coffin, but the win put i going to help by [the NCAA] committee [for playoffs]. The win doesn't help us, but the loss would have killed us."

The statistics are on the Minutewomen's side, with four of their last five games at home, where they have been virtually unbeatable. With only two more A-10 games to go, Sortino is confident in her team's play heading into the home stretch.

"I liked the way we played today," Sortino replied. "We had good intense and that's the kind of momentum we need heading into a very important double header."

MLB to warn teams traveling to Toronto

By HAL BOCK
Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK (AP) – Major league baseball plans to recommend that its teams visiting Toronto take precautions against SARS, such as refraining from signing autographs and not mingling with large crowds.

The 10 teams visiting Toronto through the All-Star break in mid-July also will be advised against visiting hospitals and using public transportation.

Elliot Pellman, baseball's newly hired medical adviser, will hold conference calls Thursday and Monday with the teams to provide information and take questions about severe acute respiratory syndrome.

The Toronto Blue Jays open a nine-game homestand Friday, beginning with the Kansas City Royals.

Baseball spokesman Rich Levin said Pellman would make the calls "to settle people down" about SARS.

"He wants to bring people up to speed and to assuage their fears," Levin said. Word that baseball was taking precautions was first reported by The Washington Post.

There were no plans to postpone the games in Toronto, said Blue Jays vice president Howard Starkman, who noted that the Air Canada Center was filled for the Maple Leafs' playoff game against the Philadelphia Flyers.

"I don't think it's any different going to a ball game than going to a shopping center," Starkman said.

Baseball did call off a season-opening trip by the Seattle Mariners and Oakland Athletics to Tokyo when war broke out in Iraq. Players had expressed concern about overseas travel at that time.

The Toronto Star quoted Blue Jays president Paul Godfrey as saying that there have been cancellations of bus charters from the United States because of SARS.

Starkman said the Blue Jays' players were not being advised to avoid signing autographs.

"No, not at all. We're not saying not to sign autographs," he said.

The World Health Organization has advised that people should postpone unnecessary travel to Toronto because of SARS. At least 14 people have died there.

It was the global health agency's latest move to stem the worldwide spread of SARS.

Dr. Donald Low, chief microbiologist at the city's Mount Sinai Hospital, called the WHO warning "inappropriate."

"The impact on the city ... you won't be able to take this mark off," Low said.

The news also was met with dread by Toronto's business community, already reeling from the financial repercussions of the SARS outbreak.

Rick Naylor, head of Accucom, a company that organizes trade shows to Toronto, predicted the WHO warning will be devastating.

"The ripple effect is huge because the hotel industry, the restaurant industry, sporting events - everything filters out of that," Naylor told a Toronto radio station. "The economic impact is huge – it's not just the conventions, it's the off-shoot businesses that are affected."

The WHO on Wednesday also advised against unnecessary travel to Beijing and China's Shanxi province. The organization previously warned against such travel to Hong Kong and the Chinese province of Guangdong.

Bullpen fails to hold lead as UM falls

Stone's luck runs out

Stone reaches into his bag of lucky tricks and pulls out pinch hitter Curt Szado, who proceeded to get plunked by a pitch to nullify any and all designs Stone had for him.

With runners now on first and second with no one out, Stone might as well have sent Matt Boulanger to the plate adorned with a sign reading "I'M BUNTING!" It was the correct move in the opinion of this journalist, and it proved to be as correct, as the outfielder laid down a perfect sacrifice bunt to move the runners to second and third with only one out. After Frank Curreri was intentionally walked, weak hitting catcher Tom Ellerbrook headed for the batter's box.

Death. Taxes. I uck running out.

With all eyes on the home dugout along Fenway's first base line in search of a pinch hitter, any pinch hitter, or specifically Adam Stojanowski in the ever-evolving humble opinion of this journalist, Stone did nothing. In a bold show of faith, he laid his trust on the shoulders of his senior captain rather than opt for a better contact hitter. He didn't need a hit, he just needed a simple fly ball and the game would be tied, but Ellerbrook struck out.

With no luck left to save himself and his team, Stone watched Mike Athas' soft liner find its way into Crimson first basemen Brian Lentz's glove, and the Minutemen found their way into the consolation game.

Mike Marzelli is a Collegian Columnist.

Chris Morgan collected two hits for the Minutemen in a losing effort against Harvard.

Harvard's late rally sends UMass to consolation

"They're not a real good breaking ball team," Stone said, "and Ratliff's got to have another pitch because his fastball wasn't working very good for him."

No. 17's troubles began when Harvard started off the ninth with two hits and a walk to load the bases. Mann knocked in Hale with a single, and the floodgates opened. A sacrifice fly by Klimkiewicz brought in the tying run in Zak Farkes, and two more scored on a single by Lance Salsgiver. The four-run inning put Harvard ahead 8-6.

"We had a two-run lead in the ninth," Mike Stone said, "and our closer has been pretty effective, but he just didn't get it done. It's too bad. Mike Crane pitched a hell of a game, but it was wasted. We fell apart in the ninth inning."

The Minutemen did most of their damage in the fourth inning, with Jason Twomley, Matt Boulanger, and Curreri all reaching safely on two walks and a single. They advanced when Ellerbrook ground into a fielder's choice, but Crimson second baseman missed the throws to second, scoring Twomley and Boulanger.

Athas followed up with a sacrifice that scored Curreri, and Ellerbrook crossed on a single by Cullan Mannus, who scored after two consecutive wild pitches by Wes Cosgriff, who had barely gotten out of the bullpen before giving up the two runs.

Minutewomen to battle North Carolina

Kurtz has done an excellent job in shutting down opponents. In her game against Richmond, Spiders' Polly Purcell scored only two goals against the Minutewomen.

Ames finished last year as the second leading scorer for UNC with 15 goals and four assists. This year, she has 28 goals (a career-high) and three assists for 31 points. A midfielder she is UNC's go-to scorer.

Where UMass has the advantage is momentum. The Minutewomen have won four games in a row, including a nail biter against St. Bonaventure where UMass's Jada Emery scored the game winner with only 30 seconds remaining.

"Our team is finally realizing its potential," Massachusetts coach Carrie Boldue said.

This is the first year since 1996 that the Tar Heels have been ranked outside the top 10. The Minutewomen have never beaten the Tar Heels.

With two more games left in the season, a win would give the team momentum heading into the A-10 playoffs.

Sports briefs: Lamb to transfer

From Staff Reports
Collegian Staff

Former Massachusetts men's basketball player Raheim Lamb has transferred to UMass Lowell. The Riverhawks received a signed commitment from the Boston-area native this week.

According to the Lowell Sun, Lamb chose UMass Lowell because it would allow him two years of eligibility. Transferring to a D-I school might have forced Lamb to sit out the 2003-04 season and preserve two years of eligibility.

The Riverhawks won the Northeast-10 Conference with a 23-4 record last season and lost in the first round of the NAIC/Division II playoffs.

The transfer to UML will give Lamb an opportunity to play more minutes and be sure that all of his credits will be accepted from the transfer school.

Lamb, who was recruited to play at UMass by Brutus Hamilton, played two years under coach Steve Lappas before leaving the team on Feb. 25, 2003. Reports indicate that Lamb was unhappy with his role, his starting small forward position to freshman Jeff Adrien and then being moved to the backup power forward post.

Lamb played his final game for Lappas in Feb. 15th's 82-76 win over Boston University. Lamb started the contest and played 29 minutes, contributing six points and two rebounds to the effort.

The Jamaica Plain native, who sat out the freshman year due to transfer, started 16 games as a sophomore. Lamb averaged 5.7 points and 3.8 rebounds per game in 2001-02.

Lamb played high school at Boston English and scored nearly 1,000 points in four City All-Star selections.

Report: Fordham buys out Hill

The New York Post has reported that Atlantic 10 cellar-dweller Fordham has fired coach Bob Hill.

It was reported earlier in the year that the school was exploring ways to sever ties with Hill, who signed a 10-year contract four years ago, but couldn't reach a settlement with the former NBA coach.

At the time, Hill admitted that terminating the contract would likely be best for both parties but, according to reports, refused to do so without a $1 million buyout.

Whether the school has accepted that buyout as part of this week's news was unknown at press time.

Fordham hoped that hiring Hill would attract prospects to the New York school, but his NBA resume wasn't enough to overcome his apparent lack of willingness to ingratiate himself with the Fordham alumni and the area high school coaches.

The Rams went 36-78 over Hill's four years, including a 2-26 mark in 2002-03.

Former UMass basketball player Raheim Lamb will transfer to Division II UMass-Lowell in time for next season.

Pats look for help in 2003 NFL Draft

Jeff Boyd

April. What a great month. The warm weather means I can bring the ol' beruit table outside and eat off the grill. Easter and Patriots Day allow me to spend some quality time with the family. And my birthday on the 14th gives me an excuse to party excessively without feeling bad about it. But the one thing I look forward to more than anything in the month of April is the always unpredictable NFL Draft. And since I am a die-hard Patriots fan, this year's NFL Draft has me on the edge of my inflatable Miller Lite seat.

After one of the more active off-seasons in recent memory, one would think that the Patriots might actually have a little fun with their two first-round draft picks. Maybe even take some chances. Sure Bill Belichick shows about as much enthusiasm as Rosie O'Donnell at a Weight Watchers convention, but don't be surprised if Mr. Personality makes an unexpected move.

The major objective of this year's off season was to find players who could put pressure on the quarterback. Thanks to some key signings, the Pats seem to have addressed their defensive woes. Roosevelt Colvin brings some much needed speed and intensity to the Patriot's crew of linebackers, and the acquisition of Rodney Harrison will make losing Tebucky Jones a little easier.

So now it's time to take care of business up front. You know that Richard Seymour must get lonely when he is the only defensive lineman in the opposition's backfield. If the Patriots still believe that defense wins championships, then their first pick will almost certainly be a defensive lineman. Luckily, this is a good year to be in search of some young talent in the trenches.

But who will it be? You know that Seymour would love to have his fellow Bulldog Johnathan Sullivan alongside of him. In fact, there are a lot of people who would love to see the Pats take Sullivan with the 14th overall pick. But Sullivan is just one player in a pool of talented D-linemen eligible for the NFL draft. It will all come down to who is available when the Patriots are on the clock.

If he is available, which is a definite possibility, expect the Pats to draft Kentucky's DeWayne Robertson with their first pick. Robertson is explosive on the interior and was a menace to SEC quarterbacks last season. He can stuff the run and has amazing closing speed for a D-lineman. His presence on the field would likely draw many double teams, making him a perfect fit for the Patriot's new 3-4 defense.

Since Robertson is considered by most as the top defensive tackle in the draft, he could end up somewhere like Chicago, Seattle, or with the Jets - all teams with picks before New England.

Jimmy Kennedy is another potential pick for the Patriots. Kennedy is a more prototypical defensive tackle compared to Robertson, but tends to make mistakes and wear out as the game goes on. He's huge - no, that's tempting. He's fat. But he moves well for a big man. But then again, he is from Penn State. Did I mention that he's fat? If Robertson is gone, and it comes down to Kennedy and Sullivan, count on there being a couple of Bulldogs on the Patriots' defensive line.

And then there was the second first-round pick. Oh, the possibilities. Will they go offense, or will they continue to build on defense? Only one thing is guaranteed with this pick - they won't draft a kicker.

There will still be plenty of talented skill players when the 19th pick rolls around, and I'd expect the Patriots to take advantage of that. There are several areas on offense that need to be addressed, and the 19th pick should accommodate the Pats in fixing those problems.

New England needs help at wide receiver. Troy Brown is the go-to guy, but we all know what happens to the Patriots offense when he goes down. David Patten proved that he has the potential to be a great receiver when the Patriots won the Super Bowl, but was a disappointment last season. David Givens is fast, but that's about it. Donald Hayes is a great receiver, it's just too bad that he's too dumb to learn the playbook. Thus, the Pats need to give Tom Brady another target and take some of the pressure off of Brown.

Unfortunately, Andre Johnson and Charles Rogers won't be around for New England when it's their turn to pick. The next best thing would be either Taylor Jacobs of Florida or Kelley Washington of Tennessee. Jacubs was great in Florida where he made Rex Grossman look 10 times better than he really is, but his 6-foot-0 frame will makes him an unlikely pick for the Patriots. Washington would have been a top 10 pick next year if he stayed for his senior season, but has decided to go pro despite a serious neck injury. If Washington is 100 percent, he could be an immediate impact player in the NFL. At 6-foot-3, he could be the big-bodied athletic receiver that New England has been looking for.

Then there's the running back situation. When will we ever have a year when we don't have to talk about the Patriot's backfield? Had it not been for flag football in Hawaii, this wouldn't even be an issue. However, the reality is that the Patriots need a spark coming out of the backfield. Antowain Smith is a good running back at best, but his style does not fit New England's offense. If Charlie Weis is going to call plays that move laterally, then we need a running back that can run in more than one direction. Sorry Antowain.

That said, the Patriots WILL draft a running back with their second pick of the first round. But it's not going to be who most Patriots fans want it to be. It kills me to even say it, but the Patriots will take Penn State's Larry Johnson with the 19th overall selection. There has been plenty of talk about taking Willis McGahee but it probably won't happen. If I were on the selection committee, I'd wrap up McGahee with my first pick. But I'm not, and neither is anyone reading this. A torn ACL can ruin a player's career, and the Patriots don't want to take that kind of chance.

Johnson proved himself in his senior season at Penn State, and he is certainly not a bad pick at number nineteen. However, he will have to shake the demons of past Penn State runners who flopped in the NFL.

Good luck Patriots. We'll see you in August.

UM to welcome reigning champs

By JIM PIGNATELLO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella made something perfectly clear at yesterday's UMass Sports Luncheon for his team. Saturday's match up against defending NCAA champion Syracuse at Richard F. Garber Field isn't any more important than every other game his Minutemen have played this year.

"It's always an over-hyped week here at UMass," said Cannella, whose team has lost 21 straight against the Orangemen. "We are trying to de-emphasize that this week, trying to get our guys to play the other team and not the name 'Syracuse.'"

It may sound unbelievable, but the No. 7 ranking for the 6-4 Orangemen shows they are probably as vulnerable as they have been during UMass' 21-year drought. Syracuse, which entered the season at No. 1, is coming off back-to-back losses to Rutgers and Hofstra. The Rutgers game, a 12-11 overtime defeat, was Cuse's third one-goal loss of the season at the Carrier Dome – the most losses in one season in the building's history.

The Minutemen (11-1), meanwhile, are coming off an impressive 11-8 win over previously unbeaten Georgetown. The win jumped UMass from No. 6 in the polls to No. 4, behind Johns Hopkins (9-1), Princeton (8-2) and Virginia (9-2).

"It was a great win for us," said Cannella, who saw eight Minutemen tally at least one point in the contest. "Another team win."

The defense continued to impress against the Hoyas, as well. Goaltender Bill Schell made 14 saves as the Maroon and White held its opponent under 10 goals for the 11th time this year despite being out shot 48-35.

"That was really impressive to do that against a team like Georgetown," Cannella said.

Schell and company will have a tough task in Saturday's matchup, which will feature a battle between two of the best offenses in the nation.

Syracuse enters the game as the top offensive team in the country. The Orangemen average 13.82 goals per game, a mere 1.2 ahead of Johns Hopkins. The Minutemen, meanwhile, rank third in offense with 13 a pg.

"I think we match up pretty well [with Syracuse]," Cannella said. "Their offense is outstanding. Hopefully, we'll be able to play with the same intensity that we played with last week."

It is the UMass defense that must be the difference-maker however, as the Minutemen rank ninth in the nation in goals against average (7.25) despite their up-tempo style of play. Syracuse, meanwhile, falls outside the top 20.

Despite the higher ranking and solid averages, Cannella has no illusions about what it will take for UMass to snap the Syracuse losing streak.

"We'd love to get [the win], but we'll have to put together another tremendous effort," Cannella said.

Notes: The first 500 fans into Saturday's game will get a free UMass lacrosse T-shirt ... The Maroon and White's No. 3 national ranking is the second-highest in program history. The Minutemen were ranked No. 3 in the nation heading into the 2001 Georgetown game. Cannella's crew has compiled a 35-7 record since the start of the 2001 season, the best mark in the nation over that time period. ... Junior Jeff Zwicki ranks third in the nation in both points (52) and goals (34). Zwicki also ranks 17th in assists (18). ... Senior Kevin Leveille is 18th in points (39) while classmate Chris Dore ranks 17th in goals (28).

Chris Doyle and the No. 4 Minutemen will host defending NCAA champion Syracuse this Saturday at Garber Field.

UMass rallies to down Connecticut

The Massachusetts softball team was down 2-0 with no hits after two and a half innings. Over the next four and half innings, however, the Minutewomen (26-12, 7-1 A-10) dominated to come away with the 6-2 victory over Big East powerhouse UConn. The win extends the home-winning streak to 48 straight.

In the bottom of the fourth, down 2-1, the Minutewomen rallied for three runs, highlighted by a clutch two-run single from senior shortstop Emily Robustelli, good for a 4-2 lead. The Maroon and White added two runs in the fifth while fighting through brutal winds and freezing temperatures.

"[They did] an excellent job," Coach Elaine Sortino said. "It was a tough day to play and also a tough day to mount a comeback. It felt like you were stuck in the mud. The weather has been hardly on our side.

"You have to feel positive about the way we handled the adversity. Things were getting a little tough, but we did well."

UConn took the lead with an RBI triple off the wall from sophomore Mandy Schettini, scoring freshman Nikki Riberio, who barely beat the tag. Schettini scored on the next at-bat on an error by first baseman Brandi Cross to give the Huskies a 2-0 lead. It would mark the first time UMass trailed at home this season.

The Minutewomen entered the bottom of the fourth inning down 2-1. After K.J. Kelley walked, she was replaced by pinch runner Kristi Stefanoni, who immediately stole second base.

Following a Denise Denis' strikeout, catcher Jaime Cahalan ripped a double that scoring Stefanoni. With the

Minutewomen to face North Carolina

By ARI JANKELOWITZ
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team looks to move into the top 20 in the IWLCA poll for the first time this year, but it will have to beat North Carolina – last year's Atlantic Coast Conference champions – to make a case for the ranking.

North Carolina is currently ranked No. 14 in the nation.

Last year, the Tar Heels defeated the Minutewomen by a convincing score of 14-6. Yet they are a different team now, with 10 freshmen and five returning sophomores. Carolina lost its top five scorers from last year and has shown it through its eight losses this season.

According to laxpower.com, the Tar Heels have the second strongest schedule in the country. In fact, UNC has played all five of the top five ranked teams (Loyola, Maryland, Virginia, Duke, and Georgetown) in the country at least once (Maryland twice), but have lost all six of those games. Carolina has played a total of nine games against top 20 teams and has won only once. They have lost those games by an average of a little over three goals a game.

In comparison, the Minutewomen have played three games against ranked opponents (Dartmouth, Syracuse, and Temple) and Temple is no longer ranked. Dartmouth is ranked No. 6 and Syracuse sits comfortably at No. 11. UMass has lost all three of those games by an average of just over four goals.

The Minutewomen's schedule ranking is around the middle of Division I teams at 37 out of 77 teams.

UMass senior midfielder Kelli Kurtz will be covering UNC's top offensive threat, which is most likely junior Beth Ames.

Bullpen blowup dooms Minutemen

Stone's moves prove to be unlucky

Mike Marzelli

BOSTON – Luck: The chance happening of fortunate or adverse events.

Baseball is a game of strategy, and strategy is a matter of luck. From bases on balls to bean balls, everything in the game is part of a master plan that managers hope will spell success. Because of this, bench bosses lose jobs and find new ones based on their ability to out-strategize their counterpart, which just so happens to be a complete and utter crap shoot.

With every maneuver there's a winner and a loser; the one who guessed right and the one who guessed wrong. Whether relying on the hot hand, the smart numbers or just a plain ole gut feeling, a manager needs to hope for a certain degree of luck with each move he makes.

For eight innings Wednesday afternoon, Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone was one lucky man.

But the funny thing about luck is that it runs out.

Playing in the first game of the 2003 Baseball Beanpot against a Harvard team that trotted everything but the kitchen sink out of the Fenway Park bullpen to throw at his Minutemen, Stone could do little wrong. The veteran skipper sacrificed, hit and ran and moved runners over to the tune of six runs over eight innings. And with staff ace Mike Crane on the hill at the old ball yard, it should have been enough to win.

But as previously stated, luck runs out.

In hurling a whopping 127 pitches, Crane was able to scatter 15 hits and give up only three earned runs in those first eight innings. Now only three outs away from a shot at a Beanpot title, Stone's decision was made by managers day in and day out: he took the safe money and gave the ball to his closer.

Enter reliable southpaw Scott Ratliff. Previously noted for holding field goals now noted for getting torched for four runs on four hits and blowing a two-run lead, all while retiring only a single batter on the Fenway Park mound.

Did I mention luck runs out?

Now faced with a two-run deficit heading into the bottom of the ninth, the Minutemen got a single from Jeff Ahern and an RBI double from Matt Reynolds. With centerfielder Jason Twomey due

BOSTON – The Massachusetts baseball team played well for eight innings yesterday.

The ninth inning, however, was a different story.

Despite leading 6-4 heading into the final frame, the Minutemen lost to Harvard, 8-7 in the opening round of the Beanpot Tournament at Fenway Park.

After eight solid innings from starter Mike Crane, who gave up 14 hits but held the Crimson to just one multi-run inning, closer Scott Ratliff imploded, surrendering four runs, all earned, before Eric Chown came in to stop the bleeding.

UMass	7

UMass managed one run in the ninth inning, but couldn't plate the equalizer despite having the bases loaded with one out. Captain Tom Ellerbrook struck out, and fellow senior Mike Athas lined to first to end the game with Matt Reynolds standing 90 feet from home.

UMass coach Mike Stone, reflecting on the way his club played the ninth inning, realized there were squandered opportunities, namely the decision to have Ellerbrook swing away despite the one out recorded when he came to the plate.

"You could have squeezed with one strike on the number nine hitter, but the table was set, and some people have to come through," he said. "That's a possibility that always comes up, squeezing, but we had the opportunity and didn't come through."

Despite the missed opportunities, though, the blame for yesterday's loss rests mostly on the shoulders of Ratliff.

Obviously flustered from the moment he toed the rubber, he didn't record an out until the fifth batter he faced, a sacrifice fly to left field that scored one run and moved another runner into scoring position.

Chairman discusses higher education at Fac Senate

Stephen Tocco of the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education speaks to the Faculty Senate at yesterday's meeting. He expresssed concerns over the systems at the University of Massachusetts and its status as a flagship campus.

By S.J. PORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Stephen P. Tocco, chairman of the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education, spoke to the Faculty Senate yesterday concerning the House's proposed state budget. Tocco expressed concern for the University of Massachusetts system and said that the community should not focus on fighting reorganization proposals, which he viewed as a distraction away from the more important fight for more funding.

"It is $1 billion of the $23 billion state budget, and unfortunately, I think that many lawmakers see higher education as having release valves," Tocco said. He explained that lawmakers often think higher education can simply harvest the lost funding though options like higher fees and company sponsors, an option health care and other budget items don't have.

Tocco referred to public higher education as an investment and said he saw three principle ideas within Governor Mitt Romney's proposed plan for public higher education that he did not want to disintegrate. He agreed with Romney that there were still places to save money within the administration, and that effective organization and management principles were the first of those he did not want lost in the political fight around Romney's proposal.

The second idea that Tocco stressed as important was deciphering what the term "flagship campus" actually denoted in the eyes of those using the term.

"I want to define what 'flagship campus' means. A consensus of its meaning is not enough," he said. "Invest in it [UMass] so it becomes a true flagship, or stop calling it a flagship. That's something we can hold people's feet to the fire on."

Brian Long, the Student Government Association representative to the Faculty Senate agreed with Tocco and asked what the campus could do to work toward receiving the respect a flagship campus deserves.

"I personally don't feel like we're being given the respect that a flagship campus should," Long said. "Other than ripping up our buildings and putting them down on Boston Common what can we do, in your opinion, to gain this respect?"

Tocco advised that continuing to rally in the name of public higher education was one way and was a "healthy response" to the proposed cuts, but that the third principle in Romney's plan would also be key: "more direct links with economic development of the Commonwealth."

Public higher education institutions educate sixty-two percent of the workforce in Massachusetts, according to Tocco. He said that when legislators hear this they want to see proof of the numbers, and are "surprised" that the statistic is true. The number of Massachusetts residents and workers who attend state higher education institutions will be on the rise in the next decade, he said, because of the growth of immigrant communities in the state who have "no other choice" for higher education.

If legislators continue to cut funding for public higher education, Tocco said, there is "potential disaster in out years, and people need to think about this."

Second day of the North Korea talks ends in uncertainty

By GEORGE GEDDA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) – Talks between North Korea and the United States ended Thursday with State Department officials saying it was uncertain whether discussions on Pyongyang's nuclear program would continue.

The officials denied reports the talks had broken down.

Before the start of the second day's meeting in Beijing, North Korea accused the United States of leading the region toward war, an apparent attempt by the communist nation to increase pressure on negotiators, according to the U.S. officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

Earlier, Secretary of State Colin Powell had told a gathering of experts from the Asia-Pacific region that the talks, involving the United States, North Korea and China, had concluded, leaving the impression there would not be a third day of discussions on Friday.

Powell expressed hope that South Korea and Japan would be able to participate "when and if" there is another round of talks.

He added: "North Korea should not leave the meetings having the slightest inpression that they might force us to make a concession we would not otherwise make."

A U.S. official said the North Koreans implied during the talks that they have nuclear weapons and that they may conduct a test.

Another administration source said the North Koreans never used the word "test."

The official said there are no indications a test is imminent. He acknowledged that preparations for an underground test could be concealed.

According to the official, a North Korean nuclear detonation would deplete by half their estimated stockpile of two weapons.

Another official praised the Chinese contribution to the discussions. He said China's delegate specifically called for a denuclearized Korean Peninsula and made specific reference to a 1992 promise Pyongyang made to South Korea not to develop nuclear weapons.

In Beijing, the chief U.S. negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State James Kelly, declined to answer questions upon returning to his hotel in the afternoon, saying only that the sides "had talks."

Kelly was to fly to Seoul on Friday to meet with South Korean officials.

North Korea continued to try to ratchet up the pressure and is believed to want economic aid in exchange for concessions.

Its leaders are outraged over U.S. moves to cut off oil shipments because of its suspected nuclear weapons program, and fears it is next on Washington's list for military action.

"The situation on the Korean Peninsula is so tense that a war may break out any moment due to the U.S. moves," the North's KCNA news agency.

It said relations with the United States had hit "rock bottom" because President Bush named North Korea as part of an "axis of evil," along with Iran and Iraq.

KCNA said the war in Iraq had shown the only way for a country to protect itself was to have a strong military deterrent. Officials from Seoul and Washington say the swift U.S.-led victory in Iraq prompted North Korea to agree to the nuclear talks.

The North Korea People's Army vowed to "put all people under arms and turn the whole country into a fortress" and urged its soldiers to become "human bombs and fighters ready to blow up themselves" to protect leader Kim Jong Il.

"If the U.S. imperialists and their followers intrude into even an inch of the inviolable sky, land and sea of the (North) ... the (army) will deal merciless deadly blows at the aggressors," North Korean Defense Minister Kim Il Chol was quoted as saying by KCNA.

Still, North Korea said it was ready to settle the dispute over its suspected nuclear weapons programs and that the "master key" for successful talks was for the United States to drop its hostile policy toward Pyongyang.

Late Wednesday, Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and Secretary of State Colin Powell talked by phone and agreed that the Beijing talks were beneficial,

Rally to be held tomorrow

By MORRIS SINGER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Chalked sidewalks campus-wide spread word of the University of Massachusetts Cannabis Reform Coalition's (CRC) annual Extravaganja rally, which will be held tomorrow from noon until 8 p.m. on the Amherst Town Common.

Students will gather at noon to protest the laws and penalties surrounding the possession and consumption of marijuana, while they relax and enjoy music and other entertainment.

"It's time to stand up to the prudes, puritans and prohibitionists who want to run everyone else's lives for them," said Terry Franklin, a member of CRC.

Franklin encouraged those who are interested in the legalization of marijuana to get involved by joining CRC. He also stressed the need for people to keep pressing the issue onto legislators.

"[People should] write to their state legislators, congressman, senators, governor and president," he said.

CRC has organized this rally since the group's creation over 10 years ago. In the past, the event has been the largest annual rally in Massachusetts outside of the Boston's Freedom Fest, which usually welcomes 50,000 enthusiasts, Franklin said. This year the CRC expects a turnout of between 500 and 1,000 people, but says the numbers could vary due to an unpleasant weather forecast.

"We are hoping for that many [people], though weather doesn't look particularly good," he said.

Franklin feels the rally will attract many types of people, especially college students. However, it will also appeal to many members of the Amherst community at large, and it is intended for people of all ages, he said.

Five speakers will address the crowd, including CRC President Angela Panaccione. Several bands will provide entertainment and vendors will sell products such as clothing and jewelry.

This event is the first of many springtime rallies that argue for the legality of the drug. The University of Rhode Island is having its marijuana rally simultaneously in Providence, and students at Worcester Polytechnic Institute are gathering for a similar purpose on May 3.

Remembering the Holocaust

By MORRIS SINGER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This Sunday marks the beginning of a week-long series of events that will take place at the University of Massachusetts in remembrance of the Holocaust.

A Five College effort, Holocaust Memorial Week will feature theater, film, music and services. It will include subject matter pertaining to several of the minorities persecuted during the Holocaust, including Soviet prisoners of war, Polish citizens, Gypsies, disabled persons, Jehovah's Witnesses, homosexuals and Jews.

Sunday's events start with a "flag planting" on the Campus Pond lawn at 12:30 p.m., where participants will place 2,061 flags in the ground. Each flag will represent 5,000 lives that were taken as targets of the Nazi regime. The flags will remain on display all week.

The film "Paragraph 175" will be shown in Campus Center 803 at 7 p.m. on Sunday. The film is about the persecution of homosexuals in Nazi Germany.

Monday night's event is a performance of the play "Dear Esther," which is about Holocaust survivor Esther Tener Raab, the grandmother of UMass freshman Stefanie Raab. The play tells of the experiences and survival of Esther Raab. It will take place in the Campus Center Auditorium.

A student-led memorial service will be held on Tuesday at 7 p.m. in the Mullins Center. A performance of songs from Jewish communities that were lost during the war will take place prior to the service.

On Wednesday, Holocaust survivor Max Michelson will speak in Campus Center 101. His talk will begin at 5 p.m. Michelson is the author of the book "City of Life, City of Death: Memories of Riga." He will discuss his life in Latvia before World War II and his experiences as a survivor of the Holocaust.

Every day next week from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. in the Campus Center concourse, names of Holocaust victims will be read aloud.

The week is sponsored by many organizations in the Five College area including the UMass Hillel, the Smith College Hillel, the Amherst College Hillel, the Mount Holyoke Jewish Student Union, the UMass Stonewall Center and the Five College Lecture Fund.

UMass professor named as one of the World Trade Center Memorial panelists

By DAVID GRANT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

James E. Young, professor of English and chair of Judaic and Near Eastern Studies at the University of Massachusetts, has been appointed by the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation (LMDC) to serve on a 13-member jury, which will review and evaluate entries in the International World Trade Center Site Memorial Competition.

Young, an internationally known expert on memorial architecture, served on a five-member panel for Germany's national "Memorial to Europe's Murdered Jews," which is now under construction in Berlin. He said the opportunity to serve on the World Trade Center jury is a great honor.

"It's a great, if daunting honor to be asked to help choose how our city and nation will memorialize the destruction of the World Trade Center towers and the unbearable loss of life there," Young said.

The LMDC made the announcement on April 10, and will hold a press conference on April 28 in New York City to set forth the guidelines for the competition and provide registration information for designers to submit entries. The winning memorial design will be determined in the fall of 2003.

Young said the memorial will remember all the victims of the 9/11 attacks in New York City, Washington, D.C. and Harrisburg.

However, Young points out the memorial is just one step in the process of healing that will continue for some time.

"But if we see memory itself as a living, life-affirming process that unfolds over time, then we might come to see this memorial as a stage in the process, not its last word."

Young said he looks forward to seeing how our greatest artists and architects might respond to a few questions.

"How to remember and to what end? How will this memorial shape our understanding of these terrible past events even as it invigorates future life in this city?" he asked.

Young, who lived within sight of the World Trade Center in New York City for 18 years, said despite all his experiences serving on memorial juries in other places, the stake in this process is particularly emotional.

"Like many around the world, I felt personally attacked on that day and have been mourning something lost in the city and me ever since," he said. "My love and connection to the city is long and deep."

Young has been a member of the University's faculty since 1988 and recently authored the foreward for the catalog of the controversial exhibit, "Mirroring Evil: Nazi Imagery/Recent Art," at the Jewish Museum in New York.

Young is among 12 other jury members made up of residents, firefighters, local businessmen and police officers. But the most notable member is Maya Lin, who gained international recognition for creating the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial in Washington, D.C. and the Civil Rights memorial in Montgomery, Ala.

"The LMDC needed to find a balance between experts on memorials, families of victims and civic leaders with enough authority and enough of an eye to make a decision that's credible to the larger public," Young said.

The jurors will be instructed to evaluate the designs based on how they express the mission statement and program, as set forth in the competition guidelines. The jury will take part in a series of forums in which the public can express opinions on how elements in the mission and program should be incorporated into the winning design. The forums, to be held this summer, will ensure that the jury is informed of the public's aspirations with regard to the memorial, while entrusting jury members with the ultimate responsibility of selecting a final design.

Philanthropist and businessman David Rockefeller will serve as an honorary jury member.

Information about the memorial competition can be found at www.renewnyc.com.

Progress with North Korea is uncertain

China's official Xinhua News Agency reported.

The U.S. Embassy and Chinese Foreign Ministry said they had no details of Thursday's discussions. But ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said the talks were "conducive to mutual understanding and finding ways to resolve the North Korean nuclear question peacefully."

North Korea and China fought against the United States in the 1950-53 Korean War, which ended without a peace treaty. North Korea and Washington have no formal relations and are still technically at war.

In a likely reference to North Korea's demand for a nonaggression treaty with Washington, KCNA said: "The U.S. should settle the talks from a sincere stand and strive to settle the essential issue."

Washington has refused to offer a formal treaty but says it would consider some sort of written assurance.

China, the North's ally and major aid donor, nevertheless says it doesn't want Pyongyang to acquire nuclear weapons and has appealed for a negotiated settlement to the crisis.

The talks are being led by Assistant Secretary of State James Kelly and Ri Gun, deputy director of American affairs for North Korea's Foreign Ministry. China's delegation is led by Fu Ying, director general of the Asian Affairs Department of its Foreign Ministry.

The United States hopes eventually to include Japan and South Korea in the talks. Kelly briefed South Korean and Japanese diplomats in Beijing following Wednesday's discussions, the U.S. Embassy said. He is scheduled to visit Seoul for meetings immediately after the Beijing talks.

Washington says the North revealed during a visit by Kelly to Pyongyang in October that it was trying to develop nuclear weapons in violation of a 1994 pledge. The North has disputed the U.S. claim.

The North likely wants aid for its economy, which has been crippled by the loss of Soviet subsidies and years of drought and mismanagement.

Since the latest nuclear tensions erupted, Pyongyang has become the first country to withdraw from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and restarted a plutonium-producing reactor.

Chairman discusses higher education issues with Faculty Senate

One example of doing more to link the higher educational system with th work force, said Tocco, would be to increase nursing programs, since there is a shortage of nurses in the state.

"We need to marry the needs of the work force to our [higher education's] work."

Tocco supported some of Romney's proposals for the system, but remained generally neutral, speaking more about what had to be done than what had been proposed.

He explained that when politicians spoke of public higher education, they referred to it as a "cost item," when he feels that it should be considered an "investment item" within the state's budget.

Tocco concluded by listing what would guide him and the Board of Education's work for the future of public higher education: accessibility, affordability and achieving and attaining excellence.

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, APRIL 25, 2003

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Dixie Chicks: A different voice in a one-voice genre

The Dixie Chicks are a sweet melody in an increasingly party line musical sound that has brought musical activism to a new level.

One month ago Natalie Maines, lead singer for the female country trio, remarked on a London stage, "Just so you know, we're ashamed the president of the United States is from Texas."

The remark, which Maines now admits came largely out of frustration as the war in Iraq loomed closer, has garnered the harshest of criticisms. Radio channels – a circle of Clear Channel stations, the entire Cumulus radio network and with some independent stations – put up their own protest by banning the musical group's songs from their playlists.

The trio's latest album, "Home," also took a sales hit, dropping off the Billboard charts after a record 19-week run in the number one spot. With a drop in sales and silence in the public eyes, Maines and bandmates Emily Robison and Martie Maguire have seen an excessive backlash for freely spoken opinions.

This is in part due to the nature of country music. Up against Toby Keith's all too patriotic "Courtesy of the Red, White and Blue" – threatening a "boot in your ass" if you challenge the United States – and Alan Jackson's "Where Were You" tribute to Sep. 11, the Dixie Chicks' more outspoken opposition to the war in Iraq missed the party line.

But in a country with opinions on both sides of the issue, Maines' statement appeals to a possibly silent but likely present voice in country music. Also notable are the details of their statement, their political stance, which draws a line between disliking the foreign policy decision and supporting the military personnel.

The louder, brasher songs – like Keith's – scream support for the war agenda and the administration and attract attention as rally songs. The alternate tone of "Travelin' Soldier" offers a more mellow carry, one in tune with their stance.

Though they suffered the backlash alone, support from other musicians has helped the group's cause as they prep for a U.S. tour.

Bruce Springsteen has backed the group by saying, "For them to be banished wholesale from radio stations, and even entire radio networks, for speaking out is un-American. The pressure coming from the government and big business to enforce conformity of thought concerning the war and politics goes against everything that this country is about – namely, freedom."

From the country music camp Vince Gill has called for an end to the boycotts and destruction of CDs and said enough is enough for the group.

Enough is enough. If an American music group can't speak freely about American actions in a country that brags about its freedoms without a push for their silence, then where do we stand instilling our democracy elsewhere?

Europe on the rise

Yousef Munayyer

The last time the leader of Germany called for a build-up of armed forces was in 1933. Today – 70 years and a World War later – Gerhardt Schröder, in a very different time and under very different circumstances, is working to get the European Union to strengthen itself militarily and diplomatically. In an address to the nation about a week into the war, Schröder tried to rally support behind his goal of a European Union-wide armed forces and the installation of a single European Union foreign minister. He said "the European foreign minister would outline Europe's joint interests and initiate joint action."

The European Union has been around for a while now but has gained much attention once the Euro became a unified currency. The establishment of a stable singular monetary unit is the key to a strong, centralized state. European nations have also had sway in organizations such as the World Trade Organization and have succeeded in defying American trade sanctions on Cuba and Iran.

Also, earlier this month the European Union voted to accept 10 new nations to the Union in 2004. Soon the Czech Republic, Estonia, Cyprus, Latvia, Lithuania, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Slovenia and Slovakia will join the European Union.

The constitution of the European Union is being reworked and is due to be finished this June. There has also been much debate about expanding the presidency of the European Union to a five-year term as opposed to the current six-month rotating cycle. The larger nations within the Union favor this, but the small nations are skeptical because they are uncertain of how representation will be made equal.

So there is definitely some major work in the European Union to strengthen its position, but why? Why should the protected Europe of the last half-century bring itself back into the global political playing field? There are a few reasons for this.

As we have seen in the past few months, there has been a rift in relations between Europe and the United States over the war. France and Germany in particular took a very strong stance against the war. This is a rude awakening for Europe and those countries plan to rise together to get back on the global stage.

Why does the rift grow? Well, the lack of a common enemy reduces the cohesion of the alliance, which flourished during the Cold War. Next, the United States trades one and a half times more with Asia than with Europe. Thirdly, social and cultural differences are growing and becoming more apparent between the United States and Europe.

So, Europeans have come to the logical conclusion that unity would be in their best interest. Germany is Europe's largest economy, but is also only one-quarter that of the United States. However, the economy of the European Union is nearly that of the United States. And now, with the enlargement of the European Union from 15 to 25 nations, it is bound to grow bigger. The European Union should not be dismissed as a weakling either. It has more men under arms than the United States while it spends two-thirds less on defense. Two European Union nations also have nuclear weapons.

> "However, the economy of the European Union is nearly that of the United States and ... it is bound to grow bigger."

The Europeans have to overcome some challenges though. One of the challenges they will face is dealing with Atlanticism (Anglo-American ties). The longer this lasts the longer European unity will be undefined. Mainly, they will have to work out how to assess policy in instances where there is disagreement between member nations. Centrality is key here, and if you consider the issue of the war on Iraq it could have been problematic for the growing European Union. Many of the soon-to-be member states stood with the United States on the war, particularly the Czech Republic. Issues like these will have to be resolved if the European Union is to be taken seriously.

The European Union will also have to overcome nationalist pride to work together. French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin said, "I want Europe, but I remain attached to my nation. Making Europe without unmaking France, or any other European nation, that is my political choice." This will undoubtedly be difficult, particularly in Europe, the birthplace of nationalism. However, the Euro will help draw the nations together and put them on the same track, or so they hope.

The acclaimed professor Benedict Anderson argues that nationalism grew as a direct result of communications through printing. The printing allowed for a national identity to be created in the mind, hence creating an "imagined community."

The only thing that can rival the printing that created a national identity is today's technological and information revolution. Globalization has become an undeniable reality and Europe will use this to bind together and face the new post-9/11 world as a unified entity.

Now through diplomacy, democracy, economical unity and communication, the European Union can federalize and centralize to join the ranks of contenders to the United States' unipolar global domination.

If they do this carefully they may succeed, unlike that guy back in 1933.

One hell of a week

Jen Hodson

This week sucked the big one. You know, it's when you feel like you're on top of the world and then it happens. One of those unexpected "bad days" robs you of your so-called normal life and turns your world upside down into a crazy whirlwind.

Yes, I'm sure you know what I'm talking about because everyone's gone through it. It's one of those days when you wish you didn't get out of bed because when you do, it seems like the day will never end. All you can think about is how you can't wait for the next day to come so the torture will end. It's my roommate harassing me every chance she gets. When I say something even remotely dumb, I know I will hear about it. I am willing to share my examples of stupidity and misfortune if you are willing to listen.

Today I found out I had a paper due in a class I have gone to all semester. I had no idea. Now how does that happen? I know I do not sleep in class, so when did the assigning of the paper take place? I mean, I'll admit openly that I'm slow but not that slow.

Or how about what happened to me in the shower yesterday? I jumped in expecting some form of relaxation and the next thing I know I've stepped on something sharp. So I thought to myself: Oh, it's probably a razor cartridge or something. I went in for a closer look and it was a dead bee! That's nasty! If there's one thing I hate, it's bugs. And if there's one thing I hate more than bugs, it's dead bugs with me in the shower. Now I'm not saying this was a life-altering experience or that it had that much of an impact on my day, but still.

> "If there's one thing I hate more than bugs, it's dead bugs with me in the shower."

If you don't find that amusing, then try this on for size. I lost my job this week. Yeah you heard me right, but there's a funny story to go along with it. Don't you hate it when no one believes you when you know that you're actually right about something for the first time in your life? Well, I tried to explain this to my rude, ignorant boss, who thinks she has never made a single mistake in her entire life. Anyway, it was pretty frustrating when I took the weekend off to go home and spend time with my family on Easter, and my boss told me that I was supposed to work. The situation was even more frustrating because she was the one who I had spoken to about taking the weekend off, and she told me that it wasn't a problem at the time.

The lesson here is to never try. In the words of Homer Simpson, "No matter what you do in life, there will always be a thousand people better at it than you." People are always going to believe what they want. And trust me, they never want to hear from anyone else that they are wrong. I sound a bit cynical, I know, but when you lose your job to an incompetent fool you will understand exactly what I am talking about.

I think by now we can all appreciate the funny little lessons that life has taught us. I've learned along the way that you shouldn't really tell your parents where you're going when they ask. Don't get drunk the night before you have to work because even though you think you can rough it out, chances are you won't be successful. Don't date more than one guy at a time – it could get confusing. If something bad happens, say it was like that before you came into the picture. And don't ever try to outrun the cops because when they catch you, the payback is a bitch. Don't even ask on this one.

Now I hope that you haven't taken my article too seriously when I say all of this because it's for entertainment. I'm sure some of you have detected the hint of sarcasm and couldn't care less, while others may have been offended. Not everyone will always agree with what you have to say and life and honestly, who cares. Life's too short to please everyone, so be who you are and speak your mind.

I don't pretend to play God

Congratulations to the Republican Club for orchestrating the most effective demonstration I have witnessed in my two years at UMass. Its "pro-life" graveyard display brought attention to its cause and sparked campus-wide debate. The demonstration was so effective that it caused some irate "pro-choice" students to sabotage it. Then, using the same tactic that made Dr. Martin Luther King successful, the violent acts carried out by those in disagreement with the nonviolent demonstrators were fed to the media – effectively discrediting the opposition.

I first questioned the ethics of abortion in my junior high years when I heard the following verse from "A Retrospect for Life" by Common Sense:

Turning this woman's womb into a tomb
But she and I agreed it's a seed we don't need
You would've been much more than a mouth to feed
But someone, I would've fed this information I read
To someone, my life for you I would've had to lead
Instead, I led you to death
I'm sorry for taking your first breath, first step, and first cry
But I wasn't prepared mentally nor financially
Having a child shouldn't have to bring out the man in me
Plus, I wanted you to be raised within a family
I don't wanna go through the drama of having a baby's momma
Weekend visits and buying J's ain't gonna make me a father
For a while bearing a child is something I never wanted to do
But for me to live forever I can only do that through you
Nerve I got to talk about them niggaz with a gun
Must have really thought I was God to take the life of my son
I could've sacrificed going out
To think my homies who did it I used to joke about
From now on, I'm gonna use self-control instead of birth-control
Cause $315 ain't worth your soul.

Despite the regret in Common's voice, I still felt reassured that if one of my partners got pregnant, abortion would be an option – one I would encourage her to choose. My opinion didn't change for a few short years, until I met about a half dozen women who told me they'd had abortions. Even those who said it was the right decision for them at the time couldn't keep their voices from cracking or their eyes from watering.

But one in particular broke my heart. This woman was a ray of sunshine, beautiful, all laughs and smiles just her presence made me happy and appreciative of life. Somehow we got into talking about her abortion and she said, "Sometimes, I really think I missed my purpose in life. I think my purpose in life was to have that child and raise it. I think I had my chance and I blew it."

Eduardo Bustamante

I wanted to say something along the lines of, "No, it's just a learning experience. Next time you'll know to listen to your heart." Or something better. I wanted to say, "A person's life can have many purposes, and that may not have been yours." I wanted to take that pain out of her voice. I wanted to bring the smile back to her face. I wanted to remove the punch drunk look in her eyes. I wanted to play God. But I couldn't say anything – I couldn't presume what her purpose was. I just sat there like an ass, but I don't regret it. She has to define her purpose for herself. That's her choice.

After that experience, I knew that I was going to try to discourage anyone who asked me about getting an abortion. But there is a major difference between discouraging someone and forcing someone. I will not force a woman to keep a pregnancy. And this is what the "pro-life" demonstrators are asking me to do.

Don't let them mislead you. "Pro-life" is a misleading word. It is not the opposite of "pro-choice." There is no "pro-death" camp that advocates the abortion of all pregnancies. A more accurate title for "pro-life" might be "pro-hibition and incarceration." This issue of misleading people is the same one I have with the Republican Club's demonstration.

Their sign, which read "You are the mother of a dead baby," – though eerily insensitive, self-righteous, unsympathetic and cold-hearted – was not as offensive to me as the sign that wasn't written. That sign, which truly characterizes the "pro-life" movement as a whole, should have read "Anyone who performs or receives an abortion should be incarcerated because I believe abortion is wrong."

I am not just pro-choice because there is no victim reporting to the police, making the prohibition of abortion incredibly impractical to enforce. It's not just because the prohibition of abortion will lead to the death of many women who attempt to get them illegally because professional procedures will no longer be available. It's not just because there will be more friends, lovers, daughters, sisters, mothers and doctors in jail. And it is not just because a forced pregnancy can be just as traumatic as a forced abortion. It's because I am not God.

My sentiment is best explained in a series of letters written between a doctor who performs abortions and his protégé in John Irving's novel "The Cider House Rules." After accusing the doctor of playing God for performing abortions, the protégé writes to the doctor, in numerical form, why he refuses to take over the clinic when the doctor passes: 1) I am not a doctor, 2) I believe the fetus has a soul, 3) I'm sorry.

The doctor replies that though he hates abortions, he would be playing God if he presumed to be able to decide what does and doesn't have a soul, and thus, he must provide the option so that each woman can choose according to what she believes. He writes: 1) You know everything I know, plus what you've taught yourself. You are a better doctor than I am – and you know it. 2) You think what I do is playing God, but you presume you know what God wants. Do you think that's not playing God? 3) I am not sorry – not for anything I've done (one abortion I did not perform is the only one I'm sorry for). I'm not even sorry that I love you.

I cannot support the killing of human beings, nor can I support throwing human beings in jail for aborting pregnancies. I don't know for sure at which point the egg and sperm are a human being. Does life start at conception? No, life starts before conception – the sperm and egg are both alive. When is the fetus a human being? When it has a soul? When it can survive outside of the womb? When it develops the nerve-endings that allow feeling? Though? How can I know? Who am I to say? Who is the Republican Club to say? It's an answer that each person must decide for himself or herself. To make that choice for others is to force your values on them. In short, to play God.

'GoldenSun: The Lost Age' shines

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

In the history of gaming there have been multiple role-playing titles that have been cult favorites, ranging from "Final Fantasy" to "Dragon Warrior." Some have faded away as new adventures have replaced them. "GoldenSun" is an RPG that is strong enough to become an instant favorite in the eyes of RPG players. The graphics, game play and story are so compelling that Nintendo had to release the sequel sooner or later. That sequel has finally arrived.

"GoldenSun: The Lost Age" starts off right where the first game left off. You find yourself taking control of three new heroes, characters that players of the first game will remember. "GoldenSun" takes an approach similar to "Final Fantasy," but in its own unique way.

"Final Fantasy" fans will recall using magical beings such as espers and aeons. In "GoldenSun" you use little creatures called Djin, and collecting them is no easy task. For those who played the original, you will know what I'm talking about when it comes to the Djin. These little creatures seem very cute and loveable, but if you want to control their magic, you are going to have to put up a fight against the little guys. Once captured, you can use them to give your heroes magic powers unique to that Djin, as well as summon monsters to attack foes. The more Djin you carry the more magic you can summon up.

Game Boy Advance
Publisher: Nintendo
Developer: Camelot Co. Ltd.
Rated E for Everyone

An added bonus to "The Lost Age" is that owning the first one pays off big time, depending upon how well you did in the first one before beating it. At the end of the first game, you were given a password of some kind. That password can be used to plug into the sequel to carry over your levels, Djin and items.

While this seems like a positive note, it's not. I have used the code from the original game and have found that it doesn't make much difference. Then again, I am not very far in the sequel so maybe I simply need to have patience.

The only negative aspect about the series, overall, is that having a downed character is not easily fixed as in "Final Fantasy." Normally, you must travel far away to a town to have them revived. You will find yourself stuck in situations where a boss has wiped out two of your characters and you're quickly running out of health. This is avoidable by using the "avoid" spell, which causes less monster attacks, and "escape" which can get you out of a dungeon area quickly. Even novices can easily learn everything else.

"GoldenSun: The Lost Age" is easily one of the most addicting RPGs since "FFX" came out. I have literally pushed aside my consoles so I may sit at my desk and play the little handheld GBA SP.

"Lost Age" carries over all the positives of the original and it introduces new summons and characters. For those who are new to the series, the game will provide you with plenty of background information if you do not enter a continuing password at the beginning of the game. "GoldenSun: The Lost Age" is now available at a gaming store near you.

In next week's edition, I'll tackle "Def Jam Vendetta," the latest wrestling game that brings back a wrestling control system that every fan of the sport has been waiting for.

'Ararat' is unplanned but not unappreciated

By Lauren Freeman
Collegian Correspondent

The unplanned screening of Atom Egoyen's "Ararat" was certainly not unappreciated by the film enthusiasts that attended the Multicultural Film Festival Wednesday night.

A complex piece, Egoyen critiques the Turkish refusal to acknowledge the Armenian holocaust of 1914 as being in the realm of genocide. To this day the Turkish government has been in a perpetual state of denial in regards to the slaughtering of 1.5 million Armenians by Turkish forces. "Ararat" combines the inseparable lives of modern day Armenians living in Canada with the Armenians of Van who fought for their lives in 1914.

This surprise screening was a perfect addition to this year's festival theme of art experienced through film. The modern day blends with the past when Ani (Khanjian), because of her devotion to the artwork of Armenian painter Arshille Gorky, is chosen to be a historical consult to a film depicting Gorky's life during the Armenian holocaust. The film within the film is also titled "Ararat."

'Ararat'
Directed by Atom Egoyen
Starring Arsinee Khanjian, David Alpay
Miramax Pictures
116 mins.

A bit of trivia: Ararat is the name of a mountain range in Armenia. It is also the supposed mountain atop which Noah's Ark landed after the floods.

The parallels drawn between the modern and the past are "labyrinthine" in their interconnectedness. Ani's refusal to accept her partial role in the suicide of her former husband is directly comparable to the Turkish refusal to acknowledge their dominant role in the slaughter of the Armenians. Raffi's reluctance to leave his mother's side is comparable to the spirit of Gorky as he left his mother in Van to try to find outside help for the Armenians. These subtle but none-the-less haunting parallels can be credited to Egoyen's insistence to create universal understanding between the history of individuals and the history of the masses.

The attempt to assemble their ancestors' tumultuous past unburies many difficult memories from both the current and historical past. On his return from Turkey, Ani's son, Raffi (David Alpay), is caught with suspicious-looking film canisters at Canadian customs. His account of his journey given during interrogation is spiritually moving and even evokes a major change in the tough security guard. The modern day plot unfolds as the guard forces Raffi to account for the canisters by reiterating the events that led up to his possession of them.

The historical plot unravels through a series of flashbacks that seem to be flashbacks of the actual historical events, but then turn out to be the filmed version of the events. These historical events are taken from the memoirs of American missionary Clarence Usher.

Needless to say, this is not a "sit back in your chair and relax" kind of film. This film is intelligent, challenging and takes the idea of interwoven plotlines to an ingenious level.

"Ararat" was the recipient of several of Canada's notorious Genie film awards, including best picture, best costumes, best musical score, best lead actress (Khanjian) and best supporting actor (Elias Koteas).

Next week there will be a screening of Roman Polanski's Oscar winning film, "The Pianist." This event will take place Wednesday at 7:30 p.m. in SOM 137.

Novelty of pointless violence wears off in controversial 'Postal 2'

Publisher: Running with Scissors
Rated MA

Have you ever been watching a disturbingly violent and grotesque movie and thought to yourself, "this is awful, I can't believe I'm watching this?" And have you never, at the same time, been thinking somewhere in the back of your head, "this is so cool?" For all of you sickos answering yes to that question, this game is for you. Headlined with gratuitous violence and raunchy, over-the-top humor, "Postal 2" is the controversial sequel to the world-wide hit.

In the spirit of censorship, the PC game's grand entrance did not come without a fight. According to developer's Running With Scissors website, "Postal 2" has been banned in more than 10 countries, including the United Kingdom, which ironically brought us the infamous Grand Theft Auto series. In addition, Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut condemned "Postal 2" by placing the game a rank above Marilyn Manson and Calvin Klein ads in a list of "The Three Worst Things in America."

Even the U.S. Post Office had its panties in a bunch over the release of the game. Its D.C.-based law firm filed a suit against Running With Scissors, claiming they have no right to trademark the word "postal" for use in a video game. Even several independent retailers are refusing to put "Postal 2" on their shelves.

Wisely, in response to the irate public and angered organizations, Vince Desi, the game's chief designer, draws attention to the game's tag line. It reads, "It's only as violent as you are." He couldn't have said it better.

The beauty of the game-play lies in its open-ended nature. In spite of all the killings, maiming, and explosions that can be achieved throughout the game, surprisingly one can complete the objectives in the vast, non-linear game world virtually bloodshed-free. You play as "Postal Dude," a cranky, irritated young man who must complete various routine tasks that his "Bitch" (the actual name of the character) instructs him to do. Along the way, you encounter partially interactive characters with whom you can converse or choose to kill – it's all up to you. In essence, one can play as a pacifist or an "ultra-violent dude."

"Postal 2" has caused much controversy over its violent content across the world.

Despite boasting the use of Unreal's renowned Warfare Engine, the graphics and physics model are mediocre at best, with sporadic moments of well-conceived visual effects and settings. The most impressive of these effects is the "rag-doll" model used for the game's populace. Unlike most games where death is scripted and unvaried, the corpses in "Postal 2" respond realistically to kicks, bullets

Game Two; round eight

Six degrees of Kevin Bacon

Jake D. Lewis

A popular Hollywood myth states that Kevin Bacon is somehow connected to every other actor in show business by no more than six "degrees," where a degree is a single link between the given movie star and someone else who has appeared on-screen with him or her. Rumor states that every puzzle has at least one route.

Send your answers to collegianbacon@yahoo.com no later than noon on Sunday. With your solutions, please include:

Arts gallery to showcase diverse views on the war

"Friendly Fire: Artists Respond to the War in Iraq," opens this evening at the Pioneer Arts Center on Easthampton (PACE). Involving 10 artists working in various mediums, this gallery show is intended to "give a forum to views, visions and feelings which have no other outlet to be expressed," according to Caitlin Gibbons, the show's founder and curator.

Gibbons, a local artist with a degree in fine arts from the University of Massachusetts, said when the war started, "it was such a highly charged emotional climate, it was hard [for people] to feel safe expressing conflicting views, whatever side of the issue they were on."

The show, which will be from 7 to 9 p.m. tonight, involves several UMass graduates. A highlight of the show is a piece entered by local artist, Trace Meek. Meek created a work that compiles 45 quotes advocating peace, written first in Arabic and then in English, arranged in a way that resembles the Vietnam Memorial. The quotes span hundreds of years and are provided by a variety of people including philosophers, politicians and artists from many different backgrounds.

Another artist, Suzanne Ashrouh, lived in New York at the time of the Sept. 11 attacks and had family that worked in the World Trade Center. Never having called herself a "political artist" before, her work has been focused on finding answers to the tragedy ever since that day.

Gibbons made it clear to the participating artists that their works did not have to align with any political ideology for or against the war. They just needed to be honest, personal responses. She said the number of responses was "overwhelming."

There were many more artists than the gallery could accommodate. The choices had to be narrowed down to nine or 10 of the very best pieces, some of which were even being shipped from New York City.

P.A.C.E., 41 Union St., is a new community arts performance space and cafe. Its mission is to offer a place in which local artists – whether they are actors, musicians or visual artists – can come together and foster the growing arts community in the Pioneer Valley.

"Friendly Fire" will run through July 15. For more information, contact the P.A.C.E. Gallery at 527-3700 or e-mail cailingibbons@yahoo.com.

Murs changes lanes and signs under Def Jux

By Justin Cheliman
Staff Correspondent

Many of you may not know who Murs is, but you most likely have heard of his label. Definitive Jux has blown up the independent hip-hop scene over the past few years, sporting popular underground acts such as El-P, Aesop Rock, Mr. Lif and Cannibal Ox. Def Jux has developed a following similar to the Rawkus phase of the late 90s. (That company's downfall came mostly because El-P, ex-member of the now disbanded Company Flow, left Rawkus because of disagreements and Rawkus soon after folded for a short time and lost 6-huge following.)

Murs is a member of the fabled West Coast underground family, The Living Legends. The group is known for its refusal to be involved in the record industry and extensive album catalog. To fans, the members are the pinnacles of hip-hop, all coming distinctly different in their flows and approaches to all very talented and true to the art.

To the Legends fans, having Murs signed came as quite a shock. Murs frequently professes the contrary of any of them ever making such a move. However, of all labels to be signed to Murs did choose an artist-friendly one that is popular with Legends fans.

Although far from a debut album (Murs has three full-lengths), "The End of the Beginning" is sort of a first. Murs explains on the album that this is the end of the beginning of his rap career. The music is no longer just stuff he records in his house and then sells at shows – it's part of the bigger spectrum.

The first track, "You and I," is a musical explanation of how he felt before and after being signed to a record label. Murs explains this as his only logical choice. Later in the album on one of the tightest cuts ("God Damned?"), Murs further explains his position on the subject over a catchy beat by Atmosphere's Ant. He says he was damned if he did and damned if he didn't signed. However, he has the music in him, he continues, so he'll be damned if he won't let it out.

And let it out Murs did, all with a truckload of various producers.

The result of "The End of the Beginning" is a mixed bag. There are many good songs on it, but it all has a very non-cohesive feel. Murs shows he can rhyme about almost anything. He comes off hard, introspective, silly, funny and serious on this album, but the production is simply all over the place.

For instance, at one point he sings a silly song about taking prescription medication with Aesop Rock (Happy Pills) and then he provides a collaboration piece with Shock G and Humpty Hump (Risky Business). Another piece with El-P ("The Dance") completely changes gears after that. Individually, these songs are good, but together they seem to clash.

On his last venture, "Murs Rules the World," Murs had Murs the Word handle all the production – with the exception of one track. There were also no guest appearances on the album (a very difficult thing for many emcees to pull off successfully). The album was incredible and left much for Murs to live up to.

What Murs did accomplish on this album is that he finally achieves the production quality to match his lyrical skill. Best shown in "The Night Before," one of his most serious and honest cuts, this match shows Murs talking about a few circumstances in an area where he almost got shot. Murs explains his non-gangsta lifestyle and how ridiculous things get regardless of how you live.

The best track on the whole album, however, is the final cut, "Done Deal." It features his closet crewmembers from the Living Legends, the 3MG's (High, Scarub and MURS) and is produced by Murs the Word. Each of the 3MG's drop verses over a jazzy guitar beat, as they talk about their personal lives and futures.

Overall, "The End of the Beginning" was a good step for Murs. Hopefully, this will help his crew gain some sort of notoriety. The future of better productions for the Legends is a very good prospect, as well as a larger fan base and distribution.

If you're a Def Jux fan, then you'll love this album, if for no other reason than El-P and RJD2's involvement. The Legend's fan base response will be mixed, but the album bodes well for the future.

As would be expected, the Legends are set to bombard us with yet another slew of albums this year and next, including another Living Legends Crew album, a 3MG's album (both featuring Murs – and a collaboration with Murs and PSC (another Living Legend). It's a done deal.

'Postal 2' perfect for sick souls and explosions in a manner similar to a rag doll.

Also, the in-game sound follows well with the disturbing nature of the gameplay. With almost no music and seemingly non-stop shrills of death, pain and cars blowing up, "Postal 2" pushes the limit. The voice acting is crude, but at the same time humorous in some perverse way.

And even though the game isn't aspiring to win any Oscars, the designers should have put more effort into creating at least semi-realistic dialogues. You will often find yourself baffled when talking to characters as they tend to say the same thing over and over, and often times make absolutely no sense with random outbursts of meaningless gibber.

And unlike most games' unsegmented environment, expect to spend half your time twiddling your thumbs waiting for sections of the game world to load.

But what the game lacks in superficial qualities, it makes up for in sheer entertainment. In today's modern gaming society where flashy graphics sell copies, creating fun games has become somewhat of a lost art form. If anything positive can come out of this game it is that it breaks from the norm of recent game titles and places enjoyment over everything else. That is, if you happen to enjoy incinerating helpless marching bands (you sick, sick people). And if you happen to get bored of the pre-made levels, the game includes Unreal's illustrious level editor where you can set up and incinerate your very own, user-made marching band.

There are plenty of surprises in store too, including – and I don't want to give them all away – Gary Coleman's cameo appearance (and he is bad-ass!).

Still, a steep price tag of $49.95 should make you think twice about purchasing this game. The novelty of pointless violence wears off much quicker than the $50 investment would lead you to believe. So if you're the kind of person who laughed when Bambi's mom got shot, or cheered when DiCaprio finally froze on that stupid piece of ice in "Titanic," I highly recommend this game. Otherwise, buyer beware.

But don't take it from me. Running with Scissors wants you to remember: "It's always funny until someone gets hurt, and then it's absolutely friggin' hysterical!"

Spring Concert tickets available today at Mullins

Tickets for Spring Concert 2003, featuring 50 Cent, Reel Big Fish, Rahzel and Cold Duck Complex, go on sale today at noon.

Doo-Wop Shop to perform final show

The Doo-Wop Shop

The Doo-Wop Shop will perform their final concert of the year on April 27 at 7 p.m. in Mahar Auditorium.

The Doo-Wop Shop is an all-male a cappella group comprised of UMass students. They arrange and rehearse well-known, radio-friendly songs and often perform at campus events.

The Doo-Wop Shop has sung at freshmen Convocation and the Commencement Ball. They also performed at UMass' first-ever "A Cappalooza," which featured all the talented campus a cappella groups, including Sis Minutes, The Vocal Suspects and Kolot.

The current group of Shoppers has accumulated more than 30 new songs, many of which will be performed on Sunday night.

As the Shop is completely financially independent from the University, they rely on donations to finance concerts and CD recording sessions. Donations will be accepted on Sunday night to help the future Shoppers further the group's musical progress.

The Shop hopes to continue its legacy on campus, so this final concert is also intended to stimulate more interest.

"We want the audience to have a blast and to tell next year's freshman class all about us so The Shop tradition can continue," senior member Jason Moldoff said. "The Shop will continue to work well because each of the members come with different academic majors and musical styles.

The show is free and open to the public.

NBA for Anthony

By John Kekis
Associated Press

SYRACUSE, N.Y. (AP) – With tears in his eyes and his voice trembling, Carmelo Anthony delivered the news most Syracuse fans were expecting but none wanted to hear.

"I'm here in front of you today to announce that I will not be coming back next year," Syracuse's standout freshman forward said Thursday, just 17 days after he led the Orangemen to their first national championship. "I will be moving on, moving on to the pros."

And just like that, all those pleas for Anthony to stay "One More Year!" were forgotten.

"This is a very happy day for Syracuse basketball, and a sad one, too," head coach Jim Boeheim said, his voice cracking with emotion, too. "The guy sitting here has done more for Syracuse basketball than any player we've ever recruited or that's ever played here. To lead his team to a national championship as a freshman is truly a historic moment in college basketball. I'm very thankful that he was here with us."

Anthony had delayed making the decision until after the season, preferring to focus on winning. He led the Orangemen during the regular season with 22 points and 10 rebounds per game and broke Lawrence Moten's freshman scoring records and Derrick Coleman's freshman rebounding mark.

At the Final Four in New Orleans, Anthony had a career-best 33 points and pulled down 14 rebounds in Syracuse's semifinal win over Texas. He then put up 20 points in the championship game victory over Kansas and was named Most Outstanding Player of the Final Four – just the third freshman to earn that honor, and the first since Louisville's Pervis Ellison in 1986.

"I've got to move on," said Anthony, who will turn 19 in May. "We won the national championship, I brought Coach Boeheim what he was waiting for for 27 years. I don't want to make it sound bad, but there's really nothing more that I could get out of college. And I'm going to get my degree – you can quote me on that."

In contrast to all his success on the court, it was evident Anthony struggled mightily with the decision, which hovered over him almost from the start of the season. He said he made up his mind after discussing his situation with his mother, Mary, over Easter weekend, and his coaches.

"It was a tough decision for me to make," said Anthony, who was raised by his mom in a tough Baltimore neighborhood. "I really don't want to leave, to be honest. My teammates, I'm going to miss them so much, but moving on is an opportunity to take care of my family. It's something I always wanted to do, and now I've got the opportunity to do that."

Boeheim did not question the move.

"In my mind, this is the right decision for Carmelo, as much as we would like to have him here," Boeheim said. "He's ready to play at the next level. College is to prepare you for what you're going to do in your life, and if it takes one year, then so be it."

Anthony's decision came sooner than expected – underclassmen have until May 12 to make themselves eligible for the NBA draft – and left the Orangemen with mixed emotions.

"I'm disappointed because he's such a great person," freshman guard Gerry McNamara said. "That's what people admire about him – how good a person he is and what he's done for this area and this community.

"That's the toughest part, but Carmelo's just left us in a great position. Even though we're going to lose our main guy, we still feel real confident. He left us the right way, and we all believe it was the right decision for him to go."

The NBA draft is scheduled for June 26, and Anthony is expected to be a lottery pick. The draft lottery will be held May 22.

Anthony is the first Syracuse underclassmen to leave early for the NBA since Billy Owens opted not to return for his senior season in 1991. Owens was the No. 3 pick that year. All-America guard Pearl Washington jumped to the NBA after his junior season in 1986 and was the No. 13 pick.

"You're happy for him because that's what everyone wants to do when you play sports – reach the ultimate level," said freshman point guard Billy Edelin, who roomed with Anthony. "When you have a friend reach it and the way he did it, you can't be upset."

St. Joseph's has two stars that have the potential to be game-breakers. Kristen Teklinsky leads the team in overall points with 35. She has scored 26 goals with nine assists this season.

Alongside Teklinsky is Kelly Butler who has put in 27 so far. The two have combined for nearly 60 percent of the team's total goals, and do well at complementing each other on the field.

The Minutewomen will look toward their stellar defense to close out this scoring duo. The Maroon and White has proved to have the strongest defensive unit in the A-10, allowing only seven goals per game. This is nearly a goal less than any team in the conference.

The Maroon and White will have to work on their offensive cohesion against a less-than-stellar St. Joseph's squad. The Minutewomen need to prove that they are not a strictly second-half squad. If they are able to put a full game together, the Maroon and White becomes a difficult team to beat.

St. Joseph's has been playing some of their better lacrosse as of recent and gave Temple a scare in a 7-6 loss. The Lady Hawks have been slowing down their game tempo, forcing the opposing defense to dictate ball movement.

UMass can end the season tied for first in the A-10 with a win on Sunday and a Temple loss. Temple plays LaSalle today at home and looks to close out its second consecutive A-10 regular season championship.

As the A-10 tournament draws near there is a definite power struggle through the ranks. Temple and UMass seem to be the strongest two squads in the conference, with talented St. Bonaventure and Richmond teams showing the ability to pull off upsets.

Rangers put the hurt on Lowe, Sox

By Stephen Hawkins
Associated Press

ARLINGTON, Texas (AP) – Everybody got big hits for the Texas Rangers on Thursday.

Rafael Palmeiro and Juan Gonzalez both had three hits, including three-run homers, and Carl Everett had a three-run triple to power the Rangers over the Boston Red Sox 16-5.

Red Sox	5

Texas had 19 hits, including at least one by every starter in the first three innings. The Rangers had four doubles, three triples and two homers.

"We had some good timely hitting, which had been our biggest disappointment," Palmeiro said. "We finally had some good at-bats, and finally broke out."

Palmeiro's 496th career homer, his sixth this season, was a 427-foot drive in the fifth that put the Rangers ahead 13-5. He is 19th on the career list, eight behind Sammy Sosa.

It was the Rangers' first double-digit scoring game of the season and the most runs for Texas since a 19-7 win over the Red Sox last Aug. 1.

Everett's triple into the right-field corner in the third put the Rangers ahead 6-4 and chased Derek Lowe (3-2). Texas sent 11 men to the plate in the inning and scored seven runs to take a 10-4 lead.

"Don't let that score fool you. Derek Lowe is one of the best right-handers in the league," said Michael Young, who also had three hits. "It was just us being due to break out, and we all did at the same time."

Gonzalez went 3-for-4 and scored three times, hitting his sixth homer of the season in the first inning. The two-time AL MVP had gone 10 games without an extra-base hit or an RBI before hitting two homers and a double and driving in eight runs as the Rangers took two of three from the Red Sox.

"I'm feeling much better. I've been working on my mechanics," Gonzalez said. "I'm staying back and swinging at strikes. My job is to drive in runs, and there have been some runners on base."

R.A. Dickey (1-1) pitched three innings after replacing starter Ryan Drese with the bases loaded and no outs in the third. It was the first major league victory for Dickey, the team's first-round draft pick in 1996.

Trot Nixon hit a comebacker Dickey fumbled and then threw to the plate. Einar Diaz stretched to make the out, even though replays showed the catcher may have come off the plate before catching the ball. Bill Mueller then hit a sacrifice fly to put the Red Sox ahead 4-3.

Game three goes to Green

By HOWARD ULMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – The Boston Celtics took the best shots Thursday night as their physical series with the Indiana Pacers got even rougher.

Amid a flurry of flagrant and technical fouls, Boston defeated Indiana 101-83 for a 2-1 series lead as Paul Pierce's 21 points led six Celtics in double figures.

Pacers	83

The Pacers, who trailed 48-44 at halftime, went without a field goal for a stretch of 14 minutes, 20 seconds in the second half.

Boston's Mark Blount and Indiana's Ron Artest were ejected in separate incidents, two Celtics were assessed flagrant fouls and the Pacers picked up five technicals.

Boston was in foul trouble throughout the third quarter, but extended its four-point halftime lead to 75-58 going into the fourth.

Game 4 of the best-of-seven series is Sunday in Boston, where the Celtics are 44-17 against the Pacers.

Blount received an automatic ejection for a flagrant-2 foul in the second quarter, and Artest was ejected when he picked up his second technical with 2:40 left in the game after a hard foul on Pierce.

Indiana's first technical was against Artest after he shoved Blount when the flagrant-2 foul was called. Jamaal Tinsley got one for remarks to a referee, and Brad Miller got one for throwing the ball in the air after being called for a foul. The Pacers got their fifth technical for a defensive 3-second violation.

Blount's flagrant foul was committed against O'Neal. Blount blocked his shot under the basket and knocked him to the floor with 1:19 gone in the second quarter.

With 3:15 left in the third, Eric Williams was given a flagrant foul against Jonathan Bender, who remained on his feet.

JAMES S. BATTISTA/COLLEGIAN

Aisha Franke and the Minutewomen take to the UMass Softball Complex for a doubleheader against St. Bonaventure today. Franke's 29 runs batted in lead the team this season.

Big finish for UM

By JEFF BOYD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts softball team will return to the UMass Softball Complex this afternoon for a doubleheader against St. Bonaventure.

The Minutewomen (26-12, 7-1 Atlantic 10) are fresh off of a come-from-behind win against Connecticut on Wednesday and will look to stay atop the Atlantic 10 standings when they face the Bonnies.

St. Bonaventure has not seen any action since last Saturday when they split a twinbill with Temple. The Bonnies have had a back-and-forth season and head into today's game with a record of 17-13 (5-3 A-10).

According to UMass Coach Elaine Sortino, St. Bonaventure is not a team that the Minutewomen can look past.

"I think that they're going to be very competitive," Sortino said. "I think that they are having a very good year, probably the best year that they've had in their history."

This afternoon's matchup will play a significant role in determining who is truly the best team in the A-10. The Bonnies could actually tie UMass for the conference lead by sweeping the doubleheader. Sortino is fully aware of the magnitude of these two games.

"I'm sure that they are going to be coming after these two games," she said. "I think that they are vitally important in terms of them having an opportunity to make the playoffs."

The Minutewomen have blended together a fairly even mixture of wins and losses over the past couple of weeks, including their first conference loss in nearly three years. Sortino has had her team hard at work to improve upon those things that have contributed to their recent struggles.

"I think defensively we want to show a little bit more than we did [against Connecticut]. I think that we were sort of distracted in a lot of different ways."

The UMass pitching staff, which has remained consistent all season, should once again be the deciding factor in today's games. Last week's A-10 Pitcher of the Week, Kaila Holtz, is expected to start one of the games this afternoon. Sophomore Kelli Arnold will likely be on the mound for the Minutewomen in the other game.

Sortino has been encouraging Holtz and Arnold to challenge opposing batters by getting them to chase pitches out of the strike zone. The Minutewomen hope this strategy will lead to more strikeouts.

"We would like to do a little bit more on the mound when we're ahead in the count to see if we can get people to swing and miss more," she said.

The Bonnies could have the talent to dethrone the Minutewomen this afternoon, but it won't be easy against a UMass team that is seemingly unstoppable on its home field. The Minutewomen have not lost at the UMass Softball Complex in the last 48 games played there. The ability to dominate at home should be helpful for the Minutewomen since they only have one more road game on their schedule.

But Sortino doesn't like to look ahead. She prefers to stay focused on this afternoon.

"We've got a lot on the line too. We take nothing for granted. We have to play every pitch and show a great effort."

has been the most famous wall in sports for so long, is as terrifying as it is breathtaking.

This space has always been a void. It's never been dotted with the smiling faces of those fortunate enough to grab the $50 ticket before the entire season's supply sold out. It was always a space in the sky, framed by the Citgo sign in the distance, and the Cask 'N Flagon sign just off to the left.

And after awhile, it just feels wrong. It doesn't feel like people should be able to sit up here. This used to be a quiet place where careers were born and pennant seasons died.

But for just half a hundred, you can stand where once there was only air, nylon mesh and the occasional spherical visitor. Fenway is now completely surrounded by fans.

Now, the Green Monster is just another grandstand, and while thousands will enjoy the view this year, the Church is changed, and its steeple is no longer the centerpiece.

pitched pretty well." Stone said. "Jeremy did a good job. He should have been out of there with only two runs. He threw some bad pitches."

Northeastern opened the scoring with three runs in the top of the first inning. First baseman Paul Koslowski singled with two outs and scored on Heriot's blast. Jeff Maher's RBI double then scored Bush.

The Huskies increased their lead to 5-0 in the third with a second two-out rally. Bush reached on an infield single while Maher and catcher Matt Morizio got to Demers for consecutive RBI doubles.

UMass scored its lone run in the bottom of the sixth, when senior co-captain John Seed reached via a pinch hit single, and moved to third on a double by senior designated hitter Chris Morgan. Seed scored on a sacrifice fly by senior first baseman Jeff Altieri.

UMass returns to action this weekend, as it travels to Philadelphia for a three-game series with Temple. The series starts with a doubleheader at noon on Saturday, and the rubber game is at noon on Sunday.

SPORTSWEEKEND

FRIDAY, APRIL 25, 2003 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Atop the Monster

Andrew Merritt

BOSTON – It is a chilly, overcast day at Fenway Park. If the crowd in attendance were to group together, it might fill one section. Harvard and Boston College are preparing to vie for the Beanpot Baseball Championship, a tournament that only registers on the Massachusetts sports radar because of its name.

Prior to the battle between the Eagles and the Smart Kids, though, UMass and Northeastern are competing fiercely for the title of the Bay State's third-best Division I college baseball team.

The tension is obviously electric.

However, it's still a special day, because the two groups of young men, and the less than one hundred in attendance, are participating in baseball at Fenway Park, the First Congregational Church of Baseball.

Despite the not-quite-meager crowd, the game still feels important. Nevermind the fact that this is a major league park. The tiny little emerald in the middle of Boston that is a house of worship for so many hardball fans still sets everyone's eyes alight, and a normally tedious game between two teams from college baseball's minor leagues – the Northeast – becomes that much more interesting.

In the middle of the third inning, with the UMass fielding doing everything it can to make the Northeastern batters look like they belong here, it's time for a change of perspective. It's time to head over to the most exciting, yet disturbing change at the less little landlord – the Green Monster seats.

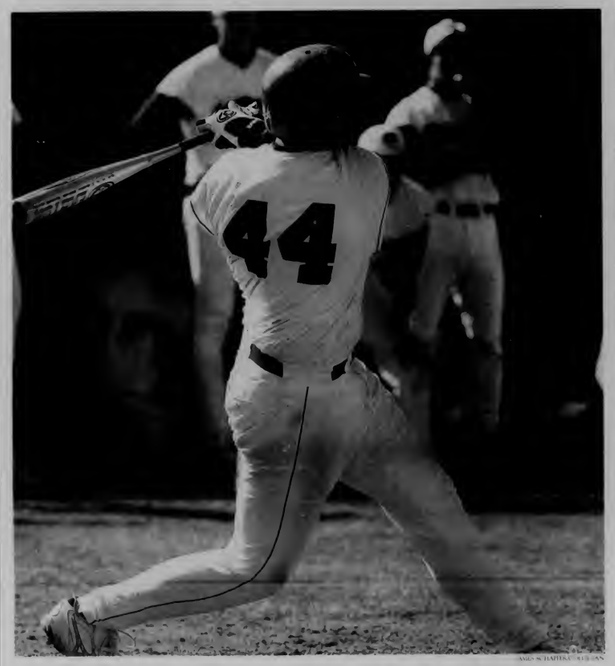
Erected before the start of the 2003 Red Sox season, the 280 seats now sit where once stood a net that caught a multitude of home runs. Now, that net is gone, and in its place are metal chairs, with holes punched through outlining a baseball's stitch pattern.

In front of each spectator is a short ledge, where drinks and other fare from the "Monster" grill-style concession stand.

The view is, of course, incredible. Other than the lucky Fenway worker who was given the task of picking balls out of the netting after batting practice and games, no one ever saw this view before.

But the wall seat is an alien place. You begin to race through a myriad of thoughts just sitting there, admiring the view, and seeing things you really never saw before.

How many home runs have landed in this very spot? How many times has the crowd at Fenway exploded in a frenzy of joy because a ball's trajectory ended here?



This is the general area where one of the worst moments in Sox history climaxed – some hit by a guy named Dent.

There is the foul pole, the left field pole that has arbitrated over so many possible home runs, and was battered by one of the greatest moment in Sox history – some hit by some Fisk character. It is dented, and there are chips of paint missing, revealing deep rust. But it still shines. It still towers over you when you sit here.

Just 37 feet down is the ground. The leftfielder is close enough to talk to, and set the distance, the length of green that

No consolation

Jeff Altieri's sacrifice fly in the sixth inning produced the Minutemen's only run, as UMass fell 6-1 to the Northeastern Huskies in the consolation game of the Baseball Beanpot yesterday at Fenway Park. The Minutemen drop to 14-13 on the year.

BOSTON – Maybe it was the hangover from losing a heartbreaker to Harvard in the first round of the 2003 Baseball Beanpot. Maybe it was the fact that an important Atlantic 10 series looms on the horizon. Maybe it was the cold, dreary weather. Maybe there wasn't a reason at all.

But whatever it was, it didn't bode well for the Massachusetts baseball team. The Minutemen (14-13, 8-4 Atlantic 10) played uninspired baseball over the seven innings of the Beanpot consolation game, and lost to Northeastern 6-1.

"There isn't anything to say, we didn't do anything out there," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We were going through the motions out there, and that's something you just don't expect to happen at Fenway Park."

Third basemen Tim Bush paced the Husky attack, going 4-for-4 with a run batted in and two runs scored, while southpaw reliever Paul Koslowski earned the win for Northeastern (8-16 2-6 America East), allowing one run on three hits in four innings of relief.

Centerfielder Jeff Heriot also added a tremendous two-run homer, which cleared Fenway's visitors' bullpen and touched down in the first row of the right field bleachers.

Starter Jeremy Demers was touched up for five runs on nine hits in five innings of work, while striking out six in a losing effort. However, Stone was encouraged by what he saw from his redshirt freshman right-hander.

"The only positive thing we can take from today is that Demers

Dixon will coach Philly Freedom

By ANNA EDWARDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A refreshing change awaits University of Massachusetts tennis Coach Judy Dixon this summer as she prepares to coach the Philadelphia Freedom of the World Team Tennis initiative, developed by Dixon's former doubles partner, Billie Jean King.

Dixon will take a three-week break from her normal summer schedule of clinics and coaching. Those activities will still take place, but under the guidance of assistant coach Celeste Frey so that Dixon can participate in this event – the first of its kind for her.

"I first got asked by Ilana Kloss, who is the chief executive of World Team Tennis, to coach and because of Billie Jean I could not say no," Dixon said.

World Team Tennis was developed by Billie Jean King and her then-husband in the early 1970s. Its purpose was to get more people involved in the game of tennis by watching as well as playing. It features big name tennis stars playing together as a team.

Dixon's Philadelphia Freedom will feature Hall of Famer Martina Navratilova, who won a record nine Wimbledon titles, four U.S. Opens and has the most singles victories by any woman, with 167.

COURTESY MASSMEDIA RELATIONS

UMass tennis coach Judy Dixon will coach World Team Tennis' Philadelphia Freedom.

"This originated from Billie Jean's idea that people do not go to watch tennis matches, they go to watch individuals and indeed more people would go to watch tennis if tennis was a team sport," Dixon said. "She [King] wanted to make tennis a team sport which is difficult to do."

Dixon is aware of the goals of WTT, which brings together teams in a sport that has classically been an individual game.

"You will go to watch Lindsey Davenport, but if she is not playing then you will not go," Dixon said. "Or people come to a college tennis match to watch Susan Hyams but not really to see UMass play."

Professional tennis players that will be participating along with Navratilova are Andre Agassi, Lindsey Davenport, Anna Kournikova, Boris Becker and John McEnroe.

Each team will consist of five players: two men, two women and a draft player. In Dixon's case her draft will be Navratilova, who will agree to play between five and seven matches of the 14.

"This is the only way to get this certain kind of caliber to agree, they make it fun and they allow them to make a certain amount of money during a down time [in the season]," Dixon said.

Other members of the Philadelphia Freedom that Dixon will have the privilege of coaching are all from the professional tour. One player will be Vera Zvonareva, who has a current WTA ranking of 28. The other female player is also in the top 100. The other half of the Philadelphia Freedom will be made up of two males from Australia who are each in the top 100 doubles rankings.

"The idea on the pro-level is a three-week season in July," Dixon said. "So I will be living in Philadelphia for this time."

The teams involved in World Team Tennis will be divided into East and West conferences. The squads hail from all over the United States, and the inaugural season will culminate in the final at the USTA National Tennis Center in Flushing, N.Y., the day before the U.S. Open begins there on Aug. 25. The teams will be playing for prize money.

King, who was a Wimbledon legend, winning women's singles six times, doubles 10 times and mixed doubles four times, is still very active in her passion for tennis. In addition to her Wimbledon wins, she also racked up 13 U.S. Open victories and was the first female athlete to earn more than $100,000 in a year.

King is also famous for her struggle for equality in women's tennis and was acknowledged for her devotion in February 1999, when she was awarded the Arthur Ashe Award for Courage for her fight to bring equality to women's sports.

The World Team Tennis season kicks off on July 7 with Dixon's Philadelphia Freedom beginning their bid for success against the Delaware Smash.

Downer
UNC tops UM

After placing itself among the top teams in the Atlantic 10, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team proved it could also compete with the best of the best yesterday. The Minutewomen (9-5, 5-1 A-10) battled No. 14 North Carolina (6-9) to a 9-8 loss in the confines of Henry Stadium at Chapel Hill.

It was a game of halves.

The Lady Tar Heels put on a clinic in the first half, shutting down the Maroon and White on both sides of the field. The Minutewomen had trouble figuring out the North Carolina defense and managed just two goals in the first two periods.

N. Carolina	9

The Maroon and White defense also struggled against the Lady Tar Heel attack, and was unable to slow down UNC's Allison Higgins. Higgins led the first half attack for UNC with the first two goals of the game. Brooke Dieringer also netted two goals before the break.

The Minutewomen were lacking cohesion on offense and were unable to open up opportunities for their shooters. The score at the half left the Maroon and White looking for answers as it found itself down 6-2.

The second half looked to be as lopsided as the first. The Lady Tar Heels were first to strike as Beth Ames put one by Minutewomen goaltender Cyndi Doyle within the first five minutes of the game.

The Maroon and White defense would only allow two more goals the rest of the game.

UMass quickly answered Ames' goal with two unanswered coming from Maura McGarrity and Leslie Pollock respectively. This brought the score to 9-5.

The Minutewomen offense was sluggish until the final 15 minutes of the game. Jada Emery scored the first of four unanswered goals for the Maroon and White, and Lydia Robinson took advantage of the slight momentum switch to net three in a row.

Robinson's final goal was within the closing minutes of the game and the Minutewomen were unable to even the score. The loss was the first of the Maroon and White's last five games.

As the end of the regular season draws near, the Minutewomen look to face A-10 nemesis St. Joseph's (0-6, 3-10 A-10) in their last game of the season. The two teams square off on Garber Field Sunday at 11 a.m.

The Lady Hawks have had a disappointing season, placing last in the competitive A-10. They have yet to win a conference game and are looking to upset the Maroon and White before the tournament.

At the comfort of friendly Garber Field, the Minutewomen will look to make a statement against the

UMass mascot may become Gray Wolves
McCaw organizes focus groups

It's still in the embryonic stage, but the University of Massachusetts Athletic Department is considering replacing the Minutemen as the school's athletic nickname with a more marketable moniker such as the Gray Wolves.

With merchandising and recognition in mind, UMass employed the services of Phoenix Design, a company that has overseen the designs and redesigns of teams at the professional and college level.

According to Athletic Director Ian McCaw, simply revamping the Minuteman logos remains an option.

"They evaluate the current logo, do some research and make recommendations," McCaw told The Daily Hampshire Gazette. "They developed several Minuteman variations and made some other recommendations beyond that."

Representatives from Phoenix then took their new designs for the Minuteman and Gray Wolves to a series of focus groups that included students, athletes, coaches, staff and alumni.

Because the members of the focus groups were asked not to discuss the meetings, all interviewed sources wished to remain confidential.

One member of the athlete's group said that the only options the two Phoenix reps presented were the Gray Wolves and the Minutemen.

"They were kind of pushing the Wolves," the member said. "They want to change the Minutemen, OK. But give us some other options."

The Phoenix representatives' logic behind the Wolves was that it's not a gender specific nickname like the Minutemen.

Witnesses say that most of the young women in the focus groups agreed that they didn't feel represented by the Minuteman and wouldn't wear apparel with Minutemen on it.

According to another student athlete, most but not the entire group of about 15 agreed that a change was needed.

Restroom Revolution group working with officials

By COURTNEY CHARLES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Restroom Revolution group has spent most of the semester talking with members of the administration, such as Vice Chancellor Joanne Vanlt, Director of Housing Michael Gilbert, and Ruth Yanka of Community Diversity and Social Justice, on potentially integrating gender-neutral bathrooms on to campus.

The group wants gender-neutral bathrooms on campus for trans-gendered students, as well as for parents of children of the opposite sex and people in wheelchairs that need supervised care. A transgendered individual is a person whose assigned sex at birth does not accurately represent their gender identity. They may or may not opt for surgery, but most have not had full sex-change operations.

"It's actually going pretty well," Mitch Boucher, an organizing member, said. "They want to try and target certain building in the core of campus."

There are also plans to add gender-neutral bathrooms to three dorms on campus: Van Meter, Melville/Thoreau, and James/Emerson. There is a hope that changes will be made by the fall.

The biggest problems the negotiations have encountered are the building codes and fixtures counts that require a certain number of both male and female bathrooms per building. The fixture count varies from dorm to dorm and with academic buildings. The greatest issue with it is that a gender-neutral bathroom can only be counted towards the female or male quota, not both.

Another problem is that even though the group has asked for something in writing several times, they have yet to receive any written promises.

Last year, Boucher, along with A.J. Crittendon and Mandy Dave, began advocating for restroom changes on campus. They made some progress, but during the summer the shake-ups and changes in administration positions led them back to square one, according to Boucher.

The three decided to enlist more active student involvement and publicized the first meeting of the Restroom Revolution.

The group found that many students on campus misunderstand their mission and trans people themselves. Many think that there are only a handful of people that fall into the trans category.

"It is impossible to know the actual number of trans people, but there is a lot more than three," Boucher said. "There are faculty, staff, students, people that are out, people not out as trans."

The actions of the group last semester were to set the groundwork for meeting with the administration this semester, according to Boucher.

"I think progress has been made but it takes time," Boucher said. "My fear is that we haven't seen any concrete changes, just verbal commitments."

He added that he is very hopeful about concrete changes occurring in the fall. He also said that he is very pleased with how helpful and open-minded to changes the administration has been. He believes the Restroom Revolution and the University are working toward a goal to accommodate everyone's interest.

Boucher said that even though other universities such as Harvard, California-Berkley, Willams, Wesleyan, and California-Santa Cruz all have gender-neutral bathrooms, other universities contacted UMass to see how the University is handling the situation.

"This isn't just something that's happening at UMass," Boucher said. "UMass has the opportunity to be a leader. People call to see what we're doing to get hints about what they should be doing."

Boucher stresses that the group is not looking to change all the bathrooms on campus. If their plan is successful, then there will still be designated single-sex bathrooms.

The group shows no signs of relenting in their efforts to create gender neutral bathrooms, even though they feel that the administration is trying to accommodate their proposed changes.

"If we have to challenge the building code or law in any way, then we'll pursue that," Boucher said.

State fire investigators, including State Trooper Frank Hart, have determined that a blaze extinguished in Brett Hall early Thursday morning was intentionally set.

"That was his determination," Pat Archbald, deputy chief of the University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMPD), said. "The Amherst Fire Department (AFD) did a thorough inspection of the debris in a corner where the fire took place ... I have not heard further if there was anything used to start the fire."

The UMPD, AFD and the University's Environmental Health and Safety Department (EHS) responded to a call at 3:53 a.m. Thursday morning. They found a fire in the common room at the north end of Brett, with smoke spreading throughout the building. The building was evacuated for about an hour as the fire was extinguished and smoke was cleared from the building.

Archbald said that there was less than $1500 in damage and that the damage was limited to the common area.

"There was damage to a kitchen counter top and various electrical boxes directly in the area," he said.

The UMPD has released a public safety alert in response to Hart's determination and have taken several other precautions. Archbald said that the UMPD has directed patrols to the general area, including foot patrol, cadets and student security.

"We're just erring on the side of caution," Archbald said.

There is no indication that Thursday's Brett fire has any connection with last Tuesday's two-alarm fire at the New Massachusetts Foundry Building, but "given their close proximity both in time and in geography," Archbald said that the UMPD thought putting out a public safety alert was a good idea.

"It's important that we are as open and informative with the public and students as we can be," Archbald said. "We wanted to put that information out to get people to be vigilant."

The UMPD is encouraging anyone with knowledge of the fire or who may have contributed to the Brett fire to contact the force.

Students can contact UMPD detectives at 545-8093 and call also register confidential tips at 577-8477 or through the UMPD Web site at www.umass.edu/umpd.

'Extravaganja' protests for marijuana

By MORRIS SINGER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Huddled under umbrellas or soaking in the rain, protestors braved the elements Saturday to speak out on laws against marijuana at the University of Massachusetts Cannabis Reform Coalition's (CRC) annual Extravaganja rally.

The rally has been the feature event organized by the UMass CRC since its founding over ten years ago. Extravaganja usually brings between 500 and 1,000 marijuana enthusiasts and is one of the largest events of its nature in the state of Massachusetts, shadowed only by Boston's Freedom Fest, which often hosts about 50,000 people.

Extravaganja, which took place from 12 to 8 p.m. at the Amherst town common, attracted a crowd of no more than 150 people at any time, as supporters came and went throughout the day.

Bands played and guest speakers talked during the festivities, keeping protestors entertained and informed. The CRC also ran a raffle for two airplane tickets and hotel accommodations in Amsterdam for the annual Amsterdam Cannabis Cup. At the Cup, participants compete for a prize recognizing the person who grew the best strain of marijuana as determined by the attendees.

JASON COLLEGIAN

A protester at the Cannabis Reform Coalition's annual Extravaganja rally slides through the mud Saturday afternoon on the Amherst town common.

Aaron Wilson, one of the guests who spoke at the rally, said that the United States government is denying its citizens fundamental rights. One of the rights he talked about was the right to one's body.

"You have the right to your own body and no one, no government can tell you what to do with your own body," Wilson said.

At one point, several protestors dove into a pile of mud that had been softened by the heavy rains of the afternoon. Covered in dirt, they got back on their feet, danced to the music, and continued to dive periodically. Bystanders applauded their efforts.

The occasional smell of lit marijuana drifted by, although no arrests were made during the afternoon. Police concentrated on ticketing cars which were illegally parked, or which were parked without sufficient meter money.

According to Katie Mayer, a member of the UMass CRC, the protest is always a peaceful event.

"They [the protestors] don't cause any fights," she said.

Mayer said that the laws regarding marijuana are a violation of basic rights. She contested that a lot of people consume marijuana despite the laws. She also made analogies to the prohibition of alcohol during the 1920s.

"I think that the marijuana prohibition is a lot like the alcohol prohibition," she said.

Mayer said she thinks that this sort of event is effective in bringing about change. In Amherst, the laws banning consumption of marijuana were de-prioritized in 2000, she said. De-prioritization of a law means that the police are no longer required to enforce the law. Mayer feels that this action may help bring about the changes the CRC is looking for.

"Maybe it's a step in the right direction," she said.

Mayer blamed low turnout on the weather. The heavy rain and the cold temperature discouraged many people from coming, she said. She noted that many people remained at the rally despite the outdoor conditions.

"A lot of the people who have been here have been here all day," Mayer said.

Throughout the event, Mayer remained hopeful that the weather would clear up. A lot more people would have come to the event if the weather had been better, she said.

Ben Stein to speak on book tonight

Television host, author, actor, lawyer and speechwriter Ben Stein will speak tonight at the University of Massachusetts. The event, which is sponsored by the Republican Club as part of their spring events, will take place at 7 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Stein will speak on his latest book, "How to Ruin Your Life." He is also the host of the television game show, "Win Ben Stein's Money," which is in its seventh and final season. The show has been nominated for 25 Emmy's during its seven years. He has also appeared on CBS's "Star Search" as a judge alongside Naomi Judd, among others.

Ben Stein

"How to Ruin Your Life," according to Stein, has been his most popular book and has sold more copies than all of his other books combined. According to the St. Cloud State University Chronicle in St. Cloud Minnesota, the rules listed in his book included "self-discipline isn't necessary," and "envy everybody."

"This year we wanted to bring a speaker the whole campus could enjoy," said Republican Club President Christopher Carlozzi. "Ben Stein will certainly draw a crowd."

transgendered people on campus as far as they know, but the Restroom Revolution group doesn't want it to come to that.

Boucher said that what has occurred is a lot of verbal harassment and embarrassment for transgendered people on campus. He said that among the incidents that occur most often are girls running out of the bathroom yelling "There's a guy in there!" and people asking their other friends in the bathroom "What is it?" Trans people are also often told they are in the wrong bathroom.

In dorms, people can get written up for using the supposedly wrong bathroom, making it hard for trans people to use the facilities, according to Boucher.

"Which bathrooms should trans people be using so they don't get in trouble?" Boucher said.

As a result of these problems, Boucher said trans people avoid using the bathrooms as much as they can or travel all the way across campus to find one.

have a nickname that is representative of Massachusetts and its history.

The counter argument is that the Gray Wolf is an animal indigenous to the Bay State.

"I've never seen one," one focus group member said. "If they're around I don't know where they are."

Numerous witnesses remarked that the Gray Wolves logo looked strikingly similar to that of Northeastern's and Connecticut's Husky.

Another student athlete said the Phoenix representatives said they presented the same logos to a focus group of children (reported as ages 7-12) and another group of older alumni.

Apparently, the reaction to the Gray Wolves was positive from the youngsters and negative from the older alumni.

Nothing is set in stone, but McCaw said he hopes to have a resolution to the question by the end of May.

"In the final analysis, once they go through the focus groups, they'll present some recommendations to me," McCaw told The Gazette. "I'll run it by the Chancellor [John] Lombardi."

Beyond the focus groups, McCaw has yet to receive any kind of reaction from the student body and insists changes will have to be made if there is strong resistance.

"Right now we're just testing the waters," McCaw told The Gazette. "Whatever you come up with, if people don't embrace it, you have to change some things."

This is not the first time UMass has considered this type of change. If the Gray Wolves move goes through, it would be the fourth nickname in school history.

Up until 1947 the school was known as Massachusetts Agricultural College and used the Aggies nickname.

In 1948, a year after it became the University of Massachusetts, the moniker was changed to the Redmen.

In 1972, the school's teams became the Minutemen because of the racial nature of Redmen.

Delegation to order N. Korea to abolish nukes

By DANIEL COONEY
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) – On the eve of crucial Cabinet-level meetings between the two countries, South Korea said Saturday it will demand that North Korea abolish its nuclear weapons programs, while the communist state vowed to stand up to "U.S. imperialists."

A five-member South Korean delegation left for Pyongyang, North Korea, on Sunday for three days of talks.

"The talks are opening in a very difficult situation," said Unification Minister Jeong Se-hyun, South Korea's chief delegate. "The nuclear issue is going to take a considerable amount of time to resolve."

The meetings come just days after a senior U.S. official said North Korea claimed in talks this week in Beijing to have atomic weapons that it might test, sell or use, depending on U.S. actions.

South Korea "will strongly urge North Korea for the abolishment of its nuclear development and change of attitude at the Cabinet-level talks," the South's National Security Council said in a statement.

Officials had said they feared North Korea would cancel the meetings. The two Koreas scheduled Cabinet-level talks earlier this month, but did not meet after North Korea failed to confirm its participation.

Officials said an agenda for the talks would be decided Sunday during the first round of meetings.

The North's KCNA news agency on Saturday made no specific reference to Sunday's Cabinet meeting or recent developments in the nuclear dispute.

But in relatively common anti-American rhetoric, it said "the Korean people are standing up to the U.S. imperialists (who are) pursuing a hostile policy toward the DPRK and preparing another war of aggression under the pretext of the 'nuclear issue.'" DPRK stands for Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

KCNA also reported that a North Korean foreign ministry delegation left for Britain on Saturday, but did not say why.

The news agency accused the United States of committing more than 2,000 "serious provocations" against North Korea over the past decade.

"But the heroic Korean People's Army has decisively frustrated every provocation, reliably protecting the security of the country," KCNA said.

It listed a string of alleged incidents, including President Bush's labeling of the North as part of an "axis of evil" along with Iran and prewar Iraq, but nothing since the current nuclear crisis erupted six months ago.

In Tokyo, a senior U.S. envoy told Japanese officials Saturday that Washington was examining a new proposal offered by North Korea to settle the dispute.

Assistant Secretary of State James Kelly met with Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuo Fukuda, but refused to discuss the details of Pyongyang's proposal until he consulted with officials in Washington, a Japanese Foreign Ministry official said on condition of anonymity.

In Washington, the White House said it would confer with allies about possibly seeking U.N. sanctions against the North. In the past, North Korea has said it would consider international sanctions a declaration of war.

The U.N. Security Council expressed concern two weeks ago over North Korea, but did not discuss sanctions.

The talks in Beijing were the first high-level U.S.-North Korean contact since tensions over the North's suspected nuclear weapons programs spiked in October. That's when Washington claimed that the North said it had a secret nuclear program in violation of a 1994 pact.

North Korea subsequently withdrew from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and took steps to begin producing plutonium-based nuclear weapons, alarming its neighbors.

SARS shuts down entertainment

A couple wears masks as they wait at Beijing Railway Station yesterday. Thousands wore masks as they lined up to buy tickets to leave Beijing amid the SARS outbreak, which has killed at least 42 people in the city and infected nearly 1000. All schools and at least three hospitals in Beijing were closed.

By JOE MCDONALD
Associated Press

BEIJING (AP) – China shut down all theaters, cinemas and other places of entertainment in Beijing in an effort to curb the spread of SARS on Sunday.

The official Xinhua News Agency said the length of the closures would depend on progress made in combating severe acute respiratory syndrome, which has killed at least 42 people and sickened 988 in Beijing.

The city's entertainment businesses have already suffered severe losses as nervous Beijing residents shun public places for fear of catching the virus.

SARS has killed 122 people and sickened more than 2,700 across China.

Earlier Saturday, Health Minister Zhang Wenkang resigned amid criticism China's response to the outbreak was slow. Parliament assigned his duties to Vice Premier Wu Yi, the government said. Wu, China's highest-ranking woman, is a respected former trade envoy and already was the top official in charge of health care.

The closures are the latest in a series of increasingly stringent measures by authorities to contain SARS in Beijing.

At least three of the city's hospitals have been sealed off due to SARS infections, and thousands of residents have been placed under quarantine, some at home and others in hospitals.

At a meeting in the Malaysian capital, health officials from across Asia came up with a joint plan to fight SARS with tighter screening of travelers.

"We must use every weapon at our disposal," the regional director of the World Health Organization, Shigeru Omi, told health ministers and senior officials from Southeast Asia, China, Hong Kong, Japan and South Korea.

The health ministers approved a plan to boost screening at international departure points, bar travelers with SARS symptoms and require health forms for visitors from affected countries.

The worldwide spread of SARS has been blamed on travelers in Asia, particularly in Hong Kong and southern China, where the flu-like disease emerged last fall.

"Should SARS continue to spread, the global economic consequences could be great in a closely interconnected and interdependent world," Malaysian Health Minister Chua Jui Meng said.

Chua said the measures approved by the ministers would be presented to national leaders at a summit next week before being implemented formally.

Elsewhere, Hong Kong health officials reported 17 new cases of SARS infections Saturday, the lowest daily figure this month, but they said it was too early to know whether the disease was coming under control. For more than a week, the daily number of new cases had been between 20 and 30.

India reported its fifth case of SARS on Saturday, further raising fears the disease could spread swiftly among the country's more than 1 billion people, most of whom have inadequate health care.

Worldwide, SARS has killed more than 290 people and sickened more than 4,800. In the United States, there have been 41 cases but no deaths.

The World Health Organization confirmed Saturday it is reconsidering the travel warning it issued last week for Toronto, where SARS claimed a 20th Canadian victim on Saturday.

Toronto, Canada's largest city, is the epicenter of the biggest outbreak of SARS outside of Asia.

Saturday's meeting in Kuala Lumpur and next week's summit of Southeast Asian leaders in Thailand could determine the future course of how nations tackle SARS, said the WHO's Omi.

"The threat posed by SARS is unprecedented," Omi said. "The virus has already demonstrated its explosive power to cause sudden outbreaks in a large number of countries. Tourism has almost disappeared, normal life has been seriously disrupted."

China's Deputy Health Minister Huang Jielu said the meeting underscored the need for Asian countries to be "united together as a team to fight the epidemic."

Elsewhere, the debate over how to treat the flu-like illness intensified. Medical experts from Singapore and Canada – both with SARS outbreaks – have questioned Hong Kong's use of a drug treatment.

Hong Kong says most SARS victims have shown good responses to a combination of the antiviral medicine ribavirin and steroids. But global health officials have doubts and doctors from Singapore and Canada said late Friday they have not seen good results from those drugs.

Possible mascot changes need more student input

By next Fall, Minuteman fans might not be Minutemen at all.

There are plans in the works to possibly change the University of Massachusetts mascot to the Gray Wolves. The UMass Athletic Department has hired Phoenix Designs, which has created logos for other large colleges and universities, to evaluate the current Minuteman logo and to investigate new logos.

The designs have been presented to focus groups comprised of students, faculty, coaches, alumni, athletes and athletic fund representatives. Ian McCaw, Athletic Director, said the school hopes to have a decision by the end of May, and that nothing is set in stone yet. According to two members of the focus group, the only two options presented were the newly designed Minuteman logos and the Gray Wolves logo, which look similar to the Northeastern University and University of Connecticut Husky logo. Women in the focus groups tended to be for the change because they felt the Minuteman logo didn't properly represent them. Youngsters that were exposed to the logo liked it; however, alumni reflected on it negatively.

This isn't the first time that there has been a change to the school mascot. The school's first nickname was the Aggies, back when it was the Massachusetts Agricultural College. Then in 1948, the mascot became the Redmen, a year after the school became University of Massachusetts. In 1972, controversy over the racially charged name was changed to the Minutemen.

The change to the Minutemen should be the last change made to our mascot. The first change clearly had to happen because the school changed its name. The Redmen was also unacceptable, because of its prejudicial nature. The Minuteman mascot was a good choice since it reflects a historical aspect of the Commonwealth that no other state has. With something this unique, why change it to a logo that resembles two of our rivals?

There is a case to be made that the Minutemen mascot doesn't represent our women's teams and is thus sexist. The mascot is very gender-specific; the costumed figure dancing on sports fields is clearly of a white male's image. However, to say the only place one will find this type of male gender specification depicting an entire campus is absurd. There are many areas where the fight for women's representation is more crucial. Look at faculty staff numbers and throughout campus organizations – areas and policies that directly affect the way women live their lives on this campus.

Why are sports team names and mascots under such fire while these areas remain, largely, unexamined? Could not activists advocating for the new mascot instead examine ways to eliminate sexism in its daily workings (especially with concern to any of our women's sports teams) rather than change a simple name and image and falsely proclaim sexism conquered?

There are many different opinions on what should happen to the school mascot. However, clearly a decision cannot be made without more student input. A few focus groups cannot speak for the entire campus; now that the news is out, we at The Collegian hope concerned students will begin airing their opinions.

Besides, if we changed it, what would we do with that statue by the pond?

Rallying for our education

S. J. Port

On Tuesday there will be a rally in the name of public higher education in Massachusetts on the steps of the State House in Boston. If you are a student, faculty member, staff member, or family member, please attend this rally. It is your education, your job, your family member's education or job that is at jeopardy when the legislature decides its budget for the fiscal year 2004 and beyond. Without state money, UMass and the 28 state colleges and community colleges cannot function. Without effort to show pride and the need for these institutions the state will not financially support public higher education. Public higher education must be thought of as an investment for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Institutions of public higher education educate 62 percent of the workforce in Massachusetts. More than 60 of the 200 members of the Massachusetts legislature hold degrees from Massachusetts state schools, local community colleges, and the University of Massachusetts system. However, despite owing the opportunity for higher education to state schools, these members of the legislature continue to vote for cuts to public higher education and members of the publicly educated workforce continue to elect them.

The House budget for fiscal year 2004 proposes to cut 20 percent of current funding for the state's higher educational system, an 18 percent funding cut for the UMass system.

Current funding is not level funding. Current funding is the degree of funds we as a system receive following the budget cuts of fiscal year 2002 and 2003. Level funding for higher education is a dream, but how low does the legislature expect us to go before we cease to function?

In the last decade the Commonwealth has dumped money into the K-12 educational program to better the general education in elementary schools across the state and across economic divides. This year the K-12 program will receive hard cuts as well, but students who were in the first K-12 boom often, according to Stephen P. Tocco, president of the Massachusetts Board of Education, have no choice but public higher education due to financial constraints. Tocco feels that, "We are often walking our kids off a cliff" by setting them up well in lower grades and then poorly funding the higher education that the children are working towards.

"In a state where public higher education competes with private higher education like no other place, public education and the citizens of Massachusetts are losing out."

Education is the foundation for the modern world. The level and form of education an individual earns is often a predictor for their success. Funding for education from kindergarten through graduate school must become a priority for legislators, citizens, taxpayers, voters and reformers in Massachusetts and the nation.

In a state where public higher education competes with private higher education like no other place, public education and the citizens of Massachusetts are losing out. As private tuitions skyrocket so has public schools' tuitions despite its goals of affordable and accessible education for all those unable to afford or even contemplate private education prices (a group which constitutes the majority of citizens). If costs continue to increase across the spectrum of education it will become a privilege for only the wealthy few. This elitist inaccessibility is what public education has struggled against, and the battle it is losing because of poor state and public financial support for the institutions.

When the House's proposed budget for FY '04 was released last Wednesday administrators at UMass and other institutions called emergency meetings. UMass Lowell immediately laid off 184 people. Suggestions have been made that UMass will be forced to lay off 1,000. Chancellor Lombardi has said that the cuts are an "unacceptable reduction for our University and our campus and all of us will need to speak forcefully to our legislators to persuade them that this proposal must be improved." Ernest May, secretary of the Faculty Senate, said that Lombardi told him privately, "we'll be first rate in whatever's left on campus!"

Despite promises that academics and athletic departments will be left in place, one can only imagine where then the cuts will take place. More administration will probably be hired to consulate and confirm how the cuts should be dealt out, despite promises to reduce administrative spending. But for students the basic questions remain: what and who will be left when the dust of state budget cuts settle?

Dan Barrett

The most dangerous slogan used during the war with Iraq was "No Blood For Oil." It was dangerous because it promoted a myth, a myth that stays with us today: the profit for the oil industry was the driving force behind the war. The danger is not only that anti-war protestors bought into this lie, but so did members of Bush's administration. We need to separate the truth from the myth as soon as possible, or we're all going to pay for it.

The lie goes something like this: Bush used the war as an excuse to seize Iraq's oil reserves, acting under the influence of the American oil industry. The truth is far more complex, though not, perhaps, more comforting.

The U.S.'s original plan saw oil as a strategic resource, not an economic one. Bush's neo-conservative inner circle, including Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz, the Secretary General to the Vice President Lewis Libby, and Douglas Feith, the Undersecretary of State for Defense, formulated a plan based on quickly increasing Baghdad's stagnating oil production. The market would then flood with Iraqi oil, causing a crash in oil prices. OPEC (the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries) would be crushed, the economies of unfriendly states such as Iran, Syria and Libya would be ruined, and in so doing more opportunities for regime change and democratization would present themselves throughout the middle east.

This is where the anti-war movement missed the point. American oil companies, who spend almost 15 times more to drill one barrel of oil than their Iraqi counterparts, would be destroyed in such a crash. Multi-national oil companies diversify production, and so have less to worry about; even these mega-corporations lobbied against the U.S. proposal. Bush wasn't listening to the oil industry; he was ignoring them.

It wasn't corporate influence that eventually made Bush to retreat from his original plan; it was economic reality. Though Iraq sits on one of the world's largest oil reserves, it currently produces only 2.5 million barrels of oil a day (MBD), compared to Saudi Arabia's 10-plus MBD. Even before the Gulf War, Iraq had never produced more then 3.8 MBD. Dick Cheney, however, recently told newspaper editors that he hoped to have Iraq producing 5 MBD by the end of the year.

Higher production is good, but look at the price tag. Some estimate that to bring Iraq to an output of 5.5 MBD would take at least three years, require an $8 billion investment in facilities and another $20 billion of repairs. To put this in perspective, Iraq earns $15 billion a year from its oil. On top of this, Bush expects the Iraqi oil industry to pay for much of the cost of the war. His own estimates of the cost begin at $100 billion, added onto the cost of keeping troops in Iraq, which will cost between $12 billion and $45 billion annually.

Do the math. There is no way America can hope to control Iraq's oil industry; rebuilding it would cost too much. The only way we can ever hope to gain some kind of profit from Iraq's oil is to allow the Iraqis themselves to maintain control of their industry while opening up contracting to as many firms as possible, American and otherwise. This has nothing to do with justice or fair play; it is an economic necessity.

Even though neo-conservatives couldn't argue with the numbers, but they've still managed to let their ideologies get in the way of reality. We should have delegated responsibility to those who were running the industry before the war, those with active experience with the day-to-day realities of producing oil in Iraq. Instead, we've brought in American consultants to control the direction of the industry. This has alienated the very people we need. As Fadhil I. Chalabi, a former acting secretary general of OPEC from Iraq, said: "For the last 30 years, the Iraqis have run things themselves. Why should they accept foreigners?" A former Iraqi Oil Minister put it another way: "We did not work all those years to be on an advisory board."

Buying into the myth of "blood for oil" is dangerous, both for the administration and for those who oppose the war; dangerous for the administration because tampering with fragile economic forces can lead to unforeseen consequences, and dangerous for the opposition because it distracts us from the real issues. We have to give control of the oil industry back to the Iraqis, not for their sake, but for ours.

The death of good prose

Robert Carey

For thousands of years poetry has been written using specific devices. The chaotic randomness of life was captured in neatly formed lines of rhythm and meter.

However, in America, this changed. And in the past fifty years, poetry has turned into a formless mess. The traditional devices have mostly been thrown out by the younger generation of poets, and exchanged for an art form with all the thoughtless energy of a Jackson Pollack painting.

Art, in simple terms, conveys an idea. And in every kind of art there are a million different ways to express an idea. As artists we must find the best one that our minds can possibly come up with. This is hard. And as humans we have the shamefully inherent proclivity to shy away from what is difficult. This is why I have no sympathy for modern free verse poets, who write bad prose and pawn it off as legitimate work, of which there are UMass professors who are guilty. The greatest artists have always been those who have been capable of setting restrictions for themselves and finding ways of working successfully within these confines. Without restriction in art it is impossible to find that quintessential mode of expression.

Good art is chaos put into form. Formless art is a cheap reflection of life, which in all seriousness a chimp could reproduce. That is not to say there are not any good free verse poets: Emily Dickinson, Walt Whitman, and William Carlos Williams were all bards of the highest caliber. However, we know by the notes they left behind that they wrote out their veins to produce their well thought-out work. Later generations of poets would fail to realize this, and use free verse towards their own skothiul end.

Beat poetry in particular is guilty of this, and in many ways, signifs the end of credible free verse poetry, replacing it with volumes of stupefying work that has put lasting wounds on American literature. Today, every coffee shop and creative workshop we have are filled with young Allen Ginsbergs ready to spew out a mind-numbing 12-page poem of varying topic. Beat poetry and its offspring have corrupted themselves by the horrible "freedom" of their alleged verse, and have lazily thrown away any talent or ability that my be lying dormant in their minds. They produce line after line of drivel, in a pissed out stream of consciousness, and then laud each other's works for its ambiguity and its "flow."

"They produce line after line of drivel, in a pissed out stream of consciousness, and then laud each other's works for its ambiguity and it's 'flow.'"

The use of things like meter has been quite the bone of contention in English circles for the past century. I use them, because it forces me to step back and look at my work and write it again. Always hitting the meter is not important, when I see a way of writing something better that defies the meter I do so. You do, however, need to analyze your work in order to make it good, and meter will help you do this. The best poets were always the ones who could dissect and justify every aspect of their word usage.

Remember, a poem is meant to be read out loud; don't be afraid to use such tricky literary devices like chiasmus, alliteration, feminine rhythm schemes, or even crazy words like I—all of which perk up the ears, and send a sublime chill of enthusiasm down the spine.

Avoid writing long poems, especially if you're a young poet, like myself. Leave long poetry to the pros like Wordsworth and Keats. If you write a long poem go back and take a good objective look at it (by long poem I mean one more than 40 lines). Figure out what you can cut, and what can be better worded for brevity's sake. Most long poems I've read that were written by friends could be cut by several hundred lines.

I'm reminded of Gene Kelly. When he danced it seemed effortless, as if he was just naturally gifted. However, each one of his dancing scenes was the arduous result of hundreds of attempts, and an insane amount of anticipation. A poem should be the same way. It must be re-written a thousand times, pulled to pieces, and attacked by its creator from every angle. In the end, what you have is a string of words that elegantly flow into one another in what appears to be an effortless manner. In other words, good art is seamless.

Letter to the Editor:

SOM strikes out big on Earth Day

To the Editor:

On Thursday, April 24, while environmental groups around the globe were celebrating a week of Earth Day events, Honda and the school of management thought it would be appropriate to do some shameless plugging and PR campaigning for SUVs. This tactic of using legitimate campaigns or social movements to cleanup corporate images is something that corporations have been doing for years. When companies use images of genuine rebels like Jack Kerouac, Ghandi, and Martin Luther King, Jr. to sell "corporate cool" products like Gap pants and Apple computers, or car manufacturers and oil companies promoting Earth Day and using images of pristine wilderness in their ads, it can turn the stomach of the most hardened cynic. Companies have become so brazen about their abuses of power and indifference to public interest that they don't even bother hiding their paradoxical slogans and philosophies: Have fun on Earth Day in your new SUV! We've let these commercial messages dominate our mental and cultural environments to the point where, after a while, anything begins to make sense: Peace through War!

Although Honda's new "Element" is more fuel-efficient than your average SUV (15 Mile Per Gallon), Earth Day is about conservation and alternative energy, not about buying more products or replacing environmentally defective products with more "PR friendly" versions. Besides, our University is not a company's mouthpiece or promotional tool. It's like having Coke sponsor the Save UMass Campaign. We could have slogans like, "Save Higher Ed and Drink More Coke." That's catchy!

If I were the teacher in charge of this hackneyed bunch I would fail them all. Grade F. Then I would pack up and spend a year or more hiking around Tangiers (like good ol' Jack K. and the Beat Generation gang) contemplating a new "life's direction" wondering how I let those swine do me in.

What do you know of your 'g-spot?'

Sex-iversity

Sara Brumfield& Winnie Chen

Question: Where are the female and male "G-spots?"

Response: OK, I'd just like to say nothing is guaranteed and while this information is not technically hearsay, it shouldn't be taken as universal facts, because let's face it; everyone is different.

Also, nothing works better to pleasure you and your partner more than communicating about what does and doesn't feel good. It's often said but not followed through nearly enough. Figuring out what you like is important, not just with your partner, but it's good for you to know on your own. Exploration that you're comfortable with can really help you in telling your partner what you do and don't enjoy. Hey, it's your body; if you're going to be engaging in sexual activity, it should not only be mutually agreed upon and safe (always use condoms and contraceptives), but also enjoyable for all people involved.

THE FEMALE "G-SPOT"

In addition to the clitoris (which is actually more than just a "bump" near your vaginal opening but rather a fairly extensive organ), there is the long disputed "g-spot." Before we explain the "g-spot," let's mention that the clitoris is located in varying distances of a few centimeters (depending on the woman's body make-up) above the vaginal opening toward the pubic region. It's under a fold of skin that reveals erectile tissue that swells when stimulated. There is actually more to the anatomy of the clitoris, but our focus right now is on the "g-spot." It just seems important to briefly explain where the clitoris is located in case you were wondering and unsure.

The "g-spot" for females was named after a German physician in the 1950s, named Dr. Ernst Grafenberg. He wrote an article about, "an erotic zone on the anterior wall of the vagina along the course of the urethra that would swell during sexual stimulation." Prior to Dr. Grafenberg's article, a Dutch anatomist referred to a substance called, "the female prostate."

To explain it more simply, the "g-spot" is found inside the vagina on the upper wall toward your belly button. Along the upper wall, you find a hard "ridge" with textured skin beyond it. This region is what is traditionally considered the "g-spot." It should be noted that it doesn't always have pleasurable effects for everyone; it is only said to have had stimulating effects for some women.

THE MALE "G-SPOT"

It has long been known that the prostate is a source of heightened sensitivity and a pleasure point for men. The prostate is defined as a firm, muscular gland (actually a group of glands) that surrounds the urethra near the outlet of the bladder. The prostate's principal function appears to be manufacturing fluid that constitutes a portion of the semen.

This gland is located inside the anus, which is why anal sex is considered pleasurable for men, because during stimulation or penetration, pressure is placed on the prostate, giving heightened pleasure to males. The male "g-spot" is based similarly on this principle, but found on the exterior of the male body under the scrotum in between the testicles and anus.

The pressure point is a small, harder textured bump that is the closest point the prostate comes to the surface of the male body without being inside the anus, hence being a point of pleasure for many men.

Again, like the female "g-spot," this is not a point of guaranteed pleasure; it depends strictly on the individual.

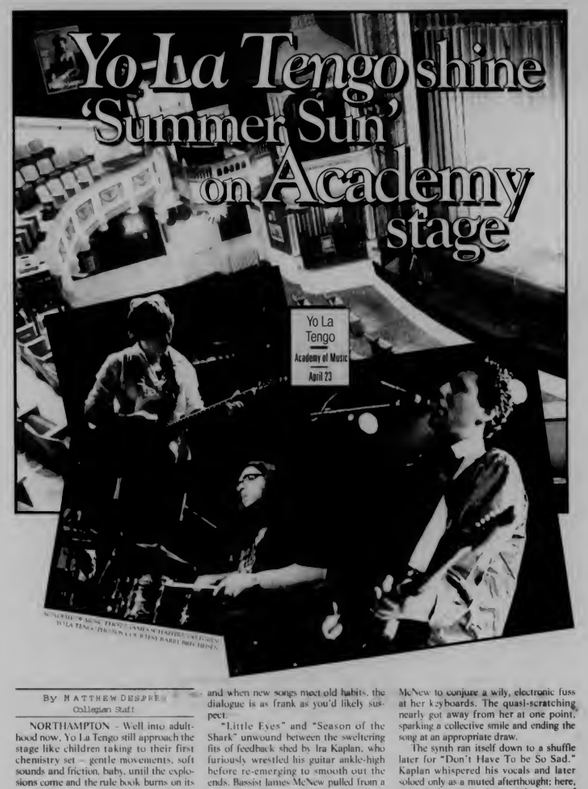
If you and your partner are comfortable, exploration of these areas may bring new dimensions to your sexual intimacy. If you find you are not one of those aroused by "g-spots," it's not a big deal. First, testing it out should not hurt, and if you discover it's not for you, finding your own personal erogenous zones can give you a better sense of your sexual preferences and desires so that you may fulfill them for yourself or share them with your partner.



In fact, even if the "g-spots" work for you, it's a good idea to figure out what other different things you enjoy. Remember, have fun, be safe, and always only engage in activity you are comfortable with.

Yo La Tengo shine 'Summer Sun' on Academy stage

By MATTHEW DESPER
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON – Well into adulthood now, Yo La Tengo still approach the stage like children taking to their first chemistry set – gentle movements, soft sounds and friction, baby, until the explosions come and the rule book burns on its way out the window.

The trio revolved around the transformed stage of the Academy of Music like a jigsaw puzzle on Wednesday, settling into the old movie house and playing it like a modern day Globe Theater. Each seat was brought into the round and every ear called on as a blind witness, testifying – with a bit of patience – to the character of a band absorbed in the moments of its own design.

Much has been made of Yo La Tengo's relative turn inward, particularly since the sedate sounds it began warming up to on 2000's "And Then Nothing Turned Itself Inside Out" proved to be more than just a one-album whim. The band has thrived creatively in the immediacy of that hushed environment, though, and unpacks its work onstage with a grinning sympathy for our floundering attempts to set it against the band's noisier past. Their latest, "Summer Sun," set out happily indifferent to the path its predecessors had otherwise suggested it take, and when new songs met old habits, the dialogue is as frank as you'd likely suspect.

"Little Eyes" and "Season of the Shark" unwound between the sweltering fits of feedback shed by Ira Kaplan, who furiously wrestled his guitar ankle-high before re-emerging to smooth out the ends. Bassist James McNew pulled from a more internal source, pitching out deep couplets that Georgia Hubley used as a reference all evening. Her drumming traced strong outlines in the mix that she later colored with shimmering cymbal work, a terrific one-two punch still trumped by the unassuming affection she shared through the almost unnaturally gorgeous hum of her voice.

It's a delicacy she later took a playful jab at on the vocal-less "Georgia vs. Yo La Tengo." Though it only partially lived up to the title-card billing, the song bettered its studio half when Hubley turned her back to Kaplan and McNew to conjure a wily, electronic fuss at her keyboards. The quasi-scratching nearly got away from her at one point, sparking a collective smile and ending the song at an appropriate draw.

The synth ran itself down to a shuffle later for "Don't Have To be So Sad," Kaplan whispered his vocals and later soloed only as a muted afterthought; here, it was the sparsely paced piano of Hubley's design that delivered the song's most moving lines.

Only the building itself shortchanged the band. Although it provided a number of unique visuals, the Academy's sound proved to be an elementary problem all evening; vocals went missing off and on and Kaplan's skipping chord changes on "Tiny Birds" disappeared altogether. A shame when, for a band like Yo La Tengo, the wealth was in the details.

It took openers Portastatic three shots to find a voice, and soon after that, the one-trick hand folded. It was verse-chorus-solo-repeat for 40 minutes. While their bassist did his best to maximize the boom end and emphasize the notes themselves, the songs were still see-through when all was said and done.

Plagued by the same sound problems that Yo La Tengo walked into, it was the sameness of their set that muddied the evening rather than the P.A. Not offensive, but done before – and better.

Time to face the big job interview

Running with Scissors

Melissa Hammel & Lizzy Nielsen

The ladies of "Running with Scissors" know how stressful finding a job can be (after all, we're doing it ourselves), so we have decided to provide you with some advice on how to get through it. Even if you aren't a graduating senior, this is useful advice for anyone who has to hit the job market, even if it is just in search of summer employment.

DRESS THE PART

Sad but true, people are more often than not judged on their appearance, and job interviews are no different. No one is interested in hiring a new employee who comes in looking and smelling like a homeless person on a bad day. Therefore, anyone who is going on a job interview should be very careful about his or her appearance. Ladies, this means no ripped stockings, polished shoes and a nice suit.

When it comes to perfume, make-up and hairspray, keep them to a minimum. You want to wow the interviewer with your resume, not with your perfume. This is not to say that you should not shower, wear deodorant and lightly spray on something. As you know the ladies of "Running with Scissors" always advocate showering for every social occasion, and this is no exception.

Guys, the same holds true for you. You need to dress the part for your job interview. This means a suit and a conservative tie. Do not show up with your Simpsons tie on or that tie you have with the little guitars that your friends think is cool. Try to be sure your suit fits and is not the same throwback that you got when you were going to your junior prom.

STAY CALM

People have been known to do the strangest things when they are nervous. One half of the "Running with Scissors" duo has a tendency to talk on and on about her shoes or other useless things when she is nervous; other people just stop speaking all together. Because job interviews induce nerves in even the calmest individuals, be sure to take a few deep breaths and think through any questions before you answer them. A good way to relax your nerves is to go over some possible questions ahead of time so you are prepared for them in the actual interview.

BE PREPARED

There is nothing worse than going into a job interview without knowing anything about the company you are applying for. It is similar to going to a dinner party and not knowing the host or hostesses name. Doing a little research prior to the interview shows not only that you are interested in the company, but that you are also willing to take initiative and do your homework.

Tasteless adventurers steal screen

Could 'The Real Cancun' be lacking in its realism?

By JAKED. LEWIS
Collegian Staff

Well, it's official. Reality programming has now moved from the small screen to the silver one. It's not a surprise that producers of MTV's long-running show "The Real World" were the ones to make the transition, but let's not forget last year's "Jackass: The Movie" either. While that too wasn't scripted, per se, it seemed to have more filmic direction to it than

COURTESY JERE CHILDERS

"The Real Cancun" may not be as real as it bills itself. Typical "wild" interactions leave room for plenty of doubt.

"The Real Cancun"
Directed by Rick de Oliviera
New Line Cinema

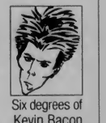
this year's voyeur fest, "The Real Cancun."

Shot, edited and shipped off in a mere six weeks to theaters nationwide for drooling teen boys, the movie is a random smorgasbord of wet t-shirt contests, bed-hopping and loud concerts by popular musicians who sing/rap about "not wanting to grow up" and "group sex" (courtesy of A Simple Plan and Snoop Dogg). In other words, "The Real Cancun" is just your average "Girls Gone Wild" mixed with "MTV Spring Break" and spiced up with a dash of attention-focusing Ritalin.

Our cast, comprised of a handful of beautiful young women and studly, buff guys, all spend seven days in the idyllic Mexican hotspot, living together, and thus forming friendships as well as animosities. Paul is crushing on Skye, who refers to herself as "the token black girl," but holds out on him sexually. Laura is enamored with Jeremy, who quickly uses her for you-know-what, then breaks her heart by sleeping with a different girl each following night. Sarah has a boyfriend back home who "treats her like a Princess" but she lusts after Matt...and so on.



Also included in the randy bunch are identical twins Roxanne and Nicole (who show off all their assets); Jorell, who has a thing for big-butted midgets; life-long best friends Heidi and David, whose sexual tension is put to the test (and who duet an amusing song about growing up in the 80s); and finally Allan, a guy who sticks out like a sore thumb, never having had a drink in his life or scored with a chick. Of course, he's been cast so the film can represent "all kinds of people," but before long he's just your average Joe Schmoe.

Allan seems to kindle a more lasting relationship with some Irish girl he picks up on the beach, and the two geeks are cute together, but it seems almost too planned – dare I ask if "The Real Cancun" is somewhat staged?

In case "The Real Cancun" isn't enough eye candy for your appetite, have no fear – a second coogle-palooza is headed to theatres, aptly called "Spring Break: The Movie." When will they learn? Move to the point, when will I learn not to contribute to this kind of movie's success? Sure, these movies cost next to nothing to make – no-name stars and a built-in audience – but isn't one enough? Heck, even one's too much.

What I'd like to see is a Spring Break movie about things that kids like me who can't afford to go that far away do: Work for a living and spend a few days at home with Mom.

Palmer headlines NFL Draft

Carson Palmer, right, a quarterback from USC, holds up a Cincinnati Bengals jersey with NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue after the Bengals selected him No. 1 overall in the NFL draft.

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – The true measure of the NFL draft doesn't come for several years. How teams addressed their needs is more discernible.

JOB WELL DONE

Two teams desperately needing a playmaker on offense got them, as Detroit went for WR Charles Rogers and Houston grabbed WR Andre Johnson. Last year, both clubs got their franchise quarterbacks, Joey Harrington in Detroit, David Carr in Houston.

Baltimore found a nice fit for its defensive schemes in DE Terrell Suggs, whose pass-rushing skills will fit well in front of Ray Lewis. Then the Ravens made up for not getting Byron Leftwich by selecting QB Kyle Boller to fill a major hole – even if it cost them their 2004 first-rounder.

Dallas bolstered its emerging secondary with CB Terence Newman, a nice addition to a young unit that got safety Roy Williams a year ago.

Jacksonville needed a quarterback for the future, and Leftwich fits nicely behind Mark Brunell – for a while. Plus, the Jaguars stole him away from the Ravens.

Carolina, whose offensive line has been in flux for years, will get some stability from tackle Jordan Gross, the highest-rated blocker in the field.

St. Louis couldn't have expected DT Jimmy Kennedy to fall to 12th overall. When he did, the Rams pounced on what should be a rare defensive playmaker for them.

Pittsburgh's secondary has been a sieve, and an aggressive safety was needed. The Steelers moved up 11 positions and got the right guy in Troy Polamalu.

Chicago played the bartering game well, moving down from No. 4, yet winding up with a likely starter in DE Michael Haynes and a future QB in Rex Grossman.

The Giants were happy to see DT William Joseph slip to No. 25; New York has an uncertain situation at the position with Keith Hamilton coming off a torn Achilles' tendon.

After addressing some of their many defensive needs in free agency, the Chiefs showed their concern about Priest Holmes' recovery from a hip injury by taking RB Larry Johnson. Getting him at No. 27 after trading down was a strong move.

Tennessee lost out on Larry Johnson, who would have been a good fit to groom behind Eddie George, but immediately turned to another weak area in taking CB Andre Woolfolk.

Green Bay's linebacking unit was decimated this offseason, so quick LB Nick Barnett was a good fit.

Miami, concerned about getting younger and more efficient at outside linebacker, was fortunate was find Eddie Moore on the board at No. 49. Moore's quickness should help.

As if Tampa Bay needed more defensive help, it picked a pass-rushing end, Dwayne White who will fit perfectly as a situational player. Nice usage of the final pick in the second round.

WHAT WERE THEY THINKING?

Minnesota couldn't swing a deal or make a pick in its allotted 15 minutes, a faux pas rarely seen in the opening round. Although the Vikings didn't get burned too badly by taking DT Kevin Williams of Oklahoma State, they were playing a dangerous game. The deal they thought they had done – with Baltimore – came with 32 seconds left on the clock, not enough time to get it approved.

Arizona traded down from sixth overall to get the 17th and 18th choices from New Orleans. The Cardinals, who need a wide receiver, chose Bryant Johnson of Penn State, who figured to be available much lower in the round, and DE Calvin Pace, who probably would have been available in the second round. Or the third.

Moving up to No. 6 to get one of the many quality DTs made sense for New Orleans. But taking Johnathan Sullivan, who likely would have been around at the Saints' original position of 17, was strange.

For the second straight year, San Diego went for a cornerback, Sammy Davis, at No. 30. They had bigger needs at safety, on both lines and perhaps even at wideout.

MIXED BAG

Carson Palmer is a hot prospect coming off a superb year, but there are enough questions about him being a franchise quarterback that taking him No. 1 overall was a dicey move for Cincinnati. Trading down in a draft full of trades might have been wiser, but did anyone else really want the top spot?

Buffalo might have made the biggest gamble of the draft by taking RB Willis McGahee, who comes off a serious knee injury in January and may not be ready for this season. But the Bills have Travis Henry and can be patient with McGahee.

The Jets dealt two first-rounders to move up to fourth overall, where they got the versatile DT they need in Dewayne Robertson. But they might have been better served holding onto both picks and helping themselves at linebacker or receiver, too.

Seattle probably got a starter in CB Marcus Trufant, but the Seahawks need bulk on their defensive line and passed on several tackles.

Philadelphia, looking for a replacement for departed free agent DE Hugh Douglas, probably didn't need to move up all the way to No. 15 to get Jerome McDougle of Miami.

New England wanted DT Ty Warren so much it traded a sixth-round spot to move up one position for him. That was it in the first round as the Patriots traded their other choice to Baltimore and got that 2004 first-rounder.

Cleveland bolstered what has been an inconsistent offensive line with Notre Dame center Jeff Faine, who also might have lasted longer than 21 spots.

Tackle George Foster should help the Broncos down the road as the No. 20 pick, but he is raw and has had a history of injuries.

Although the Colts had a need in the secondary, they opted for a second tight end in Dallas Clark. Indianapolis felt its offense was hurt by an inability to run two-tight-end formations for Peyton Manning in 2002.

Stanford tackle Kwame Harris should invigorate San Francisco's aging offensive line. But the 49ers passed on one of the top wideouts available.

Unconventional as always, the Raiders took two projected second-rounders in California safety Nnamdi Asomugha and Colorado DE Tyler Brayton. Maybe they were reaches, but both address problem areas.

Washington coach Steve Spurrier has been criticized for his devotion to players from his former job at the University of Florida. Yet he took another Gator, WR Taylor Jacobs, with the Redskins' first choice, 44th overall.

A win for the ages

After the game, a lot of alumni came up to us," Schell said. "One by one, they said to me, 'That's huge.' They said to me, 'I couldn't do it,' but this group right here, we did it. That's something to be proud of."

"For the alums, it means a lot to those guys, because they weren't able to get it done," Cannella said. "Those guys are thanking us. I'm one of them, and I'm thanking these guys too. It's really important for the alums and our guys now to realize that we got it done."

And maybe it wasn't just that they won, but how they won that made the rainy afternoon all that much more significant. Four times in their 21 game losing streak to the 'Cuse did the Minutemen lose by one goal, including a 1998 overtime heartbreaker at the Carrier Dome. So for Cannella, who had never won an overtime contest prior to Saturday, watching his team play its heart out for 59 minutes and 55 seconds only to see a Sean Lindsay goal negate their efforts and send the contest to overtime certainly brought the past to mind.

"Oh yeah [I was thinking about '98]," he said. "In my mind, and in the back of every alum's mind ... we want to beat Syracuse. I hadn't been able to do it in my playing career or coaching career."

So when Zvolski slipped a shot past Syracuse keeper Ian Pfeifer and 2,300-plus came pouring on to Garber Field's sopping wet turf for a celebration over two decades in the making, it was more than just excitement. It was all the aforementioned Minuteman greats, past and present, and their families, friends and fans finally exercising 21 years worth of demons. It was about solidifying Amherst on the major college lacrosse map, and it was an obstacle overcome in the quest for a national title. But more than anything else, it was about a team; 34 players and four coaches. UMass lacrosse nation is rejoicing because of what these young men accomplished, and rightfully so. They broke the streak that no one else could, and that is something that can never be taken from them.

Matt Garcia soaks up the moment following the Minutemen's sudden death overtime win over Syracuse.

OT win UMass' first over 'Cuse in 21 years said. "We've done a good job with that over the last five weeks. I'm very proud of what these guys have been able to accomplish in that part of our game."

The Orangemen dropped their third game in a row – ironically, the first time they have done that since the 1981 season – but have lost those games by a total of four goals.

"All in all, the guys played with a lot of fire," Syracuse coach John Desko said. "The guys that had been turning the ball over in the last couple games weren't in this game. I think we played a better game today."

Syracuse's Mike Springer was a thorn in UMass' side all game, leading all players with four goals in the contest.

"He shoots pretty hard," Schell said of the 6-foot-4 senior. "Sometimes he comes right over the top and puts it low. He's a taller kid, so it comes up high, and then he shoots down low, and it's hard to see."

But though Springer had a valiant effort, the Minuteman defense did an impressive job against Powell, last year's Tewaaraton Trophy winner, awarded to the nation's top lacrosse player. Freshman Jack Reid and his teammates held the attackman to just one goal on Saturday.

"I think it was a team effort," Cannella said. "Jack Reid covered him most of the game, but we had some switches. We have a lot of faith in our individuals and our team defense. Andy Shay continues to do an awesome job with those guys, preparing them each week for their opponents. I think it's more about the team defense than anything else. If you don't play team defense you're not going to beat a team like Syracuse."

Despite being overjoyed at topping the Orangemen, Leveille was quick to remind everyone of the other significance of Saturday's win. It all but assured the Minutemen at least an at-large bid in the NCAA tournament, and potentially a home game in the first round.

"It was another big game in a season of big games," he said. "We want to win them all and I think we have a lot of work in front of us. We're going to bear down and keep moving on. Maybe we'll have something bigger to celebrate."

UMass players storm Richard F. Garber Field in jubilation after Jeff Zywicki scored an overtime goal to give the No.4 Minutemen a 14-13 win over Syracuse. It was UMass' first victory over the Orangemen in 21 years.

A long time coming

UM finally beats 'Cuse

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

It was his 36th goal of the season, his first of the afternoon. It was a blistering shot high past the opposing goaltender, but in form it was not far different from a number of goals he had scored in his first 12 games of the year.

But this goal was different. Jeff Zywicki's goal with 1:10 to go in overtime accomplished something that no other Minuteman had done in 22 years — it toppled Syracuse.

Syracuse	13

"I had [Syracuse's Dan DiPietro] on me the whole game and he was on me in the overtime," said Zywicki, who leads the team with 55 points. "I just took him right, got a little step on him to the strong side and I just ripped it. It looked real nice, went top shelf, but it's a goal and a win and I'm just happy about that."

Seniors Kevin Leveille and Chris Fiore and sophomore Chris Doyle each scored hat tricks as the Massachusetts lacrosse team dumped the seventh-ranked Orangemen (7-5) in overtime, 14-13. It was the first time UMass (12-1, 3-1 Eastern College Athletic Conference) has beaten Syracuse since a 12-8 victory in 1981.

Co-captain Leveille, who has been downed by Cuse in each of his three varsity seasons, was overcome with emotion following the victory.

"I don't even know what it feels like right now," he said. "It hasn't really sunk in. I don't know. I don't know."

The Maroon and White trailed only once in the game and held a one-goal edge with just over a minute to play in regulation. But Fiore was called for a slashing penalty with 1:03 to go, giving Syracuse a one-minute extra-man opportunity and a chance to tie.

The Orangemen were thwarted on their initial shot sequence by the Minuteman defense, but following a timeout with just over 20 seconds to play, they set up the play they wanted. Junior and leading scorer Mike Powell found a cutting Sean Lindsay, who notched a point-blank goal to tie the game with 5.5 seconds to play.

"We told the guys going into the overtime period not to change the way they play," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "I thought we played under control pretty much the whole day, there were a couple instances where we played out of control and took some poor shots, but I thought we were very controlled at the end. We played great defense, and we didn't use a timeout. I thought we might use a timeout there, but the guys were under control. I had a lot of confidence in their ability out there in that situation."

Syracuse won the opening draw of the extra session and kept pressure on the Maroon and White defense, which held strong behind the lead of sophomore netminder Bill Schell (16 saves) and gave the home squad a chance to come away with its fifth straight victory, and second in a row over an opponent ranked in the top 10.

"Once we got the ball up the field and the offense got the ball I had total confidence in them," Schell said.

Despite giving up a late lead, the Minutemen kept positive going into overtime.

"Kevin [Leveille] has said it all season, especially in the last couple games," Zywicki said. "Not too high, not too low. We did it all game; we did it when they scored. You can't get down on yourself when you're losing, you can't get too high when you're winning. So [our mood] didn't really change that much."

We talk about that all the time — poise and composure is one of our keys to victory every week," Cannella

An epic win for players, program

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

An old sports adage states, "One game does not a season make." But don't let it fool you.

Don't let Greg Cannella fool you either. Or Bill Schell, or Kevin Leveille, or Saturday's hero, Jeff Zywicki. Don't let any of them paint a picture for you of how truly important the game, and the win, was for them.

Because as great as they'll all say it was, it was better.

Beating Syracuse, the defending National Champions, the premier lacrosse program of the last decade and one of the most prolific in college athletics, and a team they've lost to every year since 1981 not only made their season, it made their careers. And not only their careers, but those of each and every lacrosse player who has ever donned Maroon and White but couldn't beat the boys in Orange.

April 26, 2003 is a day Minuteman lacrosse will never forget. Because for all the past UMass greats who could never do it – from Sal LoCascio to Mark Millon, Tim Soudan to Scott Hiller – there are now 34 players and four coaches who can all say they have.

Crowd a major factor

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

The forecast was ugly. Amherst was due for torrential rain, thunder, and high winds, conditions barely suited for going outside, let alone standing in one wet spot for a couple of hours to watch a lacrosse game.

And yet, at least 2,362 people showed up for UMass-Syracuse Saturday, more if you include the students who were allowed in with a flash of their ID, and they were treated to a hard-fought, action-packed affair that ultimately ended with the home team victorious.

Of course, the day didn't start that way. A look at Garber Field revealed a meager showing just 10 minutes before the opening draw. The big green hill that provided a muddy grandstand for much of the student turnout was nearly empty.

The steel grandstand wasn't exactly packed either, and at first glance it looked like the audience for UMass-Syracuse XXVIII was going to consist of friends, family, and the diehards standing at midfield brandishing lacrosse sticks.

But as the starting lineups were announced, the masses began to shuffle in, and soon enough there was officially a throng sitting, standing, and sliding at Garber Field.

It didn't take long to produce a roar that could be heard through Southwest, either.

When Chris Doyle put one home just 52 seconds in, the people were in it, and in it for the long run, with soccer chants featuring Doyle's name echoing from the diehards. The Minutemen charged ahead, and held an advantage over Syracuse for much of the first half.

"For me, personally, it's a big deal to get out early," said junior Jeff Zywicki, who would turn out to be the other bookend on the UMass victory. "I feel like whenever we get a good lead going at the beginning of any game, we work off that, and it gives us confidence throughout the game."

The weather, which looked like it would hold off at the outset, began to let loose in the first half, and by half-time, the players, field, and over 2,500 faithful in attendance were soaked.

Despite a 10-9 Orangemen lead at the beginning of the fourth quarter, the fans didn't lose faith, and got so loud during one UMass rally that Syracuse coach John Desko couldn't get the referee's attention to call a timeout, and 10 seconds ticked away before he could finally scream loud enough.

When senior Chris Fiore took a slashing penalty with just over a minute to go, the crowd started to deflate, and as Syracuse scored the equalizer with 5.5 seconds to go, the raucous fans were suddenly filled with worry.

In the overtime session, Zywicki found the back of the net, and then found himself in the middle of a mound of soaked fans and players.

"It kind of hurt at the bottom of that pile," Zywicki said, although the smirk that crossed his face denied any pain.

Fans and players join in celebration on Garber Field after the Maroon and White's dramatic victory over the Orangemen.

Ben Stein visits UMass

Ben Stein meets students and signs autographs after promoting his book in the Student Union Monday night. The event was sponsored by the UMass Republican Club.

By Kelly Farrell
Collegian Staff

Ben Stein, famous for his role as the boring economics teacher in "Ferris Bueller's Day Off," discussed family, politics, show business and his book "How to Ruin Your Life" last night in the Student Union Ballroom.

Stein walked onstage wearing a suit, tie and a pair of Simple brand tennis shoes, as if he was torn between whether he should go skateboarding or attend a board meeting. His attire mirrored his onscreen personalities, which are often an interesting blend of monotony and dry humor, including roles in "Ferris Bueller's Day Off," "The Wonder Years" and Clear Eyes commercials, as well as the host of Comedy Central's game show "Win Ben Stein's Money."

Stein said he fit easily into these seemingly pigeonholed roles.

"I'm not really an actor," Stein said. "I only play myself. I can't play anyone other than myself."

Playing a dry teacher is not too far off the mark for Stein. Stein has taught at American University, University of California-Santa Cruz, Pepperdine University and other colleges. He has taught politics, security law and ethics for over 15 years.

"I'm just a teacher in real life. That's how I can be so boring," Stein told the audience of over 200 students.

Before acting, Stein spent three years as a trial lawyer and later became a speechwriter during both the Nixon and Ford administrations.

Stein refused to answer a stammered question posed by a student regarding how it felt to be at the White House during the criminal investigations of Watergate.

"It's too rude," Stein said.

Another student later rephrased the question, asking about what it was like to write presidential speeches.

Stein described his 14-hour work routine, which started in the late morning and was broken up by lunch, a nap and dinner.

Then Stein said, "I have strong feelings about Nixon. Even though I was a longhaired hippy freak, I wrote a lot of articles defending Nixon. I will never turn my back on a peacemaker, and that's how I feel about him [Nixon]."

As a lawyer and economist, however, Stein said he did not get to write the "cherrleading speeches like the 'I am not a crook' [speech]."

Stein discussed several of his political views. He requested a few moments of silence for victims of the American-Iraqi war, including military victims and innocent Iraqis.

"The first priority of this administration should be a living wage for the people who defend this country," Stein said after the moment of silence.

He said people should value all life, "whether it's in Iraq, Israel, Palestine or in the womb."

When asked if Hollywood was still dominated by liberals, Stein said, "Hollywood is not as leftist as it used to be ... but I don't really call them liberals. I call them Stalinists."

Stein didn't oppose all "Stalinists" though.

"I learned something great from a Democrat," Stein said as he quoted John F. Kennedy. "We all want God to do great things for this county ... God's work is our work."

Stein expressed support for the UMass Republican Club, particularly club member Olaf Arnuts.

"Olaf gave me a ride ... It's tough to drive close to the Campus Center because of the curbs. He just drove over the curbs. He takes care of things. Just from that, I think I could get him a job with the Bush Campaign 2004."

Due to Stein's dry sense of humor, it can be tough to determine when he is joking and when he is not. But the jokes were clear as he read excerpts from his comedic book of advice "How to Ruin Your Life" and the upcoming sequel "How to Ruin Your Love Life."

"Make sure your lover knows that affection is a chore," Stein advises. "You have to do it quick, because you have to get up early in the morning to shampoo the rug. There's no double meaning here."

Stein discussed love and family more seriously, as well.

"Even though I'm a fairly well-known person, a lot of people still put me on hold. My parents never put me on hold."

He suggested that students call their parents to say how grateful they are for their parents' help and upbringing.

"I think the best part [of Stein's speech] was about appreciating our parents," said Republican Club member Darren Giorgio. "... Do something like he [Stein] did when his parents were older ... listen to their stories ... we all need people to listen to our stories."

Walkout held to show support

By Jesse Hirsch
Collegian Staff

Hundreds of University of Massachusetts students, faculty and staff left classroom buildings yesterday and converged on the lawn next to the Student Union building to protest the huge budget cuts UMass is facing for next year.

The campus walkout was organized by labor unions across the state and was intended to draw attention to the ill effects UMass could suffer under the House of Representative's currently proposed 20 percent budget cuts.

The day's events started at 6 a.m., when concerned members of the local Service Employees International Union (SEIU) and the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) began picketing at eight academic buildings and five non-academic locations across campus.

The purpose of the picketing was to spread information about the proposed cuts, as well as the union contracts that have not been funded.

"Reactions have been nearly unanimous in terms of support for what we have been doing," said John Pepi, an SEIU member who works in the UMass physical plant. Stationed at the corner of Commonwealth and Massachusetts Avenues, Pepi struggled to be heard over the honking horns of passing cars.

At about 11:45 a.m., large clusters of people began gravitating toward the lawn next to the Student Union building for the scheduled noon rally. Many chants were heard, such as, "Show some guts, fight the cuts!" but the most common cry heard during the days events was "No work, no class, we're here to save UMass!"

This message, describing the mission of the walkout, was spread by a diverse cross-section of the campus community. According to the UMass press office, there were around 500 students and employees gathered for the rally and the march that followed.

President of the UMass Staff Association (USA), Donna Johnson, presided over the rally. She began by listing the messages of the day's walkout: The need to raise revenues, keep the campus going and include a student investment for the future of Massachusetts.

These suggestions were reinforced by other speakers at the rally. James Shaw, UMass graduate student and president of the local chapter of the United Auto Workers (UAW), told the crowd that Massachusetts has seen 42 tax cuts over the past 10 years. The cause, he said, was the current budget crisis.

According to Shaw and several other speakers, tax increases are what's needed to keep the campus going. And to get them, he said, "The time for begging has got to stop! The time for demanding has got to start!"

Another large focus of the walkout and rally was to prepare and recruit people for today, when over 400 students, faculty and staff are taking buses to Boston for a mass protest outside the statehouse. Johnson continually admonished the crowd to "get on the bus" and directed interested parties to the signup table on the Student Union steps.

Throughout the rally, a steady stream of people, primarily students, were seen at the table, paying the $5 fee for today's bus trip.

"We're already filled almost to capacity," said Robert Caldwell, treasurer-secretary of the campus GEO, "but we hope that even if the buses fill, people will drive, carpool or get there however they can."

All told, five people spoke at the rally, including African American Studies Professor John Bracey, who compared being a teacher at UMass to working at an automobile plant without tools. Then, when the speakers were finished, the large crowd marched to the Whitmore Administration Building to finish the day's proceedings.

These events are part of the larger Save UMass campaign, an effort to fight the $40 million budget cuts the state higher education system will potentially face next year.

In a statement made yesterday on these cuts, UMass Chancellor John Lombardi said, "The state's economic future depends on the ability of its public institutions of higher education to produce economically productive and successful citizens. ... Let every voice in the Commonwealth be heard in support of our colleges and universities."

Take Back the Night returns

By Ferron Salniker

"The speak-out will create a safe place for survivors to speak about experiences," said Carla Bedick, UMass junior and the event's main organizer. "A lot of people want to tell about experiences in hopes to help others."

Everywoman's Center counselor advocates and educator advocates, marked with reflective armbands, will serve as resources for anyone who needs them at both events this week.

Wednesday's event participants will meet at 7 p.m. at Haigis Mall for a march and then gather at the campus pond from 8:30 to 11 p.m. for a rally. The rally will include speakers Becky Lockwood, associate director of Rape Crisis Services and Violence Prevention Programs at the Everywoman's Center; La Wanza Lett-Brewington, Director of Community Education also from the Everywoman's Center, and Lisa Kidwell, a University of Massachusetts Police Department detective. After the speakers, guest DJs from UMass' radio station, WMUA 91.1 FM, will provide music for the rally.

"The Wednesday event is an opportunity to gather, to walk together, to hear people who work everyday to end violence against women, to be educated, to show our desire to end sexual assault in all its forms," said Sophie Magos, an organizer and campus educator from the Everywoman's Center. "It is an opportunity to discuss about social actions to end sexual violence, to celebrate and to be empowered."

The events were organized by a small group of students who have met every Wednesday since the beginning of the semester. The group is composed of students from different student organizations and some individuals.

VOX, a pro-choice organization committed to political activism, outreach, education and spreading awareness regarding women's issues, is one of

MassPirg cleans Mill River

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

The Mill River and the surrounding park on Hancock St. and Mill St. in Springfield is far from a pristine mountain stream. All kinds of trash had been scattered about the area, from shopping carts to hundreds of beer bottles and cigarette butts.

Last Saturday, as a part of its 2003 Earth Day campaign, MassPirg combined with the Massachusetts Community Water Watch and the local Springfield community to clean up the Mill River.

"We are combining with people who live near the Mill River who got active because the river is so polluted," said freshman Sarah Lee, the chapter chair of MassPirg.

Overall, more than 50 bags of trash were pulled out of the river and the surrounding park, as hundreds of candy wrappers, soda bottles, broken glass, liquor bottles, plastic bags and cigarette butts littered the scene.

In addition to the more common types of trash, six shopping carts, a coffee maker, two pairs of panties, a sofa, a fan, an air conditioner, 10 chickens with their heads cut off, two bicycles, a dryer, a knife and a number of dead pets were all cleaned up from the area.

On Monday, the Department of Public Works in Springfield picked up the trash free of charge.

"The rivers we've cleaned in Holyoke and Amherst have never been this trashed," said Nate Fry, the campus organizer of Water Watch and a graduate of the University of Wisconsin Oshkosh. "It's unfortunate that people have come to see their local waterway as a repository for their trash."

State Senator Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) opened up the event with a speech, thanking the 20 MassPirg members and the 10 members of the Springfield community for showing up, despite a pouring rain.

"I want to thank you for taking the time out and participating in the effort," Rosenberg said. "A lot of people say it doesn't matter ... but that is completely false. It only takes a small number of people to change the world."

The idea for the event came from Christopher McDonald, a Springfield resident and a member of the American International College football team.

Through his friend Pat Gottschlich, a senior at UMass and another resident of Springfield, McDonald was able to get in touch with MassPirg, and Fry organized the event from there.

"Pat said the river in his neighborhood was in bad shape, but that it could be a great community resource," Fry said.

Poor water quality is commonplace throughout Massachusetts, which has the worst water quality of any state in the country except New Jersey.

According to the Massachusetts Community Water Watch website, two-thirds of the lakes, rivers and streams in the state are too polluted for fishing or swimming.

"In summer, the water gets so bad it is worse than some third-world countries," Lee said.

The Mill River is no exception, and has some of the poorest water quality in the state.

"Rivers are geographical low points, so of course trash collects there," Fry said. "It's almost the case where the more trashed it is the more of an awakening students will have."

Despite the sheer amount of trash taken from the river, McDonald was pleased with the results.

"It went unbelievable," he said. "It was a great effort by everyone and we turned the park around.

"Hopefully, this encourages residents and neighbors to show a lot more respect," he added.

UMass MassPirg memebers and residents of Springfield teamed up to clean to Mill River in Holyoke. Among the trash recovered in the river were shopping carts, dead pets, bicyles and a dryer. Senator Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) appears at the far left.

Nation-building meeting for Iraq scheduled next month

By ELLEN KNICKMEYER
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – Delegates from inside and outside Iraq agreed Monday to hold a nation-building meeting next month and fashion a temporary, post-Saddam Hussein government that the United States predicted could be in place within days after that.

Iraq's new American administrators, charting the future of the land they invaded, secured the pledge to meet again in May from a multiethnic assortment of delegates. It represents the first specific timetable for trying to assemble the foundations of democracy in postwar Iraq and a more secure tomorrow.

"I think we have enough ... to come up with a road map," said U.S. envoy Zalmay Khalilzad, adding that an administration could be in place within weeks.

Monday's daylong conference coincided with a date that had been a national holiday: It was Saddam Hussein's 66th birthday.

"Today, on the birthday of Saddam Hussein, let us start the democratic process for the children of Iraq," the U.S. civil administrator for Iraq, retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, told delegates.

The conference brought together Shiite and Sunni Muslim clerics in robes, Kurds from the north, tribal chiefs in Arab headdresses and Westernized exiles in expensive suits. Still, some said Shiites, who make up 60 percent of Iraq's population, were underrepresented, and delegates generally agreed on a need for wider representation in the future.

Other developments in Iraq:

– The body of a soldier found after a convoy was ambushed in southern Iraq was identified as Army Spc. Edward John Anguiano, the last missing soldier in Iraq, the Pentagon said.

– A metal drum found in northern Iraq that initially tested positive for nerve and blister agents might instead contain rocket fuel, according to new tests, a U.S. chemical weapons expert said.

– America will not impose any government or culture on Iraq but will be a "steady friend" in forming a new democracy to replace Saddam Hussein, President Bush said in a speech broadcast across the Arab world.

– Three U.S. military positions came under attack in Mosul. U.S troops killed an Iraqi who tried to ram into a battalion command center and another who opened fire on an another command center elsewhere in the city. In the south of the city, assailants fired on an office that gives aid and information to Mosul residents. The information center was evacuated; U.S. forces sent in six tanks.

– Franks said coalition forces have begun recovering artifacts looted from Iraqi museums - thefts that sparked international criticism that the United States could have done more to protect such sites.

For a nation riven by a generation of autocratic rule, the notion of a broad leadership council appeared to gain ground, with many delegates endorsing it as the best path.

"We hope we can form a unified government, one that reflects the entire spectrum of Iraq," said Ahmad Jaber al-Awadi, a representative of the newly formed Iraqi Independent Democrats Movement.

Under Saddam, the all-powerful Baath Party barred dissent and effectively banned competing parties. Monday's meeting, like one in the ancient city of Ur earlier this month, pulled aside that monolithic facade to reveal a fractious land roiling with political agendas.

the student organizations involved. Volunteers from the Everywoman's Center have also been at the weekly meetings. The events' cosponsors are WMUA, the Women's Studies department and many other student groups.

Take Back the Night first appeared in Europe in 1976 and has continued throughout the world as a sign of empowerment for women, men and children.

"The mission of this event is to raise awareness on our campus about the issue of sexual violence," Major said. "Its mission is to let it be known that this violence, or any kind of violence, will not be tolerated in our community or anywhere else."

In case of rain, both events will take place in Campus Center, room 168C.

North Korea proposes disarmament in exchange for economic help

WASHINGTON (AP) – The United States is reviewing a North Korean proposal to give up the nation's missiles and nuclear facilities in exchange for substantial U.S. economic benefits, Secretary of State Colin Powell said Monday.

The North Koreans set forth the proposal last week in talks in Beijing that were focused on U.S. concerns about North Korea's weapons programs.

Powell called the meeting "quite useful" and said U.S. officials are comparing notes with South Korea, Japan, China, Russia, Australia and others. At the Beijing talks, China joined the United States and North Korea.

The North Koreans "did put forward a plan that would ultimately deal with their nuclear capability and their missile activities. But they, of course, expect something considerable in return," Powell said.

Powell's somewhat hopeful account of the meetings contrasted with initial accounts last week by other U.S. officials, who highlighted the negative aspects of the North Korean presentation.

These included a North Korean acknowledgment for the first time that the country possessed nuclear weapons and was contemplating exporting or even using them, depending on U.S. actions.

In South Korea, government sources were quoted in media reports as saying there were positive aspects of the North Korean proposal to make it worth pursuing further.

The North Korean offer to swap their military might in exchange for economic benefits echoed a similar proposal three months ago by President Bush.

Bush said then that if North Korea dismantles its nuclear weapons programs, the United States would be willing to assist the country with its food and energy needs.

A senior State Department official said the North made specific reference to its energy problems as part of a long wish list in return for which they would be willing to disarm.

Pyongyang's plutonium-based nuclear weapons program is well known to U.S. officials. The location of a uranium-based program, acknowledged by North Korea last fall, is not known.

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, APRIL 29, 2003 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Apple's new Music Store: Can a pay-per-song service work?

Apple Computer has just announced the next step in the constantly evolving world of online music downloads.

Apple will unveil its Music Store program, allowing users to download songs for 99 cents each. This also includes the ability to share the song on up to three computers and an unlimited number of Apple's portable MP3 players, known as "iPods."

Music Store will offer a library of more than 200,000 songs and allows users to store each file indefinitely.

In unprecedented fashion, Music Store also has the backing of each of the five major record labels.

Ever since the meteoric rise and fall of Napster, the big issue in the realm of online music has been the position of recording industry executives. These are the people who, through lawsuits, have effectively crippled Napster. Audiogalaxy and other music sharing programs. Kazaa and its peer sharing software are the latest to come under fire.

Apple will have no such legal battles, and much credit goes to CEO Steve Jobs. Jobs has been working hard at courting the music bigwigs to sign on with their approval of Apple's new program.

Evidence of his efforts are shown in that nearly two dozen artists, including Eminem and U2, who have never legally allowed their music to be downloaded, will have their work offered through Music Store.

Apple is also unveiling the latest iPod, which will have storage space of 30 gigabytes, or roughly 7500 songs. In addition, the device is both thinner and more lightweight.

Both those in the music industry as well as the millions of music fans who download songs online will be watching very closely what happens to Music Store. As it is the first major attempt to launch an independent downloadable service that has record label consent, Music Store should be free of all the lawsuits facing its competitors.

The question still stands as to whether people will pay money for the downloading of music, even if it is only 99 cents a song, when other programs will allow them to accomplish the same task for free.

Pressplay, a service jointly run by Sony and Universal, charges a monthly access rate of $9.95 to listen to music and a 98 cents per download fee. It and other services that charge for music have only yielded about 650,000 subscribers.

Whether Music Store is a success or failure, those with a stake in the online music world must find a way to thrive with industry approval. Even though Morpheus, a program similar to Kazaa, recently won a court battle in which judges ruled the company was not responsible for how its users used the program, the recording industry is planning an appeal.

Four college students, whose library topped over a million songs, are also in legal hot water, as the Recording Industry Association of America is demanding damages of $150,000 per song. This is extreme, but it only goes to show that the challenge for free online music is far from over.

According to Jobs, "It's not free, but it's 99 cents a song – pretty doggone close." Only time will tell whether the public will view things the same way. What is certain though, is that a partnership between both record executives and music fans is essential to online music's survival.

Keep the pledge in school

Lindsey Elder

"I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

I can remember starting every morning of school with this pledge. But sadly, it is a privilege and contribution to American pride and its history that future generations may never know. There's unsettled controversy over to recite or not recite the Pledge in our nation's schools. However, I question if you're willing to partake in our nation's resources without reservation, then why would one question if your ability to say you stand behind it?

For most people, the problem is not revering from making a statement of loyalty to the United States, but it is in the wording. The words "under God" were added on Flag Day, June 14, 1954 President Dwight D. Eisenhower authorized this change and justified it by saying, "In this way we are reaffirming the transcendence of religious faith in America's heritage and future; in this way we shall constantly strengthen those spiritual weapons which forever will be our country's most powerful resource in peace and war."

For those who claim the phrase "under God" as being another example of American enforcement of certain beliefs and faiths, keep in mind that the founders opposed the institutionalization of religion. They kept the Constitution free of references to God, as to not forget that the purpose of their coming to this country in the first place was freedom from religious persecution. The document mentions religion only to guarantee that godly belief would never be used as a qualification for holding office – a departure from many existing state constitutions. Erecting a church/state wall was a first priority when the Bill of Rights was added to the Constitution.

The main reason for the Supreme Court intervention in June 2002, the first since the Pledge's last revision in 1954, was the case of Michael A. Newdow, an Atheist from Sacramento, Calif. He was against his daughter in second grade being required to recite the Pledge of Allegiance, in turn, because he felt she was forced to acknowledge the existence of God. Did they actually think the recitation of the pledge, including the words "under God," by thousands of schoolchildren each day would somehow lead to the establishment of a state, or federal religion?

This lacks common sense. You are an American, and by saying the pledge does not make you any more of a supporter of a certain religion than would be for his daughter to acknowledge the existence of a church on her way home from school. A generic two-word reference to God tucked inside a rote civic exercise is not a prayer.

> "... I'd be willing to bet no one who claims to be offended by the Pledge of Allegiance would pass up a $20 bill on a matter of principal."

The Pledge of Allegiance should be recited in America's schools. The very fact that each of those students has access to an education, food to eat during lunch and warm clothes on their backs are reason enough for a reminder of what we've gone through as a nation. But, just as with the playing of our national anthem at major sporting events, political events and other public gatherings, one is not necessarily required to participate.

To be consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court's decisions on this issue, "a school may not require its students to stand for or recite the Pledge of Allegiance or punish any students for his/her failure to do so." Allowing it to be recited, not enforced, allows for satisfaction for both the patriotic and the religiously sensitive (note how I didn't not say unpatriotic).

People rage of being emotionally wounded by having to say "under God," and groups like the ACLU immediately jump to their aid. If claiming offense at a national tradition, what will be next? That we are not supposed to sing "God Bless America?" All U.S. currency is inscribed with "In God We Trust," but I'd be willing to bet no one who claims to be offended by the Pledge of Allegiance would pass up a $20 bill on a matter of principal.

As much as I believe America is a melting pot and should be open to all beliefs when no other country is, you cannot deny that we are a country. We have a history; we have a rich heritage and so many opportunities to offer. There is nothing wrong or oppressive to say that to partake in what we have to offer, you at least show the decency to pledge your respect and support for what we stand for. It is true you cannot please everyone, but in revoking the oath of allegiance to our own nation, our home is going too far to satisfy those who are using sensitivity over something so miniscule as nothing more than a cry for attention.

With so many religions widely accepted today, the pledge is pledging allegiance to the flag and the country. Those reciting it should acknowledge they have the right to believe the term God as whatever they so choose. This is even more reason to continue it in schools a reminder of your rights, not as a threat against them.

No excuse for no quorum

Dan Lamothe

Some representation.

For the second straight week, the Student Government Association Senate meeting ended last week when quorum was called, and there weren't enough senators at the meeting to continue with business.

Plain and simple, this means there's a fair share of senators in the SGA not doing their jobs to the best of their abilities and representing the University of Massachusetts student body in the way they should.

For the senate to meet legally, it needs to have half of the senate plus one member present. Right now, that means 39 out of 76 members need to be present.

For two weeks running, the Senate hasn't been able to do it.

"We didn't have enough people," said Senator Matthew Progen, who called for last week's quorum count. "It would have been improper for us to continue."

Pathetic.

Senate Speaker Dan Saunders says meetings have been going much longer lately. There are multiple reasons senators might be leaving early. He mentioned nicer weather, impending finals and parties as reasons why senators might not be staying for the length of each SGA meeting.

"We're getting all of the absolutely necessary things done," Saunders said. "It's pretty amazing it's only happened twice so far. The senators have done an amazing job of being absolutely committed so far."

He also said he expects regular attendance from senators at the meetings, but they need to maintain good grades and not sacrifice too much for the SGA, as well.

"I think it's too much to ask every senator to drop everything every Wednesday night from 6:30 to 11 [p.m.]. That's a lot to ask for."

So what. If senators want the job, then they should do it right.

Two weeks ago when quorum wasn't met for the first time, maybe things were a little out of hand. The meeting dragged on past 11 p.m., and senators gradually crept away into the night to study, relax or do whatever else senators do. Expecting quorum at that point may have been a little unrealistic.

But last week? You're killing me.

The SGA couldn't keep half of their senators at last week's meeting past 9 p.m. With a light night and just five motions on the table, people copped out early on the meeting anyway – including Saunders, who relinquished the duties of his paid position before 9:30 p.m. to get some homework done.

Saunders says there's no cause for concern with attendance at SGA meetings.

"We've had better attendance this year than in years past," he said, noting that excused absences are down and that only a couple of senators have been let go for poor attendance.

All of those are positives for which the SGA should take its credit. But if the senate still can't keep half of its people involved and interested much past 9 p.m., how many problems for the student body are going to remain unaddressed? How can student opinion accurately be reflected when there are so many senators sneaking out the back door while meetings are in session?

> "Unfortunately, it's apparent that the SGA has a group of fringe senators who can't be bothered to contribute. They're duds, and they're holding back both the Senate and the campus as a whole."

The problem is a simple one and can be easily fixed. If someone is going to take a job on, especially a job representing others, the job should be done right. If it takes extra time to do that job right, a truly committed person will recognize that, understand it and make time. No excuses.

Much like many other groups, the SGA has a solid core of people who do their job and do it well. A lot of the work that the people in that core do is also under-appreciated.

Unfortunately, it's apparent the SGA has a group of fringe senators who can't be bothered to contribute. They're duds, and they're holding back both the Senate and the campus as a whole. Currently, a motion is even in committee to shrink the size of the Senate, theoretically increasing competition for senate spots and the quality of the average senator.

Over the next two weeks, several important issues will be presented to the senate, including the Student Activities Trust Fund Budget and a space allocation motion that could affect the headquarters of some of the student organizations that call the Student Union building their home.

If senators can't be bothered to stay through meetings with issues like that on the table, it's time for them to turn in their sword and shield.

Enough is enough. The student body deserves better.

The new UMasscot

MattBrochu

Mascot change?

You can't be serious. This is just another case of old people undertaking a task that honestly shouldn't be given to anyone who is balding or taking hemorrhoid medication. It's like giving my grandpa a computer and telling him to send an e-mail. Sure, he's intelligent, but he still has no idea what the hell he's doing. (For example, look at the Blue Wall Bar. Put me and nine of my friends on a committee to run that place, and I guarantee people might actually show up.)

O.K., so we're not selling as many UMass hats or fanny-packs as we used to. It's the least of our problems. The University doesn't even have the funds to pay professors or keep departments open, yet we can spare the cash to pay a company to decide which sweaty suit our mascot will be wearing on the sidelines of the games that no one goes to anymore? Absolutely brilliant.

And is the Gray Wolves seriously the best you could come up with? I can see their big powwow now: First, let's tell them their mascot is sexist. That always works (and I won't even dignify that issue with a response). Oh, and we haven't used the generic furry animal of an arbitrary color with sharp teeth in a while. Let's give it to UMass, and then we'll tell them some b.s. story about how gray wolves are local, too.

Oh yeah. I see gray wolves all the time, right next to the girls who actually wear clothes in the horseshoe when the temperature's above 50 degrees. The only local animals in this area are squirrels, protestors and kids on those stupid scooters. I guess those mascots didn't test well with children ages five and up.

> "The only local animals in this area are squirrels, protestors and kids on those stupid scooters."

And why gray? I mean you've got the Scarlet Knights, the Orangemen...those are exciting colors. We could force students to wear gray shirts to the games, making the student section a sea of gray. And let me tell you, there's nothing like the appearance of an overcast day to screw with opposing players. The only problem is it might cause a few depression-related suicides each home game.

But here's a newsflash for you: coming up with a wicked cool mascot won't change the fact that our sports teams suck. Syracuse's mascot is a freaking orange with legs, yet chances are they're selling more merchandise than any other university right now. And do you know why? They just won a national championship. Don't get me wrong; UMass has some amazing sports teams, but no future students or alumni watch college skiing or fencing on ESPN2 these days.

Realistically, only basketball and football can bring in massive amounts of revenue, so here are my four options to put the bling back in UMass Athletics.

One. Take back the money you gave to that stupid advertising agency and use it to buy Hummers and old-school jerseys that are way-too-freaking-big for some good basketball recruits, so they'll actually come to our school.

Two. Market the living hell out of our lacrosse, hockey and soccer teams. They do an incredible job and don't get the respect they deserve.

Three. Play at least five or six home basketball games a year in the Curry Hicks Cage. I guarantee people would camp out for tickets, regardless of the fact that Derrick Kellogg doesn't run the point anymore.

Finally, give the students what they want: Marcus Camby. Poll the students and half of them will say that No. 21 was a major part of their decision to come here. I can see it now: the University of Massachusetts Marcus Cambies. "Let's Go Cambies! (clap, clap, clap clap clap)." Sound stupid? It should.

So don't ditch the Minuteman. He's cool. He's historically significant. He can be unisex if you care that much about it (Minutewomen). And he's the only thing remotely close to a tradition (besides the annual Hoedown) that this school has left.

Vandross has a tracheotomy as he recovers from pneumonia

NEW YORK (AP) - Luther Vandross contracted pneumonia after suffering a stroke and had to undergo a tracheotomy to help him breathe, but the procedure didn't damage his vocal chords, his representatives said Monday.

The Grammy-winning singer remains in critical but stable condition, and spokeswoman Lois Najarian told The Associated Press: "We expected him to be out of intensive care right now."

His business manager, Carmen Romano, released a statement Monday confirming that Vandross suffered pneumonia during his hospitalization and had to have a tracheotomy, a procedure in which a hole is made in the throat and a tube is inserted to assist breathing.

"The tracheotomy was performed in a manner in which his vocal chords were not affected or damaged," Romano said.

Najarian said it was unclear whether the tube had been removed.

Vandross, 52, had a stroke April 16 at his Manhattan home; he was alone for hours before being discovered, Najarian said. He's been hospitalized at Weill-Cornell Medical College.

Romano also said Vandross is minimally responsive neurologically "and we're waiting for him to regain full consciousness. I am told that this may take some time."

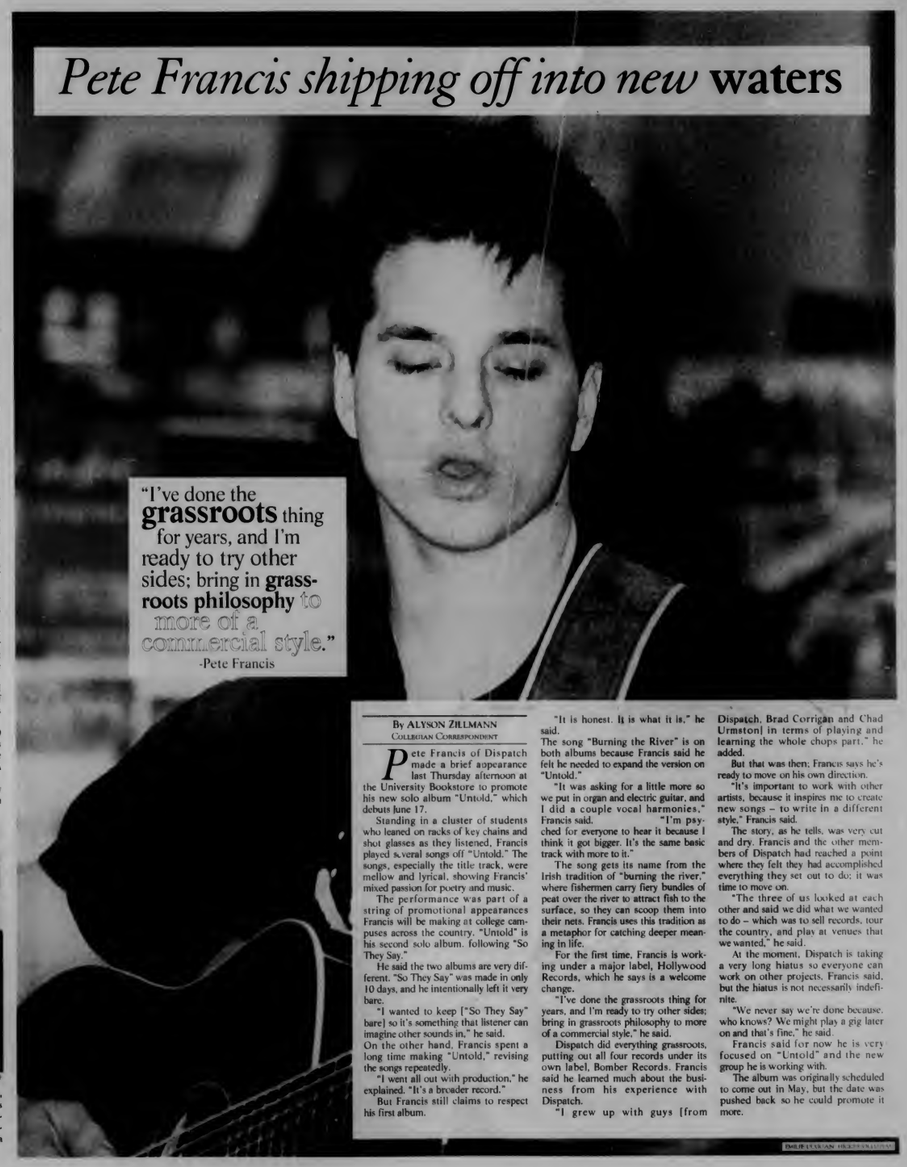
Najarian said Vandross hadn't opened his eyes or spoken since his stroke and "he's had to fight off quite a few infections."

"There was a real feeling that he would have regained consciousness by now," she said.

Najarian said doctors haven't been able to determine whether Vandross suffered any permanent neurological damage from the stroke, such as paralysis.

As for his prognosis, she said: "I think it's a day-to-day analysis of the situation; no one really knows what to expect."

Vandross has sold more than 20 million albums in the United States alone, and his hits include the love ballads "Here and Now" and "A House Is Not a Home."



His new album, "Dance With My Father," is scheduled for release in June.

Pete Francis shipping off into new waters

By ALYSON ZILLMANN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Pete Francis of Dispatch made a brief appearance last Thursday afternoon at the University Bookstore to promote his new solo album "Untold," which debuts June 17.

Standing in a cluster of students who leaned on racks of key chains and shot glasses as they listened, Francis played several songs off "Untold." The songs, especially the title track, were mellow and lyrical, showing Francis' mixed passion for poetry and music.

The performance was part of a string of promotional appearances Francis will be making at college campuses across the country. "Untold" is his second solo album, following "So They Say."

He said the two albums are very different. "So They Say" was made in only 10 days, and he intentionally left it very bare.

"I wanted to keep ["So They Say" bare] so it's something that listener can imagine other sounds in," he said.

On the other hand, Francis spent a long time making "Untold," revising the songs repeatedly.

"I went all out with production," he explained. "It's a broader record."

But Francis still claims to respect his first album.

"It is honest. It is what it is," he said.

The song "Burning the River" is on both albums because Francis said he felt he needed to expand the version on "Untold."

"It was asking for a little more so we put in organ and electric guitar, and I did a couple vocal harmonies," Francis said. "I'm psyched for everyone to hear it because I think it got bigger. It's the same basic track with more to it."

The song gets its name from the Irish tradition of "burning the river," where fishermen carry fiery bundles of peat over the river to attract fish to the surface, so they can scoop them into their nets. Francis uses this tradition as a metaphor for catching deeper meaning in life.

For the first time, Francis is working under a major label, Hollywood Records, which he says is a welcome change.

"I've done the grassroots thing for years, and I'm ready to try other sides; bring in grassroots philosophy to more of a commercial style," he said.

Dispatch did everything grassroots, putting out all four records under its own label, Bomber Records. Francis said he learned much about the business from his experience with Dispatch.

"I grew up with guys [from Dispatch, Brad Corrigan and Chad Urmston] in terms of playing and learning the whole chops part," he added.

But that was then; Francis says he's ready to move on his own direction.

"It's important to work with other artists, because it inspires me to create new songs – to write in a different style," Francis said.

The story, as he tells, was very cut and dry. Francis and the other members of Dispatch had reached a point where they felt they had accomplished everything they set out to do; it was time to move on.

"The three of us looked at each other and said we did what we wanted to do – which was to sell records, tour the country, and play at venues that we wanted," he said.

At the moment, Dispatch is taking a very long hiatus so everyone can work on other projects, Francis said, but the hiatus is not necessarily indefinite.

"We never say we're done because, who knows? We might play a gig later on and that's fine," he said.

Francis said for now he is very focused on "Untold" and the new group he is working with.

The album was originally scheduled to come out in May, but the date was pushed back so he could promote it more.

The Used put on flawless performance

NORTHAMPTON – The sounds of emo and hardcore invaded the streets of downtown Northampton Tuesday night as a quartet of grimy punk upstarts thrashed in the upstairs ballroom of the Pearl Street Nightclub, pleasing the throng of pierced and tattooed misfits who came out to jump around all night long.

The Used
April 22

Leading the charge were headliners The Used, a Utah-bred foursome who have gained much national attention that has included MTV and radio airplay (for their songs "The Taste of Ink" and "Buried Myself Alive") magazine ink and even a romance between lead vocalist Bert McCracken and erstwhile rock offspring Kelly Osbourne.

It was actually quite disconcerting to see McCracken strolling through the ballroom during a soundcheck and then to see the band perform live when, on Monday morning, their video for "Buried Myself Alive" was playing right on MTV. But the band lived up to their hype as being an electrifying live act, spitting out energy much like a machine gun spits out bullets.

The toothpick-thin McCracken threw himself into the act, bounding around the stage and working up a sweat that nearly rivaled that of his fans frantically bouncing up and down in the audience.

The band played most of the songs from their self-titled debut album (disappointingly, they left "Violent Frustration" off the set list.)

Fans cheered, sang-along with the songs and crowd surfed onto the stage – where they promptly took the opportunity to sing into the nike with McCracken before diving back into the crowd. McCracken, juiced by the energy of the crowd, obliged the fans'

What an interesting career director James Foley has led. He first directed Madonna's hokey "Who's That Girl?" followed by the thriller "At Close Range," and has since done the John Grisham story "The Chamber," the Al Pacino in Old Italy yam "Two Bits," and the Chow Yun-Fat kung-fu fest, "The Corrupter."

His latest film, "Confidence," is arguably reminiscent of his most cleverly crafted work to date, "Glengarry Glen Ross," based on the play by David Mamet. Much like that one, his latest features a remarkably hoity-toity cast of actors; sandy-voiced Edward Burns as the leader of a con-artist team (which includes much-underrated actor Paul Giamatti); the femme fatale, played by Rachel Weisz ("The Mummy"); Andy Garcia as a seedy FBI agent; and Dustin Hoffman in his scummiest part ever, an independent organized crime boss nicknamed "The King." You see, Burns (whose character is named Jake), unknowingly swindles The Rain Man out of a large lump of cash, which, understandably, gets him upset. But instead of getting violent, he gets hyperactive, partly due to his self-diagnosis of ADHD (which Jake tells him repeatedly to "get under control").

Something old, something new at Boston Symhony

BOSTON – The Boston Symphony Orchestra performed Saturday evening under the direction of Kurt Mavur. The all-Russian program included two well-known classical works by Prokofiev and Tchaikovsky and the world premiere of a modern composition by Gubaidulina.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Symphony Hall
April 18

Sergei Prokofiev's "Symphony No. 1 in D, Opus 25" provided a bright opening to the concert. The performance of what is more commonly known as the "Classical Symphony" was ably executed, but did not offer anything new to the interpretation of this crowd favorite.

With a sprightly first movement theme carried by the violins and a sonorant antiphonal exchange between the strings and low winds, the Allegro rose abruptly to a precipitous climax. The walking bass of the Larghetto and the charming third movement Gavotte foiled each other nicely, but the frenetic viola riffs and precarious string passages of the Finale were not very crisp.

Though always enjoyable, this symphony is not quite fulfilling. Perhaps compared loosely to a Top 40 pop hit, this is a piece full of shallow thrills and cheap flavorings; catchy, yes, but lacking in soul.

The world premiere of Sofia Gubaidulina's "The Light of the End," commissioned by the BSO, brought dozens of additional players onstage to fulfill the expansive orchestration required by this piece.

From the tubular bell intro to the hymenopterous string swellings, "Light" featured both haunting and sudden mood changes. Tremulous horns were dashed asunder by crashing cymbals; only to be tempered by lush string sections. An ominous fanfare preceded a jaunty xylophone quip.

Superficial dialogue in 'Family'

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Between any movie that makes you run to the cheap hand-fisted sentimentality of a Hallmark card, "It Runs in The Family" gathers three generations of the Douglas acting dynasty, and in spite of those photo family dramas that force conflict into an easily resolved cocoonic setpiece.

Here we have Kirk Douglas as the stiff upperlip father and The Grumberg that recovering from a stroke; Michael Douglas as his son, a troyan prince cursed with a name he doesn't want and a new fatherhood worker who can't find and Michael's son Cameron as a screw-up old enough to be thinking his way through college Kirk's real-life grandchildren, Diana Douglas plays his wife, Jeanne Rose plays Kirk's former lover, Zelda Jones as Michael's wife, while Rory Culkin plays the good-natured son who has a crush on Cameron and former runaway mom, all of her boss. Among the Douglas children, a couple of them have real-life marital ruin. Kirk and Michael officiate a family reunion having a mock Viking funeral.

Get the picture yet? There was no reason to "Runs In The Family" as a standard expectation on the part of the audience, but the film's writers, Jeff Rothberg and Fred Segal, don't even bother trying. The team, the pop-psychology and the blanket of treacle are typical of the worst of Hallmark. It Runs In The Family" isn't a movie, only like, simply; it doesn't evoke enough of an emotional response for that. It's a movie that's so safe it's void of any edges that you'll possibly get over even seeing it.

The one thing you may remember about it is the sticky coat of sentiment that hangs over every second of the film. This is the kind of movie that defines maudlin: we get a last dinner and a first kiss, check, lessons learned and chance letters grow and learn in the pre-fab fashion of an after school special. "It Runs In The Family" lurks back and forth between joy and sadness enough to cause whiplash set the movie free to pluck anything genuine bling a heartstring. Even those with the softest of hearts may be put off by the waterworks business as usual here. Jesse Weaston's screenplay feels like a group hug that manages to suffocate you in the process.

It's no fault of the actors that are trapped in this sudden mess – a drama. Both Kirk and Michael have established themselves as credible actors during their careers, and even Cameron – who somewhat looks and sounds like a shorter version of Brad Pitt – makes a noteworthy effort as a slacker rebel. Yet they can't make much of the rickety supporting cast about this Douglas family. It's a movie that can't even find a better reason to "cry me a river."

Orchestra delivers thin symphony

was the duet between a wavering French horn and a cello, played here in the uppermost reaches of the fingerboard, which produced a beautiful discordance.

Though all these juxtaposed voices and shifts did indeed sound strange and new, Gubaidulina's latest effort was so modern as to be familiar, almost predictable in its free-ranging and unpredictable form.

Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Opus 74" filled the second half of the evening's schedule. The mysterious program of "Pathetique Symphony" is full of innovative structural ideas in its composition, but is best known as the emotional tour-de-force and final statement of the great composer's life. A week after premiering the symphony, Tchaikovsky died from drinking cholera infected water.

According to Swedish Tchaikovsky buff Christian Steinbeck, many pundits speculate that this was a deliberate act of suicide in the face of public exposure of the composer's homosexuality. Whether this was in fact the case, or whether the frequently pessimistic Tchaikovsky was communicating a vision of his own death, we can agree that the 'Pathetique,' especially the final movement, sustains an emotional tenor that is unrivaled in the depths of the psyche, holds it plumbs," said Steinbeck.

The opening Adagio is full of musical contrasts, between the quick and the serene, the melodic flights of the winds and the underpinnings of repeated bass motifs. The Allegro is also related and reflective, with a danceable melody set against the pizzicato strings coursing through the movement like a running brook.

It is in the third movement, the Allegro molto vivace, where things begin to get interesting. Masur was at his most active here, conducting the marching sections with vigor and powerful control. The bombastic ending even elicited premature applause from the crowd; such was the weight of its finality.

If the third movement crashes to an end like a wave, the fourth movement is the surge of the expired breaker that runs up the shore in a foamy whisper before sinking into the sand. The bassoons set the early mood, but Tchaikovsky is not completely resigned to sadness here. The push and pull between the violins and the basses is torn between hope and misery. In the famous, somber ending, though, the basses toll out a fading, dying breath of eternal sorrow.

With an interesting sampling of the last 100-plus years of Russian composers, the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a program akin to the three bowls of porridge in the familiar fairy tale – a pleasant but thin symphony, a challenging new piece with overexerted heft and a sheer masterpiece of human emotion and mortality that was just right.

Writers of Color reading

On April 30, at 7 p.m., Food for Thought Books in Amherst will host a poetry reading from the UMass MFA Creative Writing Program. The reading is a compilation of student works, which allows poets and writers to showcase their talents in a public forum.

The evening will be hosted by professor Martin Espada and will showcase poetry by Sueyeun Juliette Lee, Luivette Resto and Yasotha Sriharan. Joan Brooks, David Odhiambo, Jean Marie Ruiz, Pallavi Sharma and Jung Yun will present fictional works.

unkempt and always gnawing away on a piece of gum like it was a chew-toy, and the connector string for his eyeglasses hammer home that he's a dirty, old man.

The-aging-bad-guy-who-owns-a-nightclub-and-lusts-after-his-female-employees-but-never-pulls-the-trigger-on-the-crimes-he-orders is nothing new, but it is slightly awkward to see this 66-year-old tell two erotic dancers who work for him (and who claim to be sisters) that, "If you're going to eat each other, make sure it's tasteful." It's a line that maybe Al Pacino could've pulled off better, but not a pip-squeaky guy like Hoffman. King could've been the spot-light-stealer of the film, but just when we start to see some character development (when he slaps Jake around), he disappears until the last few minutes of the movie. Just as Foley's career has brought forth some poor crops in recent years, so has Hoffman's; he didn't strike gold with last year's "Moonlight Mile," and his passable performance in 1999's "The Messenger" was hardly seen by anyone.

"Confidence" should have been a movie that was win-win for Foley and Hoffman, but some sort of scam in the production process robbed them of that.

"Confidence" has a very art deco sort of look to it; a lot of greens and reds and yellows and blues, and it gives the film a bit of a booster shot of lifeblood, but the same can't be said of the pacing. When the film starts, it looks like it may become something of a cross between "Snatch" and "Pulp Fiction," and occasionally, there are moments evocative of these and other modern-heist films; the cinematographic "wiping" of one scene to another, the jazzy, be-boppy score out of a 70s blaxploitation film, the voiced-over flash-backs of what really happened during the con, and stylish moments when the team is deciding who to make their "mark," or victim, and we see each contender as though they were a personal listing in a newspaper. The presence of these few, exciting moments make us realize how slow the rest of the film, which lacks a lot of these flashy montages, really is.

Then there's the whole business of the actual con, and it has to do with pulling one over on a bigwig banker for whom King carries a grudge. I'm not sure if we ever know why, but that's really irrelevant. What's important to us is to completely understand how the scam is set up, and even though they show us how it's going to be carried out, 2 and 2 still equal 5. It seems that more time was spent rushing through this integral part of the film while too much is wasted on unneeded moments. I have a feeling that there is some sort of twist at the end, but since the movie's balance with timing is so off, and that it's all told in a flashback style, it would probably take a second of third viewing and lot of pausing and rewinding to have it all click into place.

Jake tells his fellow conmen that you got to have confidence in order to pull off a job successfully. King counters that, however, by saying "Style gets you killed." In terms of the movie "Confidence," it appears that King is right, it's too much flash.

every whim, pausing only to graciously thank the crowd or ask everyone to be careful of each other and not get hurt.

There was not one moment wrong with The Used's live performance.

As far as the opening bands were concerned, the performances were a mixed bag. Openers Story of the Year put on a good show, building an easy rapport with the audience and goading off all the while. Not only did Story of the Year prove to be excellent musicians, they proved to have the charisma to one day carry their own headlining tour.

Middle acts My Chemical Romance and Thrice, however, proved underwhelming. MCR's music wasn't half-bad, but the band failed to make that connection with the audience and even seemed disinterested in making a connection. The music of Thrice was rather weak, and the band's performance wasn't that impressive.

Overall the night was a mixed bag. The performances ranged from fine to whatever to outstanding. The sound quality throughout the night, however, was muddy and indistinct, taking away from the night on the whole. But sitting through Thrice and My Chemical Romance was worth it to see The Used play live on stage.

Butler a Cleveland Rocker

Former UMass standout taken 15th overall in 2003 WNBA Draft

By ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Jennifer Butler became the first Massachusetts women's basketball player to be drafted by a WNBA team on April 23. She was selected in the second round, 15th overall by the Cleveland Rockers.

Butler will become just the second Minutewoman to ever play in the women's professional league, modeled on the NBA. Melissa Gurile, a 1996 Massachusetts graduate, played for the Phoenix Mercury in 1997.

The 6-foot 5-inch center from Brooklyn, N.Y. was the only Atlantic 10 player to be selected in this year's draft.

A 2003 Associated Press All-American Honorable Mention, Butler finished with 1,540 career points, good for fifth on the all time Minutewoman scoring list.

"I am really excited," Butler said. "It was a lot to take in at first, but now it is starting to settle in. I am honored to have the privilege to go to Cleveland and help them next year."

The Rockers, who finished seventh in the Eastern Conference with a 10-22 record, also had the first selection in the 2003 draft, taking Mississippi State's Tulsa Thomas.

Ann Wauters played center for Cleveland last year, averaging 11.2 points and five rebounds per game in 25 starts. Tracy Henderson also saw time at center in 25 games last year, scoring 35 points in limited duty for the Rockers.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko expressed her joy upon seeing one of her players drafted in her first year with the Minutewomen.

"I was absolutely thrilled when I saw Jen get drafted," Dacko said. "I am extremely happy for her and her family. Jen worked so hard and we are very proud of her accomplishments."

"This is a tremendous opportunity for [Butler]. The entire UMass family will enjoy watching her continue to develop in the WNBA."

Butler led the Minutewomen with 17.5 points per game this year, second in the conference, and was an integral part of the Maroon and White's 14-13 season (6-10 Atlantic 10), which included big wins over Memphis, Toledo, and the Villanova team that upset Connecticut in the Big East tournament to end the Huskies' historic winning streak.

While it was unclear as to where Butler would end up after this season – especially when the WNBA players went on a strike that ended mere hours before the draft took place – pro scouts had been visiting the Mullins Center throughout the season.

No. 21 led the nation with 14.7 rebounds per game in 2002-2003 and ended her career with 1,528 boards, the only basketball player in Minutewoman history to reach both 1,000 points and 1,000 rebounds.

She also averaged 2.43 steals and 1.25 blocks per game en route to being named the A-10 defensive player of the year.

George Washington's Cathy Ioens, who was named Atlantic 10 player of the year, was among the names that were not selected.

Villanova's Trish Juhline was also selected in the draft. She was taken in the third round by the Washington Mystics.

Former Minutewoman star Jennifer Butler is now a member of the WNBA's Cleveland Rockers.

UM sweeps St. Bonnies

By JEFF BOYD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts softball coach Elaine Sortino said Friday's doubleheader with St. Bonaventure would be one of the team's most important matchups in determining where the Minutewomen stand in the Atlantic 10. Fortunately, her team approached the twinbill with a similar mindset, as the Minutewomen rolled past the Bonnies to win both games, 7-1 and 4-0.

"We've positioned ourselves in a pretty good spot," said Sortino of UMass' position in the conference.

The two victories not only improved UMass' conference record to 9-1, but they also gave the Minutewomen a comfortable lead atop the A-10.

In the first game of the doubleheader, senior pitcher Kaila Holtz was dominant on the mound for the Minutewomen. Holtz scattered just four hits through seven innings of work while striking out a career high 15 batters.

The only trouble that Holtz encountered came in the first inning when St. Bonaventure's Tricia Hildebrand went yard for the ninth time of the season to give the Bonnies a 1-0 advantage.

UMass managed to tie the game in the second inning when junior Aisha Franke crossed home plate on an error by the Bonnies' catcher, Amanda Davey, while trying to throw out UMass senior Anna Perey, who was stealing second base.

The Minutewomen went ahead in the fourth on an RBI single by senior Brandi Cross that scored Perey. Senior Emily Robustelli would add some insurance for UMass later in the inning when she scored on another error by Davey to put UMass up 3-1.

UMass tacked on another run in the bottom of the fifth when Robustelli singled to center to bring home Franke from third base, giving the Minutewomen a 4-1 lead.

Some of the younger members of UMass got a chance to show off their power in the sixth inning. Freshman K.J. Kelley launched her third home-run of the season to give UMass a comfortable, 5-1 lead.

Two batters later, sophomore Jasmine Edwards crushed her first career homerun over the "220" sign in centerfield for UMass' sixth run of the game. The ball was hit so hard that it cleared the fence behind the centerfield bleachers and came to a rolling stop underneath a parked car.

The dinger was not only the first of Edwards's career, but it also came on her first official at-bat as a member of the Minutewomen.

"It just felt really good to unleash. I've been really hungry for a while. It just felt awesome," Edwards said after the game. "I would like to get more opportunities to produce for the team and be successful."

Edwards might indeed get more plate appearances for the Minutewomen following her performance on Friday. Sortino was more than pleased to see such a quality at-bat from one of her young players.

"I thought that was number one for the day. I mean, that was just an outstanding at-bat for a young person. That was probably my ESPN play of the day," Sortino said.

UMass picked up in the second game right where it left off in game one. Robustelli led off the nightcap with a double to leftfield and then scored on a perfectly executed sacrifice bunt by sophomore Hilary Puglia.

Robustelli continued her tear at the plate in the second inning when she belted a triple to right field that scored Franke from third base. One batter later, Puglia ripped a single to centerfield that brought Robustelli home to put UMass up 3-0.

The Minutewomen posted their final run in the third inning when Franke singled to centerfield to score Kelley from third base.

Sophomore pitcher Kelli Arnold had her way with St. Bonaventure batters for the first 6-2/3 innings of the second game until she ran into trouble. With the Minutewomen one out away from victory, Arnold couldn't record the final out and was replaced by Holtz. It only took four pitches for Holtz to record the final out as she fanned SBU's Laurie Stone to end the game.

"When you come in an hour and a half later, you come in on just adrenaline knowing that you need to do a job," said Holtz, following her relief appearance. "Obviously I wasn't as loose or feeling as great as I would want to be, but you've just got to do what you got to do."

The Minutewomen will return to action on Wednesday when they make the trip down the Mass Pike to face Boston College.

Minutemen drop two to Temple

Torra hurls complete game

Junior righthander Eric Chown took the loss in game one of a doubleheader with Temple on Sunday. The Minutemen lost two of three to the Owls to fall to 9-6 in Atlantic 10 play.

By MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Following a last place finish in the 2003 Baseball Beanpot at Fenway Park, the Massachusetts baseball team turned to two of its experienced pitchers to stop the bleeding.

But after the duo of junior righthander Eric Chown and sophomore southpaw Keith Doherty were unable to win either game of doubleheader at Temple on Sunday, falling by scores of 6-5 and 9-7, it was freshman righthander Matt Torra who was able to finally right UMass' ship, salvaging the series finale, 7-2, over the Owls and ending a four-game losing streak.

In going the distance against the Owls, Torra did not allow earned runs and struck out nine, scattering 10 hits and walking only two in his fourth win of the season.

The Owls (16-19 8-7 Atlantic 10) jumped out to a 2-0 lead in the bottom of the first inning with a pair of unearned runs. Outfielder Al Roach reached on an error with two outs, which allowed first baseman Rob Cucinotta to score. Roach then scored when outfielder John Quigley reached on the second error of the inning.

UMass cut the lead to 2-1 in the top of the fourth, when junior third baseman Matt Reynolds doubled and scored on an RBI single by freshman outfielder Frank Curreri. The Minutemen (15-15 9-6 Atlantic 10) upped their lead to 5-2 with a four-spot in the top of the eighth.

Curreri, senior Matt Boulanger and sophomore Curt Szado all had RBI singles in the inning, while another run came in to score on a pitch that scooted past Temple catcher Jeff Roma.

The Maroon and White concluded the scoring with two more runs in the top of the ninth. Reynolds drove in a run with a triple while Boulanger collected an RBI single.

Righthanded pitcher Matt Powell took the loss for the Owls, allowing five runs on 13 hits in 7-1/3 innings of work.

In Sunday's second game, senior catcher Tom Ellerbrook had a two-run triple and Athas added an RBI single in the sixth inning to even the score at seven. The Minutemen then had runners on first and second with one out later in the inning, but senior first baseman Altieri lined into an inning-ending double play.

Temple then got to the Maroon and White bullpen in the bottom of the sixth, as freshman righthander Jason Hickey and sophomore closer Scott Ratliff each surrendered a run. Hickey was eventually tagged with the loss, as the Owls hung on to the two-run lead for the win in the seven-inning affair.

In the first contest, Temple led 6-2 heading into the seventh and final frame when the Minutemen nearly rallied for the win. Senior designated hitter Chris Morgan drove in a run with a groundout before Altieri and Reynolds both followed with RBI singles to make it 6-5.

However, Temple relief pitcher Brian Ursone recorded the final out with the potential tying run on second base to preserve the win and sweep the doubleheader.

The Minutemen return to action Wednesday afternoon, as they will welcome Vermont to Earl Lorden Field. First pitch is scheduled for 3 p.m.

Minutewomen squeak by SJU on Senior Day

By BOB MCGOVERN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team ended its regular season in dramatic form on Garber Field Saturday. The Minutewomen (10-6, A-10 6-1) defeated St. Joseph's (3-11, A-10 0-7) on Senior Day with 1:56 left in overtime on a goal by sophomore Maura McGarrity.

The Maroon and White have been on the top of the Atlantic 10 for most of the season, and were posed with an interesting challenge. St. Joseph's was playing a nothing-to-lose game, hoping to not get completely shut out for the A-10 season.

Lydia Robinson scored an unassisted goal with 6:53 left in the game to put the Maroon and White up 6-5. The ball went back and forth until the Lady Hawks made their last successful attempt. Kerry O'Connell put the ball in with 1:23 left in the game evening things out at 6-6.

The overtime period went scoreless until McGarrity scored the game-winner with 1:54 left. The Minutewoman defense was able to hold off the St. Joseph's attack for the entire period. Emery added insult to injury, scoring the game's final goal with only seven seconds left on the clock.

With the Minutewomen leading 5-4 at the half, the Lady Hawks were helped by a brief surge led by Brett Dymarczyk and Butler near the end of the half. The Maroon and White were quickly able to respond with a goal from Jada Emery.

Both teams were helped by key saves from their goaltenders. Cyndi Doyle, who has been one of the premiere goaltenders in the A-10, recorded eight saves. Doyle also proved to be the anchor for one of the strongest defensive efforts the Minutewomen have had this season.

Courtney Huff stopped 11, but was unable to make two crucial saves in the overtime period. The second half saw both teams unable make a run. This was due to the stall offense that the Lady Hawks were playing.

"Given the way that St. Joe's chose to run their offense, by stalling the ball and keeping possession, I think our defense did an outstanding job," said sophomore goalie Joes Rubin.

The first half saw both teams trade goals, with St. Joseph's getting itself on the board first. Kelly Butler, the team's leader in overall goals, broke down the Minutewomen defense and recorded the game's first tally at the 25:15 mark.

UMass appeared to gain momentum from the early score and quickly erased the deficit with three unanswered tallies. The seniors took control of the game as Leslie Pollock scored two back-to-back goals within the next five minutes. Lydia Robinson netted one soon after off an assist from classmate Lori Kain.

The victory gives the Maroon and White second place in A-10 standings heading into the conference tournament.

UMass will travel to Geasy Field at Temple on Friday to face Richmond.

Leslie Pollock and the Minutewoman seniors ended their home careers in style, winning their final game on Garber Field in overtime over St. Joseph's 8-6.

Higher education campuses speak out in Boston

By S.J. PORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BOSTON – Five thousand supporters of public higher education merged in the corner of Boston Common in front of the Massachusetts State House to rally against budget cuts and reorganization proposals yesterday.

Rally participants from the 28 separate public higher education campuses in the state met at 10:30 a.m. in front of the entrance to the Park Street MVTA station and marched around the Common before gathering at a stage set up in the corner entrance in front of the State House steps. The rally, which flooded the Common and closed one street, began at 11 a.m. and lasted until 1:30 p.m.

On stage, set just below the steps into the Common, were rally leaders and members of the University of Massachusetts – Dartmouth marching band. The band played while activists gathered. The music provided a steady beat to chant to and a sound to distract people passing by and those working in the state house. Students said that the band also provided a sound for those coming late to follow, directing them to the rally's center.

Last year's rally was held on the State House steps creating traffic disruptions. This year the State House steps were gated off and security kept students and activists from crowding the area. Students were discouraged from protesting in front of the police gates by both police and rally leaders.

Participants in the rally came decked out in school clothing from their respective campuses and shirts saying "Save UMass." Stickers were passed out with slogans like "Stand up for Public Education" and "Stop the cuts! Close corporate loopholes." Members of the crowd carried both homemade signs and those passed out by organizations like the Save UMass campaign.

One student carried a sign saying "I wonder what it's like to be a spoiled rich white boy with a Harvard degree who dodges 54K in taxes in his 'home' state – let's ask Romney." Other signs read, "Billions for war and none for students, contracts, scholarships, libraries," "Pete Nessen we're calling you out," "Cut the budget you cut my dreams," "Higher Ed Union United," "How SWIFT Mass was to make a MITT stake" and "Greed – Political religion."

Student reaction in favor of this year's rally

By EUGENE TETLOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A reported 5,000 students, faculty members and staff from public higher education institutions throughout the state of Massachusetts converged outside the Massachusetts State House in Boston yesterday. They were all there for one purpose: to protest against the 20 percent budget cuts that public higher education institutions face statewide.

Despite the negative reasons for being there, the reaction to the rally was positive. Janice Staab, an out-of-state freshman at the University of Massachusetts – Amherst, agreed.

"I think it went really well, and hopefully the enthusiasm of the people here will get the legislature to listen to us. Higher education is such a big issue at the moment."

UMass Engineering Junior Scott Bellner, who attended last year's rally as well, felt this year's rally went more smoothly.

"This year the organization was better. The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) of UMass Amherst did a great job to get us out here. Statewide we are seeing an ignorance as the administration is ignoring people's voices, so hopefully we were heard today," Bellner said.

Edward P. Sullivan, the Executive Director-Treasurer of the Massachusetts Teachers Association (MTA), saw yesterday's rally as being a significant step in the right direction.

"[The protesting students, teachers, and staff] will make a difference; political action by students to advance their interests could have a remarkable impact on the destiny of how students are treated as well as the institutions they attend. The key is for students and faculty to continually expand their active political action."

After the rally, a legislative hearing on the Governor's proposal to reorganize public education was held inside the State House. In attendance at the hearing were several UMass students and staff. This seemed to give the Senate and House members the confidence to ask Peter Nessen, the Education Secretary to Governor Mitt Romney, several probing questions. Nessen was part of a three-person team representing Romney that included Chancellor of the Massachusetts board of Higher Education, Judith Gill. While addressing the committee, Gill argued that the budget was never meant to be about cuts, but about savings.

House Chair Marie St. Fleur responded by questioning, "what exactly is the difference between $100 million in cuts and $100 million in savings when it comes to these institutions?"

Members of both the House and the Senate seemed unsatisfied with Nessen's explanation that centralizing check-writing, would save $12 million annually. The main dissatisfaction with this solution seemed to be the question of where the other $88 million would come from, and also how much it would cost to centralize the paychecks.

"We know what the potential savings could be, but not what the potential costs could be," St. Fleur said.

Matthew Saradjian, UMass graduate student majoring in Public Policy was in attendance at the hearing.

"The rally outside and the hearing inside showed that Romney's plan for higher education is not in the interest of students and workers," Saridjian said. "Now, more than ever, we need to increase the opportunity for education, not cut it."

Protests against the new state budget are set to continue throughout the week.

'Take Back the Night' offers support to victims

By FERRON SALNIKER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

About 70 students and community members gathered together last night to share experiences and support victims of sexual violence for the University of Massachusetts' first Take Back the Night event in five years.

The Speak Out, one of the two events happening this week, was designed to give victims a voice and to raise awareness of violence against women.

Over 25 volunteers from student organizations were present at the campus pond passing out candles and flyers, facilitating the event, and sharing their own experiences.

The event began with a poetry reading entitled "189 things a day" and was composed of advice designed to prevent being assaulted or raped given to women. The poem read "what kind of a world forces a women to do 189 things to prevent being raped?"' The organizers then distributed index cards for participants to read out loud. The index cards read common actions often expected of women to avoid sexual assault. Participants then stood up and read sayings such as "never walk alone, ever" and "don't admit openly that you enjoy sex."

Participants spent the rest of the evening listening to victims share their experiences with sexual assault. Many speakers touched on the effects of rape or sexual abuse and shared stories of battles with eating disorders, suicide attempts and learning to trust friends and family. Victims addressed feeling of embarrassment, guilt and the overwhelming fear of being judged after sharing an experience with others. Many speakers encouraged the listeners to speak out and to not be afraid to share their own experiences.

SGA predicts longest meeting of the year

SGA President Dave Carr

By KRISTIN SHREWSBURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Aside from the final presentation of the F-10 budget to the Senate, Student Government Association members are looking at one of the longest Senate meetings this year as over 20 motions are on the agenda tonight.

Senators will also discuss the final two Executive Cabinet positions as President Dave Carr has chosen Katy Donaghey to fill the position of Secretary of Finance for a second term and Lisa Jollimore as Secretary of Administrative Affairs.

Carr explained that he is not foreseeing any problems with either candidate; however, Carr did explain that he felt that the Senate has been making an emphasis on each candidates Senate activity when approving them.

"I think Katy [Donaghey] will go without any problems, but Lisa [Jollimore] may have a harder time," Carr said. "Senators have been asking questions as to why certain candidates have not been involved in Senate, but Lisa has been involved in area government [Orchard Hill] and its agency for two years. Administrative Affairs oversees agencies within the area governments and she has experience in both."

The long awaited F-10 budget is also on tonight's agenda and will be presented by the Ways and Means committee. Ways and Means committee Chair Brian Thompson explained that he is confident that the budget will be accepted and passed at the following Senate meeting.

The F-10 budget is the allocation of student fee's, which are then distributed by the Ways of Means committee through a budget requests process. The money is then distributed to various Registered Student Organizations on campus, including the SGA, African, Latin American, Native American (ALANA) and various others.

Questions surrounding the preliminary budget allocations given went through a budget appeals process last night. One group up for reconsideration was the SGA.

The SGA was cut roughly 25 percent in the area of payroll for the Executive Cabinet. Thompson explained that if cuts need to be made, why not start with the SGA itself. Thompson also said that he felt despite some minor issues, everyone will be satisfied with the overall budget.

"The committee worked really hard and everyone asked for more than what the budget could give. But I think everyone will be satisfied," Thompson said.

Carr explained that the SGA was appealing their preliminary allocations and its payroll budget cut yesterday due to the fact that the Secretary of Diversity was not allocated any payroll, and the President, Speaker and Student Trustee were also cut.

"I realize we're in a fiscal crisis, but to cut our paid hours from 20 to 10 is a lot and I find it disheartening that I have to plea for our payroll," Carr explained. "If they only think that I should be working ten hours a week, then that's a whole other issue, especially if I'm paid for 20 right now and I work anywhere from 30 to 40 hours a week."

Despite tonight's F-10 budget presentation, and the final two Executive Cabinet appointments, Senators are also facing multiple motions on the agenda.

With only three full Senate meetings left, including tonight's meeting, members are looking to push through the final motions of the year. Administrative Affairs, the University Policy committee and others will be presenting some of the final proposed changes of the year.

"It looks like it's going to be the longest meeting of the year. I think we have something like 26 motions on the agenda," Carr said. "There is a lot of important things that need to get done and so I hope that people show up and get their voices heard because were coming down to the home stretch."

Tonight's SGA Senate meeting is at 7 p.m. in room 163 of the Campus Center. All meetings are open to the public.

Five thousand rally in Boston

Dr. David Bartley, president of Holyoke Community College, one of the first speakers, represented both Holyoke and Greenfield Community Colleges when he addressed the crowd opposing Governor Romney's proposal to merge the two campuses. Bartley is representative of public higher education not only because of his 30 years working in the system, but as a graduate of Holyoke Community College, and of UMass Amherst.

Bartley told those gathered that the real news in higher public education was not about the fight between the Governor and the President of the University of Massachusetts, but that the real news was that public higher education in Massachusetts was getting a bad rap. Bartley went on to say the fight was not about organization, but "all about funding."

"We are no longer state supported institutions, we are state assisted institutions, because less than 50 percent of our budgets come from the state," said Bartley. "Massachusetts is 49/50 in capitol support for higher education – after this budget we may have the joy of being 50th."

The following two speakers, Dana Mohler-Faria, president of Bridgewater State, and Michele Bodes, president of the Student Senate at Bunker Hill Community College repeated to the crowd that Massachusetts is currently ranked 49 out of 50 states in terms of per capita support for students. Bodes said that after wondering who was fiftieth she had discovered that it was Mississippi, but that they had in fact just approved a six percent increase. Bodes assumed that this means Massachusetts is again fiftieth.

Bartley blamed the bad reputation he feels state schools are receiving on reports like the Bain report, which Governor Romney used to create his proposals for higher education.

"The Bain report is one of the biggest frauds I've witnessed in forty years," Bartley said. "Those backroom operations [which the report speaks of as being wastefully managed] are the library and the financial aid office."

Bartley spoke to statistical data that supported education as an investment in Massachusetts.

"95 percent of students in the state's public higher education system are Massachusetts residents," said Bartley. "And more than 50 percent of those at community colleges are the first person in their family with the opportunity to attend college."

Following speakers, including Mohler-Faria, Bodes also spoke of statistical categories.

Mohler-Faria said that he was "proof that public higher education was not an expense but an investment." Adding that for every dollar spent on public higher education the state would see $4 of new growth.

Bodes, a mother of four, said that the $1,000 increase in fees for Bunker Hill students like herself, was money she planned to spend on her children's winter clothing and food for her refrigerator.

David Helbert, the student trustee for the Massachusetts College of Liberal Arts said that he hoped to see public education supported from the "rolling hills of the Berkshires to the crashing shores of Cape Cod."

President of the UMass Staff Association, Donna Johnson, rallied the crowds to speak to their legislators and to tell them that if they did not do their jobs they could be replaced.

"I work here, I live here, and I vote here," Johnson said, "And if they don't do their job, we'll find someone new."

Johnson turned the state's accusation that public higher education's spending was wasteful on them, "there is no spending problem here, you have a revenue problem."

The student trustee for UMass Dartmouth, Jackie Briggs, proclaimed that that funding for public higher education was something to be valued, maintained, and "heaven forbid increased."

Speaking for adjunct faculty and contract funding was Gary Zabel of UMass Boston. Zabel spoke briefly about what an adjunct faculty member was for the higher education "adjunct faculty is 65 percent of the teaching workforce in higher ed nationally."

Zabel explained that adjunct faculty are part time with union benefits like health care and pension who receive "hamburger flipper wages" but whom make up the majority of professorships.

Zabel said that the democratic legislature was making Romney "look like a liberal" by calling for 15 million in deeper cuts to the public education system than Romnes had, and encouraged those gathered to support tax reform and tax increases, and to continue working for public higher education.

"It takes a lot of hard work, and this one is particularly hard because we have a rotten political leadership in Massachusetts, that we have to deal with," said Zabel. "My suggestion to students out there – run for office!"

The final speaker was a student from UMass Boston who raged through the microphone to send a message that she was the black single mother "who nobody thought would make it." She said that she was making it.

"You are not going to tell me I can't go to school!"

light vigil where participants formed a circle and held a moment of silence to reflect. After the closing a men's discussion group was held in the campus center to allow the men in the group to speak about their experiences and reflect on the event.

Everywoman's Center Counselor Advocates and Educator Advocates, marked by reflective armbands, were present to serve as resources for anyone who needed them.

"Take Back the Night" was organized by a small group of students who have met every Wednesday since the begging of the semester. The group is composed of students from different student organizations, and some individuals. VOX, a pro-choice organization committed to political activism, outreach, education, and spreading awareness regarding women's issues, is one of the student organizations involved. Volunteers from the Everywoman's Center have also been at the weekly meetings. The events' cosponsors are WMUA, the UMass Women's Studies Department, Planned Parenthood, UMass Jewish Affairs, Theta Chi and Sigma Alpha Lambda.

Organizers and participants found the event to be helpful and cleansing.

"For me it was incredibly moving," said Winny Chen, a member of VOX. "It really helped people to come up here and speak and also to listen."

Organizers also said that they are excited for tonight's event. "I'm really looking forward to tomorrow," Chen said. "We won't just be survivors, we will be empowered."

"Take Back the Night" first appeared in Europe in 1976 and has continued throughout the world as a sign of empowerment for women, men and children.

Tonight the second event will take place where event participants will meet at 7 p.m. at Haigis Mall for a march and will then gather from 8:30 to 11 p.m. at the campus pond for a rally.

The rally will include speakers Becky Lockwood the associate director of Rape Crisis Services & Violence Prevention Programs at the Everywoman's Center, La Wanza Lett-Brewington the Director of Community Education also from the Everywoman's Center and Lisa Kidwell a University of Massachusetts Police Department detective. After the speakers the rally will also feature guest DJ's from UMass' radio station WMUA 91.1 FM.

In case of rain the rally will be held in Campus Center room 168C.

U.S. role is to help rebuild and then watch over

With the war in Iraq over, the United States now faces an equally daunting task as achieving the fall of Baghdad – building a peaceful new government in Iraq.

Iraqis met with a group of U.S. officials on Monday to begin dealing on the logistics of creating an interim government in Iraq. The leaders of the event, retired U.S. Lt. Gen. Jay Garner and Zalmay Khalizad, an advisor for President George W. Bush, stressed that any authority that is set up needs to be led by Iraqi people and benefit the Iraqi people.

They couldn't be more right. Unfortunately, the United States is once again trying to balance two difficult tasks. During the conflict with Iraq, the United States was faced with trying to effect positive change while being involved in a deadly struggle to do it. Now, the United States is faced with trying to establish a working, useful and positive Iraqi government while working out a compromise between at least five different groups, including the Iraq Shite majority members, Sunni Muslims, Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution members, Kurds from north Iraq, Arab tribal chiefs and Iraqi exiles, some of which have not been in the country for dozens of years. Even with all of those groups present, thousands of protesters also rallied outside because they didn't feel the delegation at the meeting fairly represented Iraqi society.

Delegates at Monday's meeting told Garner and Khalizad that they are grateful for expelling Saddam Hussein's regime from power, but that they want to establish their own government.

This is reasonable. While the United States can play an instrumental role in the organization of an Iraqi government, American officials also need to take care to not step on too many toes. If the United States wants to come off as a positive, powerful influence that can be admired rather than as an overbearing bully, it needs to consider the needs and wishes of Iraqi citizens.

When delegates voice concerns at the meeting, those concerns need to be reiterated all the way back up the chain of command to Washington, D.C.

From there, Bush and his administration need to remember that their concerns are not the only concerns that matter as meetings like Monday's advance.

Delegates Monday voted in favor of a larger group meeting again in a month to select a "transitional" Iraqi government. Once that is established and stable, the United States will need to reevaluate a potential role in the Middle East. If everything is going well in Iraq and they want our government out of the way to try things on their own, it may be worth considering that as a viable option.

The best possible thing that the United States can do after next month's meeting in Iraq is to slowly recede from the Iraqi landscape once things have stabilized, giving their government the chance to grow and develop into something democratic and positive. The role of our nation will evolve from that of the victor/conqueror to that of the big brother.

With a watchful eye on a new nation, the U.S. can lend support from a distance, developing a positive relationship between the two that can only benefit both nations for years to come.

Age 21 is too high

Will Hillyard

One of the rites of passage that every college student goes through is turning 21, and subsequently being allowed to buy and drink alcohol. One of my friends recently turned 21, and he had been counting down the days seemingly for months. This is not to make light of the fact that alcohol is a very dangerous substance. Domestic violence, date rape and many fatal auto accidents can all be associated with alcohol use. There is no denying that alcohol abuse is one of the most serious issues faced by colleges and universities across the country. Even so, I'm here to argue that the drinking age should be lowered from 21 to 18.

I know what you're probably thinking. I'm just upset that I can't buy beer myself and I don't understand that lowering the drinking age will solve absolutely nothing. Not exactly. I turn 21 next summer, so I don't have long to go until I'll be able to drink legally. And as of right now it's really no challenge at all to get alcohol if I want it.

The point of all this is not to make it easier for kids to buy alcohol, at least not so that they can drink as much as they want. What I would like to be able to do is walk into a restaurant and have a beer. Or to go to a bar and actually be allowed to drink something. As far as I can tell, that's all that I'm unable to do right now. And I think that's too bad.

The United States is the only country in the world where the drinking age is as high as 21. It is 20 in Japan, but for all practical purposes you can drink at 18. Belgium is 16. A parent in Britain can buy for their child at a pub other than their own, and Italy has no drinking age at all. Yet these countries are not full of raving alcoholics. And let's face it, it's not exactly difficult for kids to get alcohol around here. So the thinking age doesn't prevent anyone from having fun, just from enjoying a drink when they go out every once in a while. I don't think that's the reason why the law was put in place to begin with.

> "The United States is the only country in the world where the drinking age is as high as 21."

One of the major arguments against lowering the drinking age is that young people will start drinking a lot more many more people will drink and drive and so on. I agree that there will be an increase in alcohol consumption and everything that comes with it, at least to begin with. But this is a long-term solution. I fully expect that twenty or thirty years down the road, kids will actually be binge drinking less often and drunk driving rates will have dropped. Teenage drinking is a long-term problem, and therefore requires a long-term solution.

My plan works rather well, especially if people can control their level of alcohol use. If people are just going to get drunk as much as possible, then changing the drinking will have very little effect. In fact, any effect it would have would probably be negative. But I'm trying to help out people who treat drinking responsibly. It's important to understand your own body chemistry and to know when to say enough is enough. If I go out to a restaurant, I have no plans on getting drunk. There are many alcoholic beverages that I genuinely like, and I hate not being able to enjoy them when I'm out with my family and friends. I also believe that giving younger people the right to drink legally will eventually lead to people having a better understanding of how to handle alcohol. All in all, a drinking age of 19 seems like a much more sensible policy than 21.

I would try to make the drinking age 18, but there are too many 18-year-olds who are still in high school to make that possible. While there is no such thing as a perfect system, it seems the current one fails to address the most serious problems about alcohol abuse. A drinking age of 21 does not prevent younger people from drinking, and for many is not so much a barrier as an inconvenience. Changing the law to 19 would promote better responsibility with alcohol and once again make it possible to enjoy a drink with dinner. It would create a sensible alcohol policy and a win-win situation.

Ben Feder

Who knew that while our university was stuck in a financial crisis, they could find the time to debate our mascot? A thing that, despite the loss of classes, sports teams and major programs, we could hold dear and be sure that it was out of reach from the administrative chopping block.

What would they like to change our mascot to you ask? The Gray Wolves. An animal native to this area, but let's be reasonable, who has seen a wolf lately, let alone a gray one? However, the athletic department would like a more marketable title. This is fine. The only thing is that, not only are they taking away a great tradition here, but also the mascot's logo resembles that of the UConn Huskies.

As our university slips further into the web of conformity, I wonder what we will do for sporting events and the like? Possibly borrow UConn's mascot? It would be a lot easier when our team meets theirs: we might as well use their cheerleaders and athletes too.

If they want to change the mascot, at least they can pick a title that this campus could be proud of. Something like the lagermeister comes to mind. This especially adheres to college students. What is more intimidating than a German deer that is responsible for over half of the Saturday morning hangovers on campus?

Also, let's take into consideration the man who announces the marching band at every football game. That man has got to be over 80 years old. He can't learn a new mascot name after half a century of announcing the "power and class" as the Minuteman Band. If he had to learn a new name, that means his brain would have to start working again, which would result in his brain realizing that the rest of his body has been dead for 20 years, and I don't think we want any of that on our hands.

Now, the Minuteman isn't really gender neutral, we can accept that fact from the start. But let's face it: the Minuteman is a historical figure that is a significant part of this country's and specifically, our region's, past. These were people who fought for the very ideals and truths that we, as Americans, embody, today. They took it upon themselves to fight back injustices when this country was just a pipe dream in the barrel of their Pennsylvania muskets. They had the courage and gave others the strength to stand up to what was right, and told the British to take their tea across the pond and stuff it.

> "They had the courage and gave others the strength to stand up to what was right, and told the British to take their tea across the pond and stuff it."

The Minutemen fought against overwhelming odds to gain their independence and the freedoms that they felt all people should possess. The right to dissent one's government, the right to own property, the right to speak freely, and the right to create and fulfill one's own destiny as they, themselves see fit, they are what this country's colonial ancestors wanted.

What we have construed these ideals to be today is no fault of our predecessors. The old ideals that this country was founded upon, are what made the values that our country practices today. Whether these ideas have become unrealistic and absurd is entirely the fault of today's generations. If you want to build a new roof on your house, you don't worry about the building's foundation, only that it is there. It is the same with today's standards. The Minutemen believed in those ideas and fought for them.

Keeping this in mind, the Minuteman transcends the gender issue into a higher form of idealism. The Minuteman stands for a great deal of things, and is an impressive name. I think that we, as students, personify this same idealism. We are staunch, fearless individuals with enough rocks to not back down from a fight. When we find something to say, we say it and make sure our voices are heard. When we believe in something, we believe it with a firm, unwavering audacity that would make our predecessors proud.

We are not the Gators. We are not the Orangemen. We are certainly not the Huskies. We are the Minutemen, a name synonymous with independence and fighting for what is right. We are not named after fruit, or reptiles, or anyone who wears shirts sized XXXL. So go to Hobart and have yourself a hoe-down and give the news something to report about those audacious Minutemen. Maybe you can get some lagermeister too; mix with goldschlager, tequila and enjoy.

Illusions of grandeur

Dan Cote

I'm pondering the many differences between the conduct of the Republican Club during their abortion protest and the conduct of the teachers and students at the "Fund the Contracts" protest. It is obvious from what I observed personally, and from an editorial, that quite a few people were offended by the Republican Club's prolife stance. Of course, if anyone knows what is annoying and offensive, it's the left.

The Republican Club put up white crosses, handed out pamphlets and talked to anyone who wanted to learn more, but what they didn't do is harass those just walking by minding their own business. What did they get for showing everyone how a protest should be conducted? Their crosses and signs were vandalized and some of the more liberal students wrote pro-choice slogans in chalk on the asphalt. Truly mature behavior. However, on my way to class on Monday morning, nine protesters shoved fliers in my face and claimed I didn't care about my degree and tuition increases. What did I do to deserve this? Nothing. I was minding my own business and they were exercising their free speech. But when those two collide it isn't free speech anymore; it's harassment. I don't believe that's in the Constitution. If you aren't getting the picture, I'll spell it out for you. Only the left gets to be annoying and offensive and then throw the first amendment in your face.

> "So it just serves to boggle the mind when a teacher takes the day off to protest."

If you are wondering why they are cutting funding it's because of that bottomless pit I call the Department of Education. It also has to do with the politicians of this great state (most of them are democrats) running up a massive debt. Since the mid 70s the Department of Education (DOE) has spent over $125 billion on public schools, and for all this money only 32 percent of fourth graders can read proficiently. In most major cities the average annual cost of educating a public high school student is $10,000 and 60 percent of them are illiterate. A few years ago the General Accounting Office audited the DOE and found that they had lost $450 million. How do you lose $450 million? Every year the government spends more and more on education and yet things don't get any better. So how will more money help? It won't and the money is going to have to come from already overtaxed people. The only thing it will do is get some pandering democrat reelected. What is really needed is some financial accountability.

For the students who took part in the protest, I have a question: how many of you pay for your education? If you don't and your parents or guardian do, then you don't have the right to be out there. You can ask them, but knowing the parents I know, they would be against you skipping class to protest for your teachers' cause. Like everything else you protest there fire maybe a handful of you who truly believe in what you are saying. The rest are split between those looking for an excuse to miss class and those who blindly follow their friends or teachers just so they can fit in. So there goes your credibility. But I did ask quite a few students that I passed what they thought of the protest and here's the feedback. It ranged from the always eloquent; "It's f---ed up!" to a more articulate, " It pisses me of that this will affect my degree." However I did manage to find the only two students on campus that supported this action that could debate with me objectively. That meant taking the emotion out of their argument. So that's one positive thing.

Before I get to the teacher bashing I would like to thank my professors Young and Sedgwick and any other teachers that stayed in class, since finals are so near. For an opinion on this subject I asked my mother and a friend of hers that she works with, both who are public school teachers. So if anyone would be supporting this action it would be these two. This is what she said when I asked her what she thought of teachers protesting by not teaching: "Once you decide to conduct yourself in that manner you have removed yourself from the rank of a professional." She agreed with me that it's irresponsible for teachers to protest on a student's time for reasons of greed. I don't have one class that doesn't bore me into a coma, but I still go to class and make the effort. Now this is the least that we should expect from those that get paid to show up.

Does anyone get into teaching for money? If they do then that is an illusion of grandeur. People get into teaching because they like to help people. So it just serves to boggle the mind when a teacher takes the day off to protest. I mean you only work six months of the year. You turn around and you're getting another day or week off. There's Thanksgiving, Winter break, Spring break, MLK day, and that short little break called summer. So it's not as if you don't have ample opportunity to do this without affecting your students. And using your students to further your cause is downright unethical. I myself have lost two jobs to being laid off and one of them I really enjoyed so I can empathize, but I didn't bitch or moan because I knew the cuts had to be made.

I'm not saying you can't protest but do it on your time not your students'. Stop bothering people just walking by and if they tell you they aren't interested then don't keep at them. It just makes you look bad. You may have some real concerns and I can sympathize with them but there are better ways to do things that won't discredit you.

Springfield's moral authority

Regan McKendry

"Do you know why I stopped you?" When a police officer is asking us this question after having pulled us over, I'm sure most of us have less than stellar feelings towards law enforcement. When they come help us out though, whether in a minor jam or a major emergency, we're overjoyed that they're around to provide assistance. Police are always caught in the most basic love-hate relationship. We all love them unless we're the ones getting in trouble.

While it's obvious in such offenses as murder or rape, there is a logical reason that certain laws exist, even the ones we don't like. Anyone who knows me understands that I almost never follow speed laws. I have enough common sense, though, to realize that the limits exist for a reason. There's always a reason for enforcement of the laws that exist. Or at least I thought so until this Saturday night.

Like most weekends, I was down in Springfield having a good time at a dance club I like to frequent. On Saturdays it transforms into an exotic dance bar with huge crowds taking in the breath taking views. This weekend was no exception with eight dancers working the eager audience. The problems started when the police arrived.

> "One of the cops even went so far as to be a smart ass, remarking, 'wouldn't your parents be proud of what you're doing here.'"

The law states that when operating with a license for the display of public nudity that there is to be no sexual contact (i.e. touching you know where). The law is in place to prevent it from transforming from a performance display into gratuitous acts of public sex. Watching what goes on, there is often some small contact happening, simply the exchange between a dancer and the person who is tipping them so nicely. Nobody gets offended and life goes on.

This weekend three undercover officers from the Springfield Police came into the club and witnessed such an interaction between a dancer and customer. While placing the tip inside the waistband of the performer's garment, the gentleman decided to take about five seconds to appreciate what God had given the dancer. It was at this point that the police made their presence known and began taking information from both parties involved.

The manager went and retrieved every license to show the officers. He also proved that there were no violations of having either minors in the club nor any underage drinking taking place. In fact, the manager said of the police after they had left, the officers were very satisfied with the club, complimenting it on the overall good record showed. As was such, the manager tried to comfort the dancer that everything was going to be ok and that probably nothing would come of it.

The dancer in question though couldn't relax. An area college student, he'd been performing at the club for a few months, enjoying his weekends out. Now the police had his name, address, phone number and worst yet, his address at home where his family lives. He was mortified at the prospect of his parents finding out. One of the cops even went so far as to be a smart ass, remarking, "wouldn't your parents be proud of what you're doing here."

No amount of consoling was going to work, as the young man decided instead to just have a few strong drinks and put his head down on the bar. I heard that he even thought suicide might be a better solution than his parents finding out, but not to worry because he'd never have the balls to go through with such an act.

I honestly have no idea what's going to happen with this whole scenario. Most people at the club feel it will just blow over as everything else the police were inspecting passed with flying colors. The manager even said that the law protects the club and its employees, as it specifically states that sexual contact must not be condoned and every effort made to prevent it if at all possible. It acknowledges though that even in a small club, watching eyes can't be everywhere at once.

I felt for the dancer though, and was angry with the police. On a busy weekend night in a city with as many issues as Springfield's, the best thing they could be doing was going in and harassing an entertainer for some harmless interaction. Forget the law for a second and ask yourself who was getting hurt in that situation. The performer was having a good time and making some money while the customer was getting the enjoyment he'd paid for. On the rare chance that things escalated out of control, the manager and numerous security personnel are stationed to resolve any issue.

Say what you will about the legality or morality of what was going on. Sex has been and always will be a part of life. Remember, that prostitution is the oldest profession around, and we're not even talking about anything closely resembling that. It may be against the law, but check around the Commonwealth's list of rules. According to Chapter 272 Section 36 of the General Laws of Massachusetts, it is illegal to commit blasphemy by taking the Lord's name in vain. Such an offense is punishable by a fine of up to $300 and/or a year in prison. You have to love what we have held over from our Puritan forefathers don't you?

For the dancer's sake I hope nothing happens. He was just a young guy at work having some fun making a little extra cash. There's no need to drag his family into his own personal life. I hope the club does avoid a possible citation, as our manager feels they will. And I hope that the police will get it into their heads that there are more important matters to be dealing with. With all the time they spent waiting around the club, they could have probably written at least a half dozen speeding tickets.

Pink paint and other issues

College is a time for you to find an identity and, through the years, strengthen yourself in it. One of the ironic things about this is that, sometimes, people find strength in a small group, but don't maintain that strength as individuals. According to the UMass website, "Nuance is a multicultural living environment for Asian, African American, Latino/a, Native American, multiracial, and Caucasian students. The program addresses the social, academic and cultural needs of students of color while they are attending a predominantly white university." In other words, this is a program designed to give minorities a chance to be separated from the rest of the campus. I see two major contradictions with this program. First of all, the social, academic and cultural needs of individual students of color will only be met when an unbreakable unity is created throughout the school based on the diverse foundation at hand. Another significant role of college is to prepare each person for their future. The future is filled with people of all backgrounds. If people get their strength in college from being with only one group of people, it will be harder for them to go into the real world.

I think a support program is a great idea. I understand how a program like this can be beneficial to a small group of people for a small period of time. It allows for an environment that provides the group with a sense of comfort and security. However, I think that making this program a living environment is not only holding back the individual from individual growth, but also holding back the campus from communal growth. The social, academic, and cultural needs of the campus as a whole is to be exposed to these different cultures. These floors just make it less likely for other buildings on campus to be diverse. Without that diverse foundation, no overall unity could ever exist. If you have a big bowl of white paint and you want to make it pink, it will get you nowhere to keep the red paint in a separate bowl. Even though the paint is predominantly white, a couple drops of red will affect the whole bowl. It would be more beneficial to everyone to set up support programs in each living area than to make the support programs a living area.

> "The social, academic and cultural needs of the campus as a whole is to be exposed to these different cultures."

Another example is the group on campus calling for gender-neutral restrooms. The idea behind a gender-neutral restroom is a beautiful one. It presents the students with a small sense of unity between men, women, and transgendered individuals to have that option of a third bathroom. This idea of a third bathroom is good in general, but bad in theory. A third bathroom is not only beneficial to transgendered individuals, but also to handicapped people and fathers with babies, for example. However, the message being delivered is unclear. You are demanding equal rights but calling for separation. I see two problems with this. One, it seems like, as transgendered individuals, you have chosen which sex you are, regardless of what you were born as. If you have the strength to fight for an extra bathroom, you should have the strength to be the sex you are, regardless of whether you have the genitalia to prove it or not. Making a third bathroom strengthens you in university life but doesn't strengthen you for the real world, which has only two bathroom options. Two, while I think a unisex bathroom is beneficial, the logic behind it almost seems like we're going backwards. One of the advancements in our society was desegregating the bathrooms. This third bathroom idea almost sounds like it will be segregation rather than just a third option.

The essential goal of any university is to create a diverse learning environment for the students and to prepare those students for the diverse world they will soon enter. I think, at this point, the next step is to make pink paint and spill it out into the real world.

Letter to the Editor:

Minuteman has special ties to university

To the Editor:

The Collegian is correct in calling for more time and wider input before any change is made in the Minuteman mascot. The Minuteman is far more to UMass than a symbol of this state. This campus has a unique historic tie to the origins of the Minuteman dating from the very beginning of the University in 1863.

The sculptor of the original Minuteman statue, now standing at the historic bridge at Concord where the colonial patriots first repelled the British, lived as a high school boy on the east side of this campus in the Stockbridge House that now houses the University Faculty Club. He worked on the college farm from the founding of the University and decorated the walls of his bedroom with elaborate pencil drawings. Because the regular student body had not arrived on campus, his father, Henry Flagg French, first President of what is now UMass, referred to him as our "first graduate."

That boy went on from this campus to become a world-renowned sculptor. While the Minuteman was his first public sculpture, he is even better known for another world famous sculpture. This boy, our first "first graduate," was Daniel Chester French, the sculptor of the Lincoln Memorial in Washington D.C.

Many first-ranked universities would like to have legitimate claim to such a mascot. We should take pride in the fact that it is ours and we should keep it that way.

Arafat's presence preventing peace

Gilad Skolnick

One of the things that makes me proud of UMass is its support for the only country in the Middle East that is a democracy, has equal rights for all its citizens (including women, religions and homosexuals) and the only country with a free press. So far over 5,800 signatures have been gathered from UMass and surrounding communities in support of Israel. This overwhelming support is evidence that we care about peace, justice, equality and democracy in the Middle East. As an avid advocate for social justice, I feel of proud of my community and my country's support of Israel. Despite this, when debating Israel, a lot of people give Israel a hard time for not working harder with Arafat to come up with a peaceful solution to the violence that plagues the region, but there are a few things not so spectacular about Arafat's governing regime that they fail to note.

As Israel struggles to defend herself against terrorists and suicide bombers, she is also trying to make peace with the Palestinian Authority, led by an oppressive dictator and terrorist, Arafat. The London Daily Telegraph reports that the Palestinian Authority has eight billion dollars in bank accounts all over the world, while other sources reveal that over 50 billion dollars in stock is owned by the Palestinian Authority. Meanwhile, Arafat and his henchmen horde billions in wealth while the Palestinian people are surviving on a bit over $2 a day unless they take Arafat up on his offer of 25 thousand dollars to take the job of a suicide bomber, with the simple goal of murdering as many Jewish civilians as possible. This is simply cruelty and greed, with their prime minister living in a life of wealth and luxury as the Palestinians scramble to make ends meet.

Even worse, the Palestinians are routinely subjected to arbitrary charges of traffic violations, demands of large bribes, kidnapping for money and extortion of 70-90 percent from the income of private businesses, all of which is rampant in the PA. Furthermore, most of Arafat's henchmen who were appointed to different positions in the government are criminals as well.

Jibril Rajoub, Preventative Security Head in the West Bank, was widely reported to extort protection money from oil distributors, to receive kickbacks from the Jericho casino until it closed and to steal intellectual property, presumably in concert with the other counterfeiting rings operating in the PA territories. Jibril Rajoub and his men are also implicated in car theft networks.

Far from peace, Arafat has worked tirelessly to promote violence. In the Alamari refugee camp in Ramallah, schools are covered with prominently displayed posters glorifying suicide attacks, armed struggle and the leaders of the terrorist wing of Hamas.

Fostering hate and encouraging homicide bombing is not limited to the Palestinian educational system. Chairman Arafat himself, on many public, well-documented occasions, has encouraged children to become "shahidim" (homicide bombers).

Further evidence of the PA's encouragement of violence is when the newly appointed Prime Minister of the PA, Mahmud Abas, told the Kuwaiti newspaper Alzamin (Arabic) on June 20, 2002 that Palestinian Children are given 5 shekels (about $1 US) for each pipe bomb they throw at soldiers. What are the values of a government that sends its children to the front lines to attack Israeli soldiers?

But after much pressure from Israel, Arafat agreed to have elections for a new prime minister, which he canceled, and just recently appointed a guy by the name of Mahmoud Abbas. God forbid there should be a democracy. Another one of Arafat's buddies, he's publicly expressed his support for continuing the violence and terrorism on Palestinian television. In the 1980's he wrote a book explaining that the amount of Jews murdered in the Holocaust was grossly exaggerated and was at most a few hundred thousand, and that Jews participated in the Holocaust to encourage European Jews to leave Europe for Israel. How can anyone who has such a distorted view of reality be an adequate prime minister?

Securing his power through hate and violence, Arafat has been continuously working on making sure that peace never happens, and that his oppressive dictatorship stands. Born in Egypt, he eventually moved to the West Bank where he and his henchmen have been kidnapping, hijacking, extorting, murdering and doing everything else possible for power.

Along with the lack of free press, a justice system, or any other rights, women are denied their basic rights, with such practices as honor killings remaining prevalent in the Palestinian territories. If a woman ruins her family's honor by having sex before her marriage, then it is perfectly legal for her brother or father to murder her, which happens dozens of times a year. The PA and Arafat have done nothing to put an end to this.

Until Arafat is gone, the Palestinian people have no hope for a better future, and the world has no hope for any peace in the Middle East. Arafat has routinely denied his people peace, saying no to peace with Israel at negotiations in Camp David a few years ago that would have resulted in receiving over 95 percent of the land that he wanted, and leaving the table without a counteroffer. The Palestinians deserve better and the world does too.

Falling prices lead to judgment day

Adrienne Bossi

I had a nightmare the other night. I was trapped in this huge building with endless rows of shelves illuminated by florescent lights. There were yellow smiley faces falling from signs around every corner. I slowly came to realize that this hell was trying to entice me to stay by providing everything I needed to survive: food, water, shelter and even an income. I abruptly woke up and understood that this was not a regular dream. It was a premonition. Parts of this nightmare have already come true.

Being raised by parents who each operate their own small business has instilled in me a passion against two fundamental institutions: big business and the Republican Party. I'd like to focus on just big business, though. These monopolies are globalizing the world market and minimizing the value of each individual worker. Among the scariest of these corporations is Walmart.

My recent trip home for the long weekend heightened my fear and disdain for Walmart. Doom looms over Raynham, Massachusetts in the form of a crane and dust cloud as my local Walmart undergoes construction. A supermarket is being added onto the already gigantic store. A supermarket! Come on! I can just picture it: after every Walmart finishes building a supermarket mega-store, they will then add adjoining apartments onto each location. People will eat, sleep, shop, and work in Walmart. It will become a self-sustaining mini country. With a Walmart-World in virtually every town and city, it is inevitable that the entire population will gradually get sucked into its utter convenience and perpetually falling prices. The future, as my dream predicted, looks grim. Let's look at the various ways this future will lead to the end of the world.

> "With a Walmart-World in virtually every town and city, it is inevitable that the entire population will gradually get sucked into its utter convenience and perpetually falling prices."

Being perpetually surrounded by bright artificial lights and very cheap products will ultimately lead to depression. (Disclaimer: I once took a psych class. I know what I'm talking about. Do not self diagnose). I do not think I would be able to develop a good self image if all of my time was spent in very unforgiving lighting wearing unflattering clothes manufactured by White Stag and the Olsen twins. Many people use their clothing as an expression of their individuality and creativity. Everyone we know will be wearing the same things. Walmart-World will look like a society of clones. Furthermore, much of our happiness is derived from our surroundings. If we are surrounded by mass-produced discount items what will that do to our happiness? Have you ever noticed the plethora of overflowing bins of returned products at the customer service desk? My last three purchases from Walmart have resulted in three subsequent returns. The human psyche will be greatly affected by these cheap surroundings. Moreover, people need light. Why do you think some of us get cabin fever? (We psychology experts like to call it seasonal depression.) It is theorized that some of our biological patterns change temporarily due to seasonal changes in the amount of daylight. So, I can circuitously conclude that being immersed in discount Walmart fluorescent lights at all times will most definitely spurn an outbreak of seasonal depression among Walmart-World citizens.

My next concern is that of malnutrition. I mean, how much nutrition can be found in discount groceries? Where is the produce grown and by who? Or is it just left over rejected produce from legitimate supermarkets? If there is anything I am willing spend my money on its food. I want high quality food. Its not like groceries are revoltingly over priced, either. I'll pay the extra 25 cents to eat a Dole Banana than buy an entire Mary Kate and Ashley banana tree for the same price.

My nightmare is starting to come true with the addition of supermarkets onto every Walmart store. It is only a matter of time until the Walmart apartment complexes are built thus signaling the decline of human society as we know it. With the human population surrounded by the appeal of Walmart convenience and its yellow smiley face warning you of falling prices it is certain that people will flock to Walmart world. Human society will be overwhelmed. There will be no traditional neighborhoods left. The market will crash due to Walmart's monopoly of every facet of the economy. Those that live outside will include Walmart CEO's, the Olson twins, and bands of people unable or unwilling to conform. They will be faced with a decision to conform or adopt a hard life living off the land. Those that conform will, in time, develop symptoms of depression complimented by malnutrition. Human society will collapse as people become unable to do anything but wallow in their own self-pity and dream of Antonio's. So, the moral of my story is, support small business and vote democrat.

Rock prevails at live concerts

Within the past five years, rock has sucked – let's face it.

Everything sounds the same, everyone looks the same, and if a rocker can't think of an original idea, they'll copy something from the past, which is even worse.

As I have mentioned in previous articles, rap is taking over the music world, leaving rock all alone babysitting its irritating little brother on a Saturday night.

I was thinking to myself the other day — as always, I asked myself, where does rock prevail? Is there something out there that makes rock better than rap? There definitely is.

Live concerts

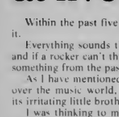
I have been a frequent concert-goer since I was 16 years old. Most of the concerts I have seen are rock, with the exception of three rap concerts: Ludacris, Jay-Z, and Eminem. All in all, rap concerts are worse than getting Bubbalicious stuck in your hair. It pretty much consists of the main rapper, a microphone, all of his friends from home, lots of bling-bling, little children (assuming they are the offspring of his friends from home) and a couple of DJs that actually make the concert possible. The only thing "live" are the bodies on that stage – not the music. A lot of the time (from my experience at least) the rapper will rap, his friends will rap, but most of the time, there's a background recording. Now why did I just shell out a good amount of dough to see a rapper get wasted with his buddies on stage?

Um, no thanks.

Rock concerts!

Oh my God, rock concerts. My first rock concert was Radiohead opening up for Alanis Morrissette when I was 16. The sounds of the live guitar traveling through the warm, ocean-scented air and the intense beats of the drums definitely altered my heartbeat. There is something about live rock music – the instruments, the lead vocalist's voice, the crowd banging their heads and the energy from the performers puts you in a euphoric state that only ends the next week when you're bored of telling people how amazing the concert was.

Rock concerts are a lot more personal than rap concerts, and the size of the venue doesn't even matter. Rockers get the crowd involved through their musical energy, and rappers get the crowd involved by making them wave their hands and say "Yo" as if they were gorillas.



Rockers can surprise their audience by playing an acoustic version of one of their hit songs. Rappers can surprise their audience by playing only half of their song.

Rap concerts are always so done up. The stage is always jam-packed with unnecessary things, bodies and whatever else they can do to distract you. Rock concerts are simple. It consists of the band, their instruments, and maybe a fireball or two – nothing fancy.

Rock concerts can scare you in a good way. For example, a Marilyn Manson concert. I was in the front row, literally a foot away from Manson's face. In short, I was scared out of my mind. His make-up, twisted smile and his eyes made me nervous, but it also gave me a rush. I loved every minute of it.

That's another thing: eye contact. Rockers always (and I mean always) make eye contact with their audience. Rappers don't at all. Eminem didn't look at his audience once during his performance. Not even the people right in front of his face in the front row. Aerosmith's Steven Tyler stared at his audience's eyes as if he was receiving or sending a secret message.

So here you go folks – rock rules. Well, when it comes to live concerts at least. Maybe 50 Cent will change my perception of rap concerts on Sunday. Haha. I don't think so.

Rockin' Out

For many of those in attendance at this Sunday's Spring Concert, Reel Big Fish might seem drastically out of place, opening for hip-hop artists 50 Cent and Rahzel.

But that matters little to this high-energy sextet, who are used to being on diverse bills.

"I like the diversion of doing the college shows," says Tyler Jones, the band's recent addition at trumpet. "It's a constant opportunity to make friends, and we always know that there will be crazy college kids around." Jones said that his group has played with acts such as George Clinton, India Arie and Busta Rhymes on its recent college swing.

Reel Big Fish dropped off somewhat from the mainstream radar following its 1997 single "Sell Out," which kicked off its breakthrough album "Turn the Radio Off." The album was officially released during the previous summer, but "Sell Out" started to receive heavy airplay in 1997 when the ska craze hit MTV. Along with acts such as No Doubt and Sublime, the Fish were promoted as one of the stars in this newly pop-

Its looks are deceiving if you are browsing through the bins of the local music store, but "The New Breed" is actually a DVD consisting of a documentary, live performances and music videos along with a three song bonus disc. The overall product is rushed and seems poorly thrown together, but it definitely has its moments.

The documentary is a half-hour long though it might as well been five minutes because that is the extent to which 50 even speaks. In these five minutes, 50 explains how he got started and how he got signed by Eminem. The story is strung together through various clips in between jumbled footage set behind songs off of "Get Rich or Die Tryin'." The story isn't anything new to 50's fans and not worth checking out by anyone short of that.

The disc also includes the videos for "In Da Club" and "Wanksta," which are a must-have for die-hard fans but are nothing new to the view-

Due to the ridiculous hype surrounding rap-puppet 50 Cent – the product of Dr. Dre and Eminem's commercial genius – most students' MTV-induced tunnel-vision might not allow them to enjoy any of the other acts Sunday at the Spring Concert. And it's a true shame, as Rahzel – one of the most vocally gifted artists out there – should be the highlight of the night for UMass' hip-hop population.

In a live setting, it doesn't get much better than Rahzel – the Godfather of Noyze – a true master of the beatbox, hip-hop's fifth element. Most notably a member of The Roots, the hip-hop band that stole the show at last year's Spring Concert, Rahzel has redefined his art. Not only has he mastered vocal percussion, but his oral mimics of turntable trickery and other abnormal sound effects are first class. Only Scratch, also of Roots fame, might top Rahzel in the vocal turntablism category. But only in that category.

Rahzel's most famous song, "If Your Mother Only Knew," is a testament to his all-around dexterity, which Scratch doesn't possess. It's difficult to grasp, but Rahzel simultaneously sings while providing the song's background beat. If you're human, you'll be impressed. And don't be embarrassed when you go home, grab a hairbrush, hide in the closet and try to mouth it yourself. It's only natural. "To hear him," MCA Records claims, "is to be converted."

"Make the Music 2000," Rahzel's only solo album, is an assortment of nearly every musical genre, but with vivid urban authority. There's jazz on "Steal My Soul," which features Meshell Ndegeocello, and saxophone riffs from Branford Marsalis, as Rahzel provides – vocally, of course – the rest of the instrumentation. There's near-folk on "Southern Girl," featuring Erykah Badu. There's straight hip-hop on "All I Know," the first single from the album. And then there's straight beatboxing on "Wu-Tang Medley," for example, in which Rahzel provides a mix of several beats and samples from the hip-hop classic, "Enter the Wu-Tang: 36 Chambers." Live tracks and quality guest appearances, from Slick Rick, Q-Tip and The Roots, help turn "Make the Music" into a fairly successful record.

But critics hesitate to hail Rahzel as a legitimate emcee. His lyrical handle isn't top-notch and it's easily noticed on "Make the Music." It's not that he's an overgrown Jermaine Dupri, because Rahzel definitely has his moments ("All I Know," for example). He just might overshadow himself, at times. It's almost like Eminem vocally scratching on "Without Me." There's no need. As we've seen on all The Roots albums (for example, "? vs. Rahzel" from "Do You Want More?!!?!?!" or "Adrenaline" from "Things Fall Apart"), Rahzel fits perfect in the background. Not as a frontman.

Don't expect excessive rhyming from Rahzel on Sunday, though. His past shows have been predominantly beat and sound oriented. Two years ago at Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton, he wowed the crowd by voicing a helicopter battle with machine guns. And yes, people looked up at the ceiling.

If you haven't seen him yet, make sure you're there before 50 Cent hits the stage Sunday. Originally from Queens, N.Y., Rahzel is hip-hop's lonesy (from Police Academy). In excess, he can be a little much, but he's still entertaining as hell.

And he's made it here all by himself.

Eric Soderstrom is a Collegian Columnist, and won't be at the Mullins Center when 50 Cent shows up four hours late.

Rahzel will rock the Mullins Center on Sunday.

Reel Big Fish: It's time to talk 'Radio Off' ular genre.

"I was 18 at the time. It was a cool way for people to go out and express themselves," Jones remembers.

But after the release of "Why Do They Rock So Hard?" in October of 1998, it took the band nearly four years to give its fans another full-length album. During the intermediate period, Jones said the band went on numerous tours, but also spent considerable time in the studio recording new material. In June 2002, Reel Big Fish finally returned with "Cheer Up!" after spending nearly two and a half years from start to finish making the album just right.

It also didn't help that their former label, Mojo Records, was soon going out of business, unbeknownst to the band. Much of what the band had for newly material was swiftly rejected by Mojo, which hosted other bands like Goldfinger and the Cherry Poppin' Daddies.

"They were like, 'F_ this, we don't like this,' Jones recalls. "They didn't tell us they were in the process of dissolving." Luckily for Reel Big Fish, Jive Records came to the rescue and promptly signed the band.

Meanwhile, the band saw a minor overhaul of the lineup. Drummer Andrew Gonzales was replaced with Carlos de la Garza, and Jones joined as the band's new trumpeter shortly before "Cheer Up!" was completed. Jones was formerly a member of Connecticut ska legends Spring Heeled Jack, whose alumni currently play in groups such as the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, Less than Jake and Lost City Angels.

Many of Reel Big Fish's fans have said that the band has shied away from its straight ska-punk roots to a more rock-oriented feel. But for what "Cheer Up!" lacks in the raw, youthful energy of "Turn the Radio Off," it brings a tighter, more musically mature repertoire. Jones says that it's mostly due to the group's continued growth.

"They used to be the biggest comedy routine in the world," Jones says. "I would say that it's just that they've grown up."

That's not to say that any of the self-deprecating, humorous lyrics are gone from their latest output. "Cheer Up!" includes such gems as "Dateless Losers," in which the band laments about being a group of just that, and "Ban the Tube Top." Lead vocalist Aaron Barrett sings about a young lass he can't get out of his head, saying "you're out of sight/you keep me up at night/you keep me up at night/strapless and skintight."

Fans of Reel Big Fish should expect them to continue touring and producing the upbeat, less-than-serious music that has kept them alive for the past seven years. After all, they still have more than a few expenses to attend to.

"The payments on my Maserati don't run out for another five or six years," Jones laughs.

The album 'Friends for Life' offers positive political message

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Correspondent

Modern day reggae legend Buju Banton's new CD "Friends for Life," which was just released in March, is one that is easily appealing to the ears and is much improved since his Grammy-nominated release "'Til Siloh," back in 1995.

"Friends for Life" is an upbeat album, which leaves the listener with many positive messages. Love is a prevalent theme of the album. Lyrics such as, "If your loving is an ocean, then drown me / Knock me up, pick me up, and rebound me," from the track "Tra La La," convey this message. In fact, the majority of tracks on this album are about love, such as "Teaser," "Maybe We Are," "Hooked on Love," "Get it on" and "Pensive Mood." Another main message Banton brings up is the right for every person's freedom. Banton, also known as "The Voice of Jamaica," speaks of the struggles of Jamaican people throughout its history on the track "Up Ye Mighty Race." One line that is repeated throughout the chorus is, "Stand up, defend your rights," at one point after asking the question, "How long must our people be a human sacrifice?" Banton also devotes a track to an excerpt of a legendary speech by Marcus Mosiah Garvey, a Rasta progenitor and founder of the Black Star Liner Company.

Banton's music style has progressed quite a bit since the release of his 1995 album "'Til Siloh," which received critical acclaim and is highly regarded as a good listen by many reggae lovers. On "'Til Siloh," Banton's sound is a bit coarse and many of the songs start and end abruptly. His voice is definitely on the louder side, and at times listening to his singing could give a person a headache. However, Banton fixed all of these problems throughout his career, and these imperfections do not come through on his latest album.

"Friends for Life" is much smoother than "'Til Siloh." The flow in between tracks is frictionless and the music at the ending of each of the tracks is slow.

His music began as mostly loud reggae and has ranged from that specific genre all the way to a soul/reggae/psychedelic/hip-hop style. The first track, "Paid Not Played," begins with almost a psychedelic or techno style beat. Meanwhile the last track has a traditional reggae beat with a prevalent bass line. This technique of not being limited to one specific genre works well on this CD. The frequent mix of hip-hop and soul throughout the album breaks up the repetition of a traditional reggae sound.

The CD is fast and slowly paced at different times throughout its 70-minute duration, which is a technique Banton pulls off very well. The vibe of the music is never so slow that it might put someone into a trance like a slowly paced Grateful Dead song, however it's not so fast that it will put a person into an angry mood so bad that he or she might want to hurt someone, like a DMX track. At the end of listening to the CD, I felt neither tired nor energized. The variation of pace is done in a rightful way.

The hip-hop hooks in "Friends for Life" are of a good variation and are fitting for a time when hip-hop dominates mainstream music. There are many guest appearances on this album, including one by rapper Fat Joe and Beres Hammond on the track "Good Times." Choosing Fat Joe to be a guest on the track was definitely a smart choice for Banton. Not only does the name bring publicity to the album, but also the talents of Fat Joe work well with Banton's style and give someone another reason to buy this CD.

It would be hard for a person to complain about this album because there are few flaws and the music is off the hook. If you are even into reggae just a little bit, you will probably like this album. There are a few parts where Banton seems to shout just a little too much, but the range of music that accompanies it almost cancels it out. If you think you want to start listening to more reggae music, Buju Banton's "Friends for Life" is a good place to start.

many times and the popular tag given to the crossbreed has been industrial.

"Changes" boasts sexy and sleazy horns that will surely please My Life With the Thrill Kill Kult fans. Elsewhere, the whiteboy hip-hop leanings beckon the ghosts of early Pop Will Eat Itself and Meat Beat Manifesto without the dweeby English accents. In fact, the eponymous album by A.R.E Weapons works so well as an industrial album that one is almost tempted to ignore their other influences.

The minimalist aesthetic of "Street Gang" renders the track to be the most harrowing and serious on the album. Some have even been as bold to say that its inclusion on 2001's EP of the same name single-handedly revived the work of forgotten New York electro pioneers Suicide. Listening to the track in the context of this larger work drastically alters the atmospheric paranoia of the virtually indistinguishable EP version. Here it sounds like the lost level off of Nintendo's "Bad Dudes," which surprisingly enough does not detract from the overall enjoyment of the song. Whether it's a reference point to relatively inaccessible postpunk pioneers or just a sweet and gleeful outburst of 8-bit synth yodeling, "Street Gang" like the rest of the contradictions on the album, incite crossover appeal to the opposite spectrums of the indie crowd. Stoopid or self-aware, A.R.E Weapons can bust out a fine tune.

Cat Power runs 'Free'

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

As Cat Power, singer/songwriter Chan Marshall remains a stranger to us all, five albums into a career of constructing elementary, musical highs lined with devastating, emotional lows. Hers is a voice that tugs on the heartstrings of boys seeking refuge in its vulnerability and inspires a subtle defiance in others with its determination to kick, scream and, if need be, crawl under pressure rather than simply sit down. Note by note you can feel a world of hurt being liberated by her lullaby voice, the dark ruminations spilling out in a way so honey-sweet and naturally bitter you won't realize the damage done until the last note has fallen away.

On "You Are Free," Marshall's first album of original Cat Power material since 1998's "Moon Pix," the singer digs in her trunk for dressings both old and new; what she emerges with are the down turned lips of a piano balladeer, the solemn introspection of a folk minstrel, and the smiling, optimistic thoughts of a girl, her guitar and the friends who happened by to support her muse. The combination is at once frustrating difficult and likely the most beautiful sound you'll hear this year.

"You were swinging your guitar around, cause they wanted to hear that sound that you didn't want to play / I don't blame you, I don't blame you," whispers Marshall on "I Don't Blame You." The song doubles as the album's threshold and most damning moment of interpretation: the delayed voice that apprehensively hovers over the nodding piano arrangement here implicates more than Marshall may have intended – namely, herself. It's a mirror confession by a not-so thinly veiled public self, staggering at self-conscious second-behind and questioning its need to be heard at all.

More often, though, the power in Marshall's humility wins out over its reluctant surface, and she moves forward from the doubt to embrace a more abstract sense of identity. The self-referencing vocals are a haunting addition – definition leaves her lyrics and meaning is achieved rather through the sound of her voice.

Like on "Werewolf," the Michael Hurley cover she redresses with a film of shivering violins. Beautifully arranged, it evokes moments of uncomfortable intimacy, as does "Good Woman," arguably her best effort here. A simple, fingerpicked expression of lovers many losses, Marshall nearly cries her way towards the subliminal tension provided by guest Eddie Vedder in the closing verses. Seldom does restraint sing so loudly.

And when tasteful reserve does make a call to rock, Marshall salutes. The toy-piano introduction on "He War" yields to buzzing guitars and marching drumbeats that slide to a chorus in which she out and out pronounces, pulls from the deep of her gut, the bottled up energy of a woman on the run. The momentum spills out, working over to "Free," a skeletal song snapped into motion by an intermittent, new-wave drum machine, and "Speak For Me," which rewrites conventional song structure by leaving loose ends rough and tying them up into the circular chorus at the end.

When she's caught up with herself, and only then, Marshall is settled enough to pull us in and around her retelling of John Lee Hooker's "Keep on Running." How unique that she can respond to herself – and her audience – through the reflexes of another, the slow blues of a man now dead and buried. Her voice isn't like blood, it is the stuff itself, keeping the overbearing emotion here alive.

The tolling "Evolution" runs itself down at the end, Vedder's voice again a shadow to her own deep end. Humming along like two broke-down lovers, the coupling of the pair implies a second-hand hope; if you've come this far, you can only leave by looking up.

"You Are Free" isn't the perfect album that the Cat Power community had been hoping for; it's a neighborhood of broken homes, empty streets and backstage alleys open for exploration, a wholly dark scene save for the brief flashes of street-light optimism. In those moments there are entire worlds to step into, though, and while Marshall will be doing her best to keep a step ahead at every turn, it's a pursuit worth taking on.

A.R.E. Weapons bust a fine tune

By Timothy Gabrielle
Collegian Staff

Listeners who approach the first full-length album from New York's A.R.E. Weapons will react in one of two ways; they will either get the joke or they will not. This is quite odd because after listening to the album several times through I'm still not sure whether A.R.E. Weapons get their own joke or not. It seems irrelevant though. This is a great album.

Those not in on the joke will probably detest everything it stands for. The lyrics are utterly simple and inform us the listeners of nothing that we don't already know (kids today are bored, the streets are tough, etc…). It is the execution that raises A.R.E. Weapons a tier or two above its contemporaries in the so-called electroclash category that the twosome has been lumped into by association.

Mr. Electroclash incorporated Larry Tee recently remarked, "There is no electroclash sound. It's more of a rebellious attitude." If this is true, then A.R.E. Weapons are perhaps the first band to completely epitomize the scene's desired attitude. The band's very name begins with an acronym for Absolute Raw Energy. While this assertion may be a stretch, it perfectly demonstrates the band's adolescent posturing. In press photos, band members and Boston natives Brian McPeck and Matt McAuley look like aging white trash metalheads trying to be hip-hop-swearing-by urban street gang members, their bandanas pulling back their trés chic mullets. The vulture-like fashion elite who has embraced electroclash's oh-so-ironic anti-fashion statements regularly attends their shows.

Luckily for Larry Tee and the image factory, A.R.E Weapons make even better music than clothing choices. Projecting themselves outwardly as teens stuck between difficult choices, it is art music that almost makes sense. The course of the 36-minute disc runs across blatantly obvious contradictions that compose much of the record's sardonic humor and anxious intensity. Both their image and their music wander back and forth between devil-horn flailing headbanger and greedy ghetto gangsta thugs and trendy elitist art rock spoken word pomes and sophomoric calls to arms. The album even begins with "Don't Be Scared," a celebratory declaration of the … ahem, awesomeness of life and proceeds to end with the painfully cynical statement "You're either part of the problem or you're part of the fucking miserable solution that we call life."

One must first accept and embrace these contradictions if he/she is to enjoy the wonder of A.R.E Weapon's debut. Those who do go on will be welcomed into a world that facilitates the kind of comfort that most nu-metal bands strive for; a place where just about everything in the world is shit, and A.R.E Weapons are the only ones who understand you.

The opening track "Don't Be Scared" may just be the highlight of the album. It calls for the unity of all the freaks and geeks of the world to refuse to live in fear and just be themselves, because that's f'n awesome. "People think you're a spaz/ just because you're a spaz/ So what?!" vocalist Brian McPeck spouts off in what turns into a list of those all those societally deemed scumbags who he instructs to be "cool" rather than "scared." Behind his edifying mantras lies an equally anthematic synth horn orchestra and dramatic and inspirational crunch guitar that plunges back to the excessive explosions of mid-to-late eighties new wave.

Oh, that's another thing. A.R.E Weapons are definitely living in another time. This is not the sound-track to 21st century paranoid war era despair. However, it's not exactly clear just where in history A.R.E's brand of ass-shaking skeleton party music belongs. The confused kid poise brings to mind Marilyn Manson at the height of his popularity, but McPeck's voice is much more old-school gotham than gothic, conjuring up the welcoming hipster voices of soho beatniks with a little added attitude. The use of samples sets them apart from their analogue-minded electro peers. Upon first inspection, "Strange Dust"'s trip-hop flavor could have been cut by Tricky himself.

Perhaps the Weapons are best defined by the bridging of gaps between New York's two most successful, burgeoning, and retroactive scenes; postpunk and electro. While most NYC electro has focused mainly on paying homage to the very early roots of Kraftwerkian pop and nerdy, robotic hip-hop, A.R.E Weapons proudly brings their music to the point where Depeche Mode began selling out football stadiums. On the postpunk end, they grease the wheels of Section 25 and Suicide to jumpstart new hybrid territory. Those who know their history will soon realize however that the territory between postpunks and new wavers has already been crossed

Jackson's home videos prove dull for Fox sweeps month

By DAVID BAUDER
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – The bubble has burst on Michael Jackson's status as a TV ratings sensation. Either that, or people don't want to watch his home movies any more than they do anyone else's.

"Michael Jackson's Home Videos," a Fox special that opened the latest sweeps period last Thursday, was seen by only 7.8 million viewers, according to Nielsen Media Research.

It made February seem a distant memory. That's when 27.1 million people watched Jackson's interview on ABC with British journalist Martin Bashir setting off a rush of Jackson-related programming. A Fox special in response to Bashir's interview and a "Dateline NBC" about Jackson also did very well.

Meanwhile, 15.4 million people watched Diane Sawyer's interview last week with the Dixie Chicks about an antiwar remark made by singer Natalie Maines. That was ABC's most popular show of the week.

CBS, behind the continued dominance of "CSI: Crime Scene Investigation," was the week's most-watched network. It averaged 12.7 million viewers in prime time (8.5 rating, 14 share). The long-running NBC comedy "Just Shoot Me" had a disastrous performance last Tuesday, with back-to-back episodes failing to even reach 5 million viewers. The show is a likely candidate for cancellation when the networks decide on their fall schedules in two weeks.

Viewers are also giving the gong to NBC's "America's Most Talented Kid," which has roughly a third of the audience for Fox's "American Idol."

NBC was the week's second-place network, averaging 11 million viewers (7.4 rating, 12 share). Fox was third with 10.3 million viewers (6.5, 10), but first among the 18-to-49-year-old demographic advertisers seek. ABC was fourth in all categories with 8.5 million viewers (5.7, 9).

The WB averaged 4.1 million viewers (2.7, 4), UPN 3.1 million (2.0, 3) and Pax 1.1 million (0.8, 1).

NBC's "Nightly News" won the evening news ratings race, averaging 10.3 million viewers (7.4 rating, 15 share). ABC's "World News Tonight" was second, averaging 9.5 million viewers (6.8, 14) and the "CBS Evening News" had 7.7 million (5.6, 11).

A ratings point represents 1,067,000 households, or 1 percent of the nation's estimated 106.7 million TV homes. The share is the percentage of in-use televisions tuned to a given show. For the week of April 21-27, the top 10 shows, their networks and viewerships: "CSI: Crime Scene Investigation," CBS, 25.2 million; "ER," NBC, 20.9 million; "Friends," NBC, 20.7 million; "American Idol-Tuesday," Fox, 20.6 million; "Friends" special, NBC, 20.2 million; "American Idol-Wednesday," Fox, 19.5 million; "CBS Sunday Movie: A Painted House," CBS, 18.5 million; "Survivor: Amazon," CBS, 18.1 million; "Law & Order," NBC, 18.1 million; "Will & Grace," NBC, 17.7 million.

Berlin Philharmonic announces new season

BERLIN (AP) – The Berlin Philharmonic's repertoire for the 2003-04 season mixes tradition with newly commissioned works as Simon Rattle continues to put his imprint on the famed concert hall in his second season as chief conductor and artistic director.

In keeping with Rattle's desire to combine the classics with innovative new works, the season opens Sept. 5-6 with Brahm's First Piano Concerto played by Krystian Zimerman, a work by the French composer Henri Dutilleux commissioned by Rattle and Dubussy's most popular concert work, "La Mer."

"We want to simply create new art," Rattle said Monday, adding that he hopes to incorporate an increasing number of commissioned works.

Other commissioned works include a piece for 12 cellists by Tan Dun, the Chinese composer of the "Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon" soundtrack. June 17-19, and pieces by German composer Heiner Goebbels and Chilean composer Chaneral Ortega-Miranda.

"Classical music belongs to everyone. We'll never have a mass market. We have to make people realize what riches we have here," he said.

The season is composed of 85 symphonies and 120 concerts, including three concert series: one featuring Lars Vogt as the Philharmonic's first pianist in residence, with his debut in December 2003; Cecilia Bartoli singing baroque music; and six concerts with the complete cycle of Beethoven's string quartets.

The wide-ranging repertoire also includes traditional works by Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, as well as newer pieces by composers such as John Adams and Goebbels.

Among the soloists making guest appearances are pianists Emanuel Ax and Lang Lang, violinist Anne Sophie Mutter and sopranos Barbara Bonney and Renee Fleming.

The orchestra will tour the United States Nov. 12-25, with stops in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco; and Europe from May 1-June 28, with stops in Athens, Rome, Vienna and four German cities.

Treasure Island casino in Las Vegas sheds old image

LAS VEGAS (AP) – For years, the Treasure Island hotel-casino – with its pyrotechnic pirate show and menacing marquee – has carried the reputation as a Disney-esque destination for families.

Never mind it happens to be smack in the middle of Sin City and the casino specializes in adult activities, where gambling and alcohol abound.

"We never catered to kids," Treasure Island President Scott Sibella said recently. "We are here to serve adults. But you just can't go out and tell people they can't bring their kids."

Now, as Las Vegas hotels have added swinging adult clubs and pushed the envelope with risque revues, the resort is trying to rid itself of its PG image.

Treasure Island is recasting itself as "TI" and adding some spice to the pirate extravaganza that attracts 4.5 million people annually.

The new $2 million version will include the "Sirens of TI," sexy females who will duel renegade pirates in what the casino calls a "sensual modern interpretation" of the old "Battle of Buccaneer Bay."

Sibella described the old show as "a little tired," and one in need of a swashbuckling facelift. It's been around since the 3,000-room Treasure Island opened in 1993.

Along with the revamped show, set to open in October, Treasure Island is removing its skull-and-bones marquee on the Strip and replacing it with a stylish, neon "TI" logo. The words "Treasure Island" that adorn the top of the property's facade will stay.

"We are not changing the name," Sibella said. "It will always be Treasure Island. What we're trying to do is have a trendier and sexier name."

Sibella said the latest improvements coincide with the casino's internal evolution, where most traces of pirates are long gone.

Major studio lured to Louisiana by incentive program

NEW ORLEANS (AP) – Taking advantage of Louisiana's new film incentive program, Walt Disney Pictures will begin shooting a baseball movie starring comedian Bernie Mac.

"Mr. 3000," to be produced by Disney's Touchstone division, is set to begin shooting May 28, said Tim Bourne, the film's producer.

Bourne said the project should result in some $14 million in direct spending in New Orleans. The film is set in Milwaukee but will be shot primarily in the New Orleans area.

"Not one shred of this movie belongs in the South, let alone New Orleans," Bourne said recently. "My movie has no reason to be here, except for the incentive."

The incentive program, which the Legislature adopted in spring 2002, offers state income tax credits of up to 15 percent to investors in movies made in Louisiana, a credit of up to 20 percent of payroll expenses and a sales tax exemption for productions costing more than $250,000.

Internet shorts to probe mysteries of TV's 'Smallville'

LOS ANGELES (AP) – In a new series of short Internet films, a teenage investigative reporter is probing the mysterious happenings in "Smallville," hometown of pre-Superman farm boy Clark Kent and a myriad of peculiar villains.

The documentary-style shorts, starring the WB drama's Allison Mack as her high-school journalist character, Chloe, delve into the strange green meteorites responsible for many of the program's calamities and crimes.

"A lot of times on 'Smallville' people die and we just move on to the next episode and don't go in depth into the reason why they died, what's behind it," said Mack, whose perky character has an unrequited crush on Kent, played by Tom Welling.

"Basically, Chloe's going in to answer all the unanswered questions and tie up loose ends," Mack said recently. "We're taking story lines from previous episodes and just going more in depth."

AOL's "The Chloe Chronicles" series debuts Tuesday (10 p.m. EDT), immediately following the broadcast of "Smallville" and will continue for four more weeks. Each segment is less than 3 minutes long.

The shorts can only be seen on AOL Television at AOL Keyword: Smallville.

er. Both versions of the unreleased "Heat" video are poorly made and unfocused, which almost takes away from the hotness of the track.

The real highlights on "The New Breed" are the live performances, both at the Detroit Show and the AOL Sessions, as many will come to find firsthand on Sunday. As a performer, 50 is one of a handful of rappers who can successfully translate his studio magic to his stage show. Backed by Tony Yayo and Lloyd Banks of his G-Unit crew, 50 performs with amazing intensity and liveliness. Not even the surprise appearance of Detroit's local hero, Eminem, in the middle of the Detroit Show performance is enough to take the spotlight off of him for more than a moment. The only downfall to these performances is that they only last about 40 minutes and leave the viewer wanting more.

The bonus CD is strong, especially the last track "In Da Hood," which only serves as further proof that its hard to find a bad 50 Cent song. Two of the songs are G-Unit collaborations and they definitely showcase the lyrical talents of Banks and Yayo. The disc comes across as a fitting and promising prelude to the eventual G-Unit album.

Though the overall content of "The New Breed" is sub par, die-hard 50 fans will find something to enjoy. If you are looking for more of 50 Cent's work before he rolls into town this weekend, I recommend picking up the "Guess Who's Back."

This is a solid, no-nonsense compilation of his earlier work, including freestyles and rarities from his pre-Shady days. "Get Rich or Die Tryin'," and "Guess Who's Back" are the best chronicles of 50's talent and potential.

Couples regroups

Aging star looks to regain his stroke

By DOUG FERGUSON
Associated Press

Fred Couples rediscovered his place in golf.

The search started almost three months ago on the practice range at Pebble Beach, when he beat balls for six hours with Butch Harmon at his side.

"He's never done that in his life," Harmon said.

It ended late Sunday afternoon at the Houston Open when Couples was flawless over the final five holes and wound up with a four-stroke victory, his first on the PGA Tour in five years and 87 tournaments.

He raised his putter in triumph. He smiled to an adoring legion of fans. He slapped hands with Mark Calcavecchia as if they had just won the Shark Shootout.

What followed made it clear there was nothing silly about this victory.

The happy-go-lucky Couples was so overwhelmed that he broke down on national TV, tugged the visor over his eyes and walked away.

"I haven't won in five years. I haven't played really well in five years," Couples said. "I worked hard on my game, and it meshed. I have a lot of people to thank. That's what was going through my mind. Didn't get it out very well."

The message was never more clear.

Players in his age bracket (43) with far less ability have been winning their share of tournaments over the last five years.

Hal Sutton, who turned 45 on Monday, has won six times since 1998, including a Tour Championship and an 18-hole duel with Tiger Woods at The Players Championship.

Scott Hoch, 47, has won three times in the last three years. Mark O'Meara was 41 when he won two major championships, Bernard Langer, 45, qualified for his 10th Ryder Cup team and didn't lose a match at The Belfry.

"I have been practicing," Couples said. "I never really thought I'd win this quickly, but I thought I could win again if I practiced and played."

Couples was looking for the easy way out last year when he got behind a failed proposal to start a Major Champions Tour – eight events on classic courses for players between the ages of 37 and 55 who had won a major.

"If I play like I did last year and keep deteriorating, and the PGA Tour is tough," Couples said at the time, "There's nowhere for me to play golf."

The solution wasn't a gimmick tour with guaranteed money.

The secret has always been in the dirt.

"He hadn't worked hard," Harmon said. "He had been fooling himself."

A desperate Couples hooked up with Harmon during the Pebble Beach National Pro-Am. Couples told him how terrible he had been swinging, and Harmon didn't believe it until they got to the practice range the next day.

Couples hit a few 9-irons.

"It's worse than you said," Harmon told him.

Harmon's time already is cut thin. He still works occasionally with Woods, and his clientele includes Calcavecchia, Darren Clarke, Adam Scott, Justin Leonard, Stewart Cink, Jose Maria Olazabal and Ben Crane.

His deal with Couples: You put in the time, I'll make the time.

Not only did they spend six hours on the range, Couples went to Carlsbad, Calif., during the Match Play Championship – even though he wasn't playing – and worked with Harmon at the TaylorMade test center.

"That's when I knew he was serious," Harmon said. "He's worked his tail off ever since."

They essentially shortened his swing, taking under pressure off Couples' already sensitive back.

"What I had him visualize was to feel like he was coming over the top to hit a pull hook," Harmon said. "He had to get his arms in front of his body coming down."

His victory in Houston moved him to No. 29 in the world ranking, which assures him of returning to the U.S. Open and likely will get him into the World Golf Championships for the first time in three years.

"A lot of people think Freddie doesn't care," Harmon said. "I think he showed how much it meant to him. Very seldom do you see him that emotional."

As one of golf's most renowned swing gurus, Harmon gets his share of perks.

He has written several books and made just as many videos. He has endorsement deals with Titleist and Buick, a TV gig with Sky Sport in Britain. He operates golf schools in Las Vegas and the Bahamas.

What happened Sunday ranks among his greatest rewards.

Harmon already was emotionally spent from a funeral service for his mother-in-law over the weekend. He got home and turned on the TV in time to watch the final three holes of the Houston Open, and the brief interview that followed.

Couples started to thank his wife, Thais, and Harmon when his voice cracked and his lips quivered, and before long, tears were flowing from Houston to Las Vegas.

"I had tears in my eyes when he holed out," Harmon said. "Because I know how hard Freddie has worked."

The answer was there all along.

Dollar tickets a hit for Blue Jays

TORONTO (AP) - The Blue Jays sold out Tuesday night's game against the Texas Rangers after offering $1 tickets in an effort to show Toronto remains vibrant despite the threat of SARS.

The sellout was announced before the World Health Organization lifted its warning against nonessential travel to Toronto.

The WHO has said it was satisfied with local measures to stop the spread of severe acute respiratory syndrome.

The Blue Jays' parent company, Rogers Communications Inc., said it wants to "bring the community together at SkyDome ... to show its support for the city of Toronto."

The tickets for the game sold for $1 Canadian, which is worth 69 cents in U.S. currency.

Fans bought tickets at a rate of about 2,000 an hour and SkyDome was sold out late Monday night.

About 34,000 tickets were bought for the reduced price. The 16,000 fans who paid full price will be able to buy a $1 ticket for a later game on the Blue Jays' schedule.

With the average ticket to a Blue Jays regular season home game about $14 in American dollars, the move is costing Rogers roughly $484,000.

The U.S. ambassador to Canada, former Massachusetts Gov. Paul Cellucci, will throw out the ceremonial first pitch Tuesday.

While some visiting players have been nervous about traveling to Toronto, fans haven't been reluctant.

For their three-game series against Kansas City, the Blue Jays drew 16,417 spectators Friday, 17,197 on Saturday and 17,059 on Sunday, their second-, third- and fourth-biggest crowds this season.

Blue Jays president Paul Godfrey estimated SARS already has cost the club the sale of 10,000 tickets and also added that inquiries for group sales have dropped substantially due to the threat of the disease in the city.

It's his time of year

Legendary trainer Baffert tries to focus on Derby despite unfortunate circumstances

By RICHARD ROSENBLATT
Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (AP) - As much as he tries, Bob Baffert is having a tough time generating his usual enthusiasm for the Kentucky Derby.

Yes, this is the same happy-go-lucky guy with three Derby victories in the past six years; the same trainer who has visions of yet another win Saturday with Indian Express or Kafwain.

But standing outside his barn Monday morning, Baffert was talking about a few pals he'll miss Derby week – the late Saudi Prince Ahmed bin Salman, injured Hall of Fame jockey Laffit Pincay Jr., and injured 2-year-old champion Vindication.

"It's sad in a way," said Baffert, his wife, Jill, by his side. "The prince would have been here, and we'd be having a great time ... And Laffit would be here riding Indian Express. But you just have to go with what you've got."

The prince operated The Thoroughbred Corp., which owned Baffert's 2002 Derby winner War Emblem and owns Kafwain. Prince Ahmed died of a heart attack last summer at age 45.

Pincay would have been aboard Indian Express – a colt he encouraged Baffert to buy – but the 56-year-old rider is in a California hospital after breaking his neck in a spill at Santa Anita on March 1.

And Vindication, Baffert's star Derby prospect, was knocked off the trail in February with a strained ligament in his left front leg. "It's just depressing to lose such an exciting horse," he said.

Baffert is likely to cheer up as post time nears. He usually does. Plus, he's got other things to think about as his barn has been a beehive of activity the past few days.

Domestic Dispute was sold Saturday, and the colt Baffert pulled out of Derby contention earlier this month will now run in the race for trainer Paddy Gallagher.

Baffert still won't rule Senor Swinger out of the Derby. The colt he began training last month is likely to run in a grass race Friday, but Baffert says that could change by Wednesday's Derby post position draw.

The trainer also unveiled his Derby horse for 2004 – a tall, angular unnamed colt by Menifee. Around the barn, he's known as Fifty Short – as in the purchase price was $50,000 short of $1 million.

Baffert may not talk up his 3-year-olds this week, but that doesn't mean Indian Express or Kafwain can't win. Last year, Baffert poohpoohed War Emblem's chances but had the last laugh when the nearly black colt wired the field to win by four lengths at odds of 20-1.

Trainer Bobby Frankel holds the strongest Derby hand with expected favorite Empire Maker and second choice Peace Rules, but the best horse doesn't always win the 1 1/4-mile cavalry charge. In fact, the Derby favorite has only one victory – Fusaichi Pegasus in 2000 – since Spectacular Bid won in 1979.

Baffert's best chance appears to be Kafwain, a tough hombre who was third in the Santa Anita Derby on April 5 but finished either first or second in his previous seven races. Kafwain got sick and lost training time after the Santa Anita Derby, but the dark bay colt galloped Monday and is set for his final breeze Tuesday.

"No one ever talks about him, and I never brag on him," said Baffert. "He's just hard knocking, he's got a huge heart and he'll be there at the end. A mile-and-a-quarter probably isn't his cup of tea, but he's been right there every time."

Kafwain has four wins in 11 starts and earnings of $715,848. He will be ridden by Pat Valenzuela, who returns to the Derby for the first time in 10 years. Valenzuela, plagued by drug and alcohol problems for years, replaced Victor Espinoza on Kafwain for the Santa Anita Derby.

"I wanted to do something different to try to win," said Baffert. Espinoza was aboard War Emblem, but Baffert was unhappy with the jockey's ride aboard Kafwain in the Louisiana Derby. Says Valenzuela: "I think we'll win the Derby, no doubt in my mind."

Indian Express, a son of the Baffert-trained Indian Charlie, is a big question mark. The Utah-bred who won his first two races in Panama, was purchased for $100,000 by Baffert's longtime friend Phil Chess on Pincay's recommendation.

"Laffit is from Panama, and he had a friend there who wanted to sell the horse," Baffert said. "He told me it was a son of Indian Charlie. They e-mailed me pictures and video and I thought I'd take a shot."

Indian Express, with Tyler Baze aboard, finished fourth in 6 1/2-furlong race at Santa Anita in March, then finished a game second by a head to Buddy Gil in the Santa Anita Derby on April 5.

"He was pretty goofy when he got here. He wouldn't let anyone touch his head or his ears. But he's not the same horse he was 90 days ago. He's really changed – and for the better."

UMass' Dixon named A-10 Coach of the Year

Women's Tennis All-Conference Team.

Dixon received the coaching honor after leading the fourth-seeded Minutewomen to the championship of the Atlantic 10 Tournament on April 19. For the year, UMass posted a 9-13 overall record, going 3-1 against conference opponents before advancing to the championship round of the A-10 tournament.

"I wouldn't have been voted Coach of the Year if the team didn't perform well," said Dixon. "One of the nicest rewards I've received is Coach of the Year. It's not just about me, it's a reflection on the team, and I of course share this with [assistant coach] Celeste [Frey]."

This is the third time Dixon has received the conference's Coach of the Year honors. She previously won the award in 1998 and 2001.

DIXON NAMED A-10 COACH OF THE YEAR

Head coaches of the University of [illegible] women's tennis team received Atlantic 10 honors on Monday. Head Coach Judy Dixon was named the A-10 Coach of the Year while junior Idra Hagerman, Kalina Kona Hawaiti and freshmen Stephanie Price [illegible] were selected to the Atlantic 10

Former Minuteman punter David Sanger will be taking his talents to the NFL next year. The Crystal Beach, FL native signed a three year contract with the Carolina Panthers.

End of the road for duo?

Stockton, Malone may be done in Utah

By Doug Alden
Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) – Jazz fans may have seen their last Stockton-to-Malone play in Utah.

Sacramento's 99-82 win over Utah on Monday night put the Kings within a game of clinching the first-round playoff series, and possibly ending the Jazz careers of John Stockton and Karl Malone.

"It's not a good time to talk about that right now because we have another game to play," Malone said.

If it goes anything like Monday, it will be only one game. Peja Stojakovic scored 15 of his 27 points in the third quarter and Chris Webber had 26 points and 11 rebounds as the Kings turned a four-point halftime deficit into a blowout.

Sacramento leads the series 3-1, and can clinch it at home Wednesday night in Game 5.

The Kings could be last team to beat Stockton and Malone with the Jazz if the 41-year-old Stockton retires after a 19-year career with Utah and Malone leaves as a free agent. Both Stockton and Malone will decide their futures when the season ends, which will be soon if the Jazz can't pull an upset in Sacramento.

"We'd love to play what may be the last game against Stockton and Malone as a tandem. We would love to be a part of that," Webber said. "That's something you'd love to tell your kids about."

In the other playoff game Monday night, Philadelphia beat New Orleans 96-87 to take a 3-1 series lead.

On Tuesday night, Milwaukee is at New Jersey, with the series tied 2-2; Phoenix is at San Antonio, also tied 2-2; Boston is at Indiana, with the Celtics leading 3-1; and the Los Angeles Lakers are at Minnesota, with it tied 2-2.

Malone led the Jazz with 24 points and Stockton had 12 points and seven assists. Neither wanted to talk much about the future after the game.

"You can say that any time you go out on the floor. That could be the last one," Stockton said. "You've got to play it like it's your last one. As for the rest, I guess we'll all decide that at the end, but we're sure not putting any thought into it until then."

Stockton left the game quietly during a timeout. Malone got a standing ovation from what was left of the sellout crowd of 19,911 when he was pulled with 2:25 left.

"We've played a long time together," Malone said. "Hopefully the fans have appreciated what we've tried to do for this organization and for them."

Two days after a gritty win got them back into the series, the older and slower Jazz couldn't keep up with the Kings in the second half. The Jazz are on the verge of getting knocked out of the playoffs by the Kings for the second straight year.

Even after a second one-sided win in the series, Sacramento coach Rick Adelman scoffed at suggestions it was over.

"They have beat us this year and we can't relax. You have to play the same kind of game in Sacramento that we played in the second half tonight," Adelman said. "You have to win four games, and then it's over."

Sacramento was just 17-for-50 from the field in the first half and trailed 41-37 despite causing 14 turnovers. But the Kings started hitting shots from everywhere in the third quarter and quickly turned it into a runaway.

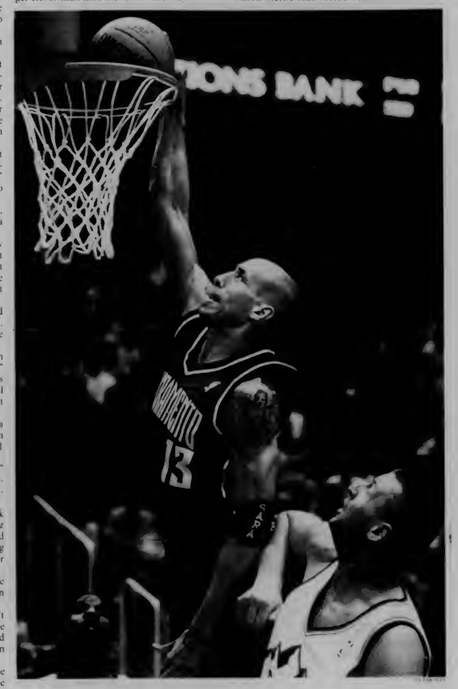
"They were giving us the ball and we didn't score off it, so in the third quarter we tried to pick it up a bit," said Sacramento's Mike Bibby, who scored nine of his 11 points in the second half. "Thirty-seven points at halftime. That's not us."

Stojakovic hit his second straight 3-pointer to tie the game at 47, then put back his own offensive rebound to give the Kings their first lead since late in the first quarter. The Jazz struggled with just three field goals in the first 7 1/2 minutes of the third quarter as the Kings began to pull away.

The Jazz got to 59-57 on two free throws by Malone with 3:10 left in the third period, then the Kings went on a 14-2 run to close the quarter. Sacramento was 13-for-23 from the floor in the period, getting a few easy layups off fastbreaks and three 3-pointers from Stojakovic. The Kings didn't allow the Jazz to get closer than nine the rest of the way.

Jim Jackson scored 10 for the Kings.

Matt Harpring scored 18 points and Andrei Kirilenko finished with 15 for the Jazz. Greg Ostertag had 14 rebounds for Utah, which has been knocked out of the playoffs in the first round the last two seasons.



76ers 96, Hornets 87

At Philadelphia, Allen Iverson's 22 points were his lowest total in the series, but five other 76ers scored in double figures in a victory over New Orleans.

Game 5 is in Philadelphia on Wednesday night, with the 76ers leading the series 3-1.

The balanced scoring and rebounding effort by the 76ers spoiled a 34-point performance by Baron Davis, who received too little help from the rest of the team to pull the Hornets even in the series.

Eric Snow had 17 points and 12 assists for Philadelphia, while Keith Van Horn scored 13 points. Kenny Thomas, Derrick Coleman and Aaron McKie each scored 11.

Sacramento Kings guard Doug Christie (13) dunks over Utah Jazz center Greg Ostertag, right, during the first quarter of their Western Conference first-round series game on Monday.

A Bay State battle

UMass set to meet BC

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

With the end of the season near, the intensity is raising and so are the stakes for the Massachusetts softball team.

The Maroon and White has had a successful season and is guaranteed a NCAA berth, but their next opponent Boston College is still fighting for a spot. With both an at-state matchup and stakes riding high, this is a crucial game.

In their first meeting this season, the Minutewomen (28-12, 9-1 Atlantic 10) were backed by one of Kaila Holtz's many dominant performances on the hill. The Eagles were shutout by the senior ace as the Minutewomen came away with a 2-0 victory. UMass coach Elaine Sortino feels the last game will add fuel to today's game.

"I think [Boston College] is going to come after us," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "We have a really tough game ahead of us tomorrow since they are going for a spot in the Big East. We look at our game and we know it's crucial[ly important].

"We are a ranked team in a different region than they are, so it's crucial for them [to win], because they are looking at a NCAA breath and coming after and getting a win over UMass is big thing at this point," Sortino explained. "So, this is a significant game for them and for us."

"A win over another Big East school would help us with seeding for NCAA tournament," Sortino replied. "Potentially, we can wrap up the number one spot [for the A-10 tourney] and clinch the regular season title. It's a nice thing to dominate the Big East as a member of the Atlantic 10."

The two weapons on BC's roster that could cause some problems for UMass are a pair of seniors, pitcher Kim Ryan and shortstop Cara Blumfield.

Ryan is having the best season in her fourth campaign as an Eagle starter. She has been picked as Big East Pitcher of the Week for the last three weeks, including last week's impressive shutout over BU. In a complete game, she struck out 13 Terriers en route to striking out 28 in 14 innings over the course of last week. She posts an impressive stat line with a record of 13-5, 2.06 Earn Run Average and 178 strikeouts.

Blumfield was held to one hit by Holtz in the first game against the Minutewomen. The Beast from the Big East has been a terror with her bat over four years. Last season, Blumfield became the first Eagles' All-American, a second team choice by Louisville Slugger/NFCA, and her batting average was among top ten in NCAA, finishing at a .445 clip. This season hasn't been as spectacular, but still solid with a .319 BA, eight homers, 24 runs batted in and 25 runs.

With all that is at stake in terms of postseason ramifications, the rivalry between the two schools can't be overshadowed. There is an intense rivalry between Atlantic 10 and Big East, especially if both teams are within the same state. It's a battle for turf, respect, and bragging rights.

"There is a lot of ego involved. Nobody wants to lose and it's pretty much the same on both sides. Plus, [there is] the rivalry within the state and being such close opponents, and quite frankly having respect for their program. They have always been a quality program and I think they feel the same about us."

JAMES N. HASHEM/COLLEGIAN

Aisha Frank and the Minutewomen will look to continue their season-long success this afternoon when they take on intrastate rival Boston College.

Caught between eras of greatness

Jim Pignatiello

There have been some great athletic accomplishments in the three years I have covered UMass sports teams for The Daily Collegian. The men's lacrosse team has established itself as one of the best programs in the nation. The softball team has dominated the Atlantic 10 and been in and out of the top 25 – an amazing accomplishment for a team in New England. Men's soccer enjoyed four seasons of Jeff Deren and women's basketball enjoyed Jen Butler.

But overall, I've always felt that I was at UMass during the wrong four years. After all, I got here when Bruiser Flint and the men's basketball team were on their way down, the hockey team was rebuilding and the football team was too young.

It's too bad that so many exciting and interesting things are going to happen after I graduate in May. Here's a list of the top nine things I wish I could cover for The Collegian:

No. 9) Baseball's Young Pitching Staff

Mike Crane, Matt Torra, Scott Ratliff, John Toffey and a handful of others – all freshmen or sophomores – will make UMass one of the best teams in the A-10 over the next few years.

No. 8) Women's Soccer

Erin Lilly, Michelle Luttati and Kelly Nigh have been dramatically improving over the last three years and will all have great seasons. The talented youth coach Jim Rudy has blended with these leaders should certainly pay off next year.

No. 7) Kelli Arnold

Softball coach Elaine Sortino always seems to have at least one or two dominant pitchers on her roster. Three years ago, it was Carrie Jeffries and Jen Hadley. Last year it was Hadley and Kaila Holtz. This year it is Holtz and Arnold. While Jeffries, Hadley and Holtz are all excellent, Arnold, who is just a sophomore, may eventually be lumped in with some of the greatest pitchers in school history.

No. 6) Katie Nelson

I covered the young point guard from day one, interviewing her after the 3-point shooting clinic she put on in her first exhibition game as a Minutewomen. Having averaged 39 minutes per game her freshman year, Nelson improved this year before being sidelined with a knee injury. If she can return healthy, Nelson should be able to give coach Marnie Dacko two very solid seasons and become one of the cornerstones for what will be a tough rebuilding process.

No. 5) Men's Lacrosse

The Minutemen could go all the way this year and I would miss it. The final four is over Memorial Day weekend, which also happens to be graduation weekend – something I'm not allowed to miss. They are currently ranked No. 3 in the nation. Coach Greg Cannella's squad hasn't peaked yet, though, as he has been bringing in strong recruits year after year. Cannella's bunch will be in the hunt every year. He is just starting to scratch the surface.

No. 4) Gray Wolves

I have been unable to speak on this process with anyone – public or private – because of some extenuating circumstances, but I have to admit that I am very interested in what the Athletic Department decides to do with this matter. Whatever the University decides, whether it is to change the mascot as a whole or simply touch up the Minuteman, it will certainly be a significant change. Either way, we should only have to wait a month or so for this issue to be resolved. Hopefully, I've been able to lend some important insight to what must be a tough decision for Athletic Director Ian McCaw and Co.

No. 3) Next year's football team

The football team had to suffer through a few disappointing seasons to get to this point, but it is paying off. Though the Minutemen would have made a run at the I-AA National Championship if quarterback Jeff Krohn didn't miss two games – both losses – due to injury. The team was 8-4 overall, 8-2 in games Krohn started. No. 7 will be back under center in 2003 for his senior year and will have reigning A-10 Rookie of the Year R.J. Cobbs in the backfield. Combined with what promises to be one of the best defenses in I-AA next season and the Minutemen have to be a good preseason pick to win it all.

No. 2) Lappas' tough road

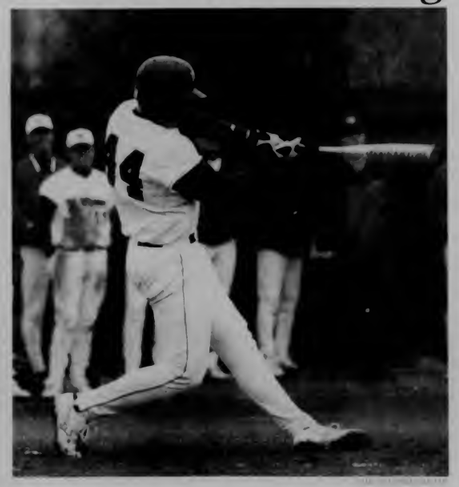
What a job. You have to overhaul an entire basketball program that enjoyed a few years of glory seven years ago. You have to get certain type of players – completely opposite from most of those remaining – in order to run the systems you have proven successful time and again. And you have to do it while the masses compare your growing pains to the glory days, which have been erased due to cheating.

Lappas has been getting bad news, it seems, ever since a very tough 11-18 season. Last year's prize recruit, Mike Lasme, transferred after one year at UMass. The recruit signed to replace him this year, Maurice Maxwell, saw the Providence Journal's pile of B.S. a few weeks ago – stating that Lappas would be bought out (completely false) – and decided to think about his other options. And assistant coach Chris Walker, who is a fabulous recruiter, decided to leave for opportunities in the private business sector. Hopefully, this is the end of the fallout. Maxwell will come to his senses and the men's basketball team will start moving in the right direction.

No matter what, this team has a strong nucleus of young players. Next year's probable starting five: Anthony Anderson, Art Bowers, Jeff Viggiano, Stephen Briggs and Gabe Lee – with Rashaun Freeman pushing to crack the line-up – should be the best lineup, in terms of pure basketball talent, this program has had in quite a long time. Hopefully, Lappas and Co. can hold this thing together – and keep the fans at bay – long enough to bring the program back into the national spotlight.

No. 1) Cahoon-a-ville

I may actually have to come back for this one, even if it has to be as an alum in the stands. You aren't going to believe what is in store for the fans and the UMass hockey team next year. I was fortunate enough to attend a focus group with Coach Cahoon and he is working hard to make the games more enjoyable for the fans and livelier in support of the team. I'm not going to spoil any of the details, but the UMass hockey games are going to be a pre-party must on weekends and the title to this section will mean more than you could ever imagine.



Never mind that Greg Mauldin, Gabe Winer, Thomas Pock, Marvin Degon and Stephen Werner will all be a year older and wiser, coming off the most impressive postseason run in program history. The Minutemen took this area by storm at the end of the season and will only get better and better.

Man, what bad timing I've had.

Minutemen look to get back on track

UVM will pose tough non-league challenge

First baseman Jeff Altieri will look to continue to pace the Minuteman offense when the Maroon and White meet Vermont this afternoon.

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Coming off of a tough week that saw it post a 1-4 record and fall behind Rhode Island and into second place in the Atlantic 10 East Division, the Massachusetts baseball team will look to a non-league remedy in the form of the University of Vermont to cure its ills.

The Catamounts (21-8 6-2 America East) will pose a tough challenge to coach Mike Stone's club, however, as they will enter play as winners of 16 of their last 20 contests, which included a season-high 11 game winning streak.

They are led by junior first baseman Barry Chamberland, who has started all 29 games and leads the team in homeruns with eight, runs batted in with 25 and batting average at .378. Shortstop Bobby Tewksbury is also putting together a solid campaign for UVM. The sophomore is currently second on the team in average at .351 and RBI with 18.

For the Minutemen (15-15 9-6 Atlantic 10), designated hitter Chris Morgan continues to swing a hot bat. The senior has at least one hit in each of the last five games, going three for eight with a double during UMass' two games in the Beanpot Baseball Classic, and four for 11 with two RBI during the three-game series at Temple.

For the season, he leads the team with a .360 batting average, four home runs and 12 doubles, while ranking second on the squad with 21 RBI.

Stone will also have to be careful with his young pitching staff, as today's game is the first in a stretch that will see the Minutemen play eight games against five different teams in the next week.

After using junior Eric Chown and freshman Matt Torra against Temple, Stone will likely turn to the sophomore duo of Mike Crane, who is considered by many to be the staff's ace, and Anthony Gallo, in the next few games to give the aforementioned trio time to rest before this weekend's A-10 series with St. Bonaventure.

An area of concern that could be arising for Stone, however, is his closer. Sophomore southpaw Scott Ratliff, who began the season by posting a 1.69 earned run average with five saves and 17 strikeouts in 16 innings, has seen his fortunes go south of late.

No. 17 surrendered four runs on four hits in a 1/3 of an inning of work in taking the loss in game one of the Beanpot, and followed that up by allowing two hits and a run in 2/3 of an inning of work in game two of the doubleheader with Temple on Sunday, with his ERA ballooning to 4.24.

This afternoon's game will take place at Earl Lorden Field, with first pitch scheduled for 3 p.m.

Former UMass punter Sanger signs three-year deal with Carolina Panthers

Former University of Massachusetts punter David Sanger has signed a three-year free agent contract with the Carolina Panthers of the National Football League, it was announced today.

Sanger was named All-New England and first team All-Atlantic 10 following the 2002 season. He punted 68 times on the season for 2,750 yards, with his average of 40.4 yards per punt ranking as the fourth-best single-season mark in school history. Sanger also placed 24 punts inside the opponent's 20-yard line, and helped UMass to a net punting average of 35.5 yards per kick. In addition, Sanger recorded a season-best 68 yard punt at Richmond on Oct. 5, the 10th longest punt in school history.

Following the 2001 season, Sanger was named first team All-Atlantic 10 and a second team All-American by Don Hansen's National Weekly Football Gazette. For his career, Sanger punted 236 times for 9,574 yards and a 40.6 yard average with 77 kicks inside the opponent's 20-yard line. He set a new school record for highest career punting average, while ranking second all-time in career punts and career punting yards.

LAPPAS ADDS ANOTHER RECRUIT

University of Massachusetts basketball coach Steve Lappas announced tonight that Lawrence Carrier, a 6-8, 225-pound forward from Salisbury (Conn.) School, has signed a National Letter of Intent to play for the Minutemen next season.

"We are thrilled to have Lawrence join our program," Lappas said. "He's a very talented player, who can play more than one position for us. Lawrence has a strong all-around game, but he is an exceptional three-point shooter. He's going to be a great addition to our program."

Carrier averaged 20.3 points and 9.3 rebounds for Coach Chris Hinchey's team while recording a team-high 74 steals. Despite missing several games over the course of his career due to injury, he ranks as Salisbury's all-time scoring leader with 1,355 points. Carrier selected UMass over Colorado, Southern California, Miami, Arizona State, Oregon State, Texas and Rutgers.

"There were so many pluses, it was a no-brainer [for Lawrence to sign with Massachusetts]," Hinchey said. "We were impressed in the recruiting process with how well Steve (Lappas) and UMass work with kids like Lawrence."

A native of San Bernadino, Calif., Carrier played his AAU basketball for Coach Albert Perry's Inland1 squad.

He is the second player to sign with the Minutemen for next season, and the first to do so in the spring signing period, which ends next month.

Last fall, Lappas and his staff signed consensus Top 100 player Artie Bowers of Wilmington, Del.

ROBUSTELLI NAMED ATLANTIC 10 PLAYER OF THE WEEK

University of Massachusetts senior shortstop Emily Robustelli was named the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week the league office announced this afternoon. Robustelli batted .636 (7-11) last week. She also compiled a .909 slugging percentage. In a 6-2 win over UConn last Wednesday, she went 2-4 with two RBI.

Ways and Means presents budget to SGA senators

JAMES N. HASHEM/COLLEGIAN

Chair of Finance Patrick Higgins supported a proposal sending students to a diversity conference in San Francisco this summer.

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The final S-1 Student Activities Trust Fund budget was presented to the Student Government Association Senate last night with a 30 percent cut in funding.

Discussion surrounding the budget followed the presentation, given by the Ways and Means committee chair Brian Thompson. Many questions were raised, especially on a proposed payroll cut that SGA members would take themselves.

The proposed budget would see the Executive Cabinet taking most of the cuts. Members of the SGA appealed the Ways and Means committee's initial cuts. However, they were unsuccessful.

Thompson said that the Ways and Means Committee was disheartened at members of the SGA Executive Cabinet and that a budget was not received from the SGA due to a miscommunication between Secretary of Finance Katy Donaghey and his committee.

"The SGA never turned in a budget, and that's the Secretary of Finances job... I made the budget, so it was either that or nothing," Thompson said. "If they're in it for the money then there in it for the wrong reasons."

Thompson told the Senate that they tried to accommodate every group that came to the Ways and Means Committee.

Cuts were also made to other agencies and Registered Student Organizations on campus as well. The Programming Board, Spring Concert Fund and Resource Room are also among those facing cuts in this year's budget.

Carr responded to the final budget presentation by saying that he supports the Ways and Means committee, but is disappointed in the final budget.

Physical Education may be eliminated

Department taking wait and see approach

Dean Andrew Effrat

By David Grant
Collegian Staff

As the University of Massachusetts braces for budget cuts again, the fate of the General Physical Education (GPE) program is being called into question by students and instructors in the classes.

According to Andrew Effrat, the Dean for the School of Education, the program may be cut. All gym classes, with about 1,500 students registered per semester, would be eliminated.

Effrat said the impact from the proposed 20 percent cut to higher education is of great concern to both GPE and the entire education department.

The cost to run GPE is $100,000 per year, an amount seemingly small in the wake of the proposed 20 percent budget cut.

"I'm still digesting the enormity of the possible cuts," said Effrat. "GPE would be cut if I cannot figure out a way to save all or some of the program, and if I cannot make any more cuts without harming other programs that are essential to our teaching and research responsibilities."

Effrat said the department is taking a "wait and see" approach to the situation. As of today, GPE classes for the fall are not available on SPIRE, but the website states on its home page that the classes can be added during the add/drop period this fall. Fifteen hundred students are registered this semester for 82 classes offered, including golf, yoga, bowling, basketball, scuba diving, ice skating and aerobics.

The classes are not listed on SPIRE because the University's confirmed enrollment policy prohibits listing classes on SPIRE that are not guaranteed, said Effrat.

Amanda Brown, a junior nursing major and four-time instructor, said she is concerned that a decision has all but already been made, since the interviewing and assigning of instructors to fall classes is not happening.

She said the administration has done a poor job of communicating with students.

"The infuriating part about this is that no one has told the students of this very likely possibility," said Brown.

She said it's impossible for students to act if they are not informed.

Iris Schneider, coordinator for GPE, said the program's future is not known at this time.

"The School of Education and the University are currently faced with a severely-reduced budget and must make decisions that will impact many people and programs," said Schneider.

Now, some students are taking steps by preparing a campaign to save (GPE) from possibly being terminated, effective this coming fall.

Brown is holding a meeting tonight in the Campus Center basement near the TVs at 6:00 p.m. for those wishing to join the Fight to save GPE. This meeting, along with petitions, letters to Chancellor John Lombardi and other ideas, is just the beginning of what could be a long and tenuous battle.

The first meeting is being held with the intent of organizing a group with a collective voice.

"I know many people are concerned about what may happen, and this will provide a time and a place for them to express their concerns and hopefully share their ideas," said Brown.

Instructors have also obtained hundreds of signatures on petitions from students taking GPE classes, and are writing letters to Chancellor Lombardi and government officials, hoping to make an impact on the budget.

Brown, who teaches figure skating, said she is formally inviting key decision makers to attend a show put on by her class on May 15, to show them the end result of a semester-

Amber Alert bill signed by Bush

By Deb Riechmann
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – News of missing children will speed to the public over radio, TV and electronic highway signs in more states under the Amber Alert legislation, signed yesterday by President Bush.

Already operating in 41 states, such networks quickly distribute information about kidnapped children and their abductors.

"It is important to expand the Amber Alert systems so police and sheriff departments gain thousands or even millions of allies in the search for missing children," Bush said at a bill signing ceremony in the White House Rose Garden.

"Every person who would think of abducting a child can know that a wide net will be cast," he said. "They may be found by a police cruiser or by the car right next to them on a highway. These criminals can know that any driver they pass could be the one that spots them and brings them to justice."

Watching Bush sign the measure, which also includes stiffer federal penalties for crimes against children and gives prosecutors new tools to fight child pornography, was a tearful experience for the mother of the bill's namesake, 9-year-old Amber Hagerman who was kidnapped in 1996 and never came home.

It was a happier day for 15-year-old Elizabeth Smart, a teen from Salt Lake City who was making her first public appearance since being found in March, nine months after she was kidnapped at knifepoint from her bedroom. Smart smiled shyly and offered no words.

Her parents, Ed and Louis Smart, fought hard for the legislation, which provides matching grants to states and communities for equipment and training to expand alert systems across America.

Tears rolled down the face of Amber's mother, Donna Norris, as Bush spoke of signing the legislation in memory of her daughter.

"It's bittersweet," said Ms. Norris, who wore a button with the face of her daughter, who was abducted in Arlington, Texas, and later was found murdered. "It's a chance to save other children's lives and I'm proud of it."

After the ceremony, Ms. Norris hugged Elizabeth Smart, who stood between her parents, her blond hair pulled back with a white bow. Two people have been charged in her kidnapping.

At the urging of Republicans in Congress, the new law strengthens federal criminal penalties for child pornographers, sexual abusers and kidnappers.

Democrats argued that restricting federal judges' ability to reduce sentences for such crimes against children should have been more thoroughly debated, but the bill passed with broad bipartisan support, 400-25 in the House and 98-0 in the Senate.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the legislation included needed provisions to protect children. But he protested the inclusion of the new sentencing guidelines.

These provisions may do serious harm to the basic structure of the sentencing guideline system and ... seriously impair the ability of courts to impose just and responsible sentences," he said.

Other provisions would prohibit the solicitation of anything represented to be child pornography, make it easier to prosecute sex tour operators and people who travel overseas for sex with minors, allow federal judges to order supervision of released sex offenders for the rest of their lives, make it illegal to attempt to take or keep a child outside the United States to avoid custody battles, and require convicted child pornographers to register in the National Sex Offender Registry.

It also allows for background checks for people who work with children and makes "virtual" child pornography – a practice pedophiles used on the Internet – illegal.

'Take Back the Night' rallies against violence

By Amy O'Neill
Collegian Staff

From the tunnel in Southwest to the buildings in Central, marchers at last night's "Take Back the Night" event made sure their message was clear: "We will not be victims anymore."

"[Tonight is not about] associating with victims," said Cara Bedick, one of the organizers of the two-day event and a member of VOX, the pro-choice student organization committed to political activism, outreach and education. "Tonight is about surviving and making a change."

The march, which began at Haigis Mall and ended at the Campus Pond, was the first of its kind at the University of Massachusetts in five years.

"[We organized this event] because there hadn't been an event in so many years," said Julia Becker, also an organizer and VOX member.

"Tonight is about empowering women," Bedick said. "We are showing people that women are out there, taking steps against violence."

The theme at last night's march, according to Bedick, was a more uplifting one compared with Tuesday night's event, where survivors of sexual violence talked of their experiences. Bedick said the march was meant to show the survivors of sexual violence that a change will be made.

The march went through the spots considered "dangerous" on campus, such as the Fine Arts Center, fraternity row, the Central Residential Living Area and the bushes near the campus pond, where a rape took place four years ago. They chanted several different cheers, including, "We have the power, we have the right, the streets are ours, take back the night," and "However we dress, wherever we go, yes means yes, no means no."

Passersby of the march honked and some even joined in. However, the reaction was not always a positive one. People standing by and inside the buildings of Southwest yelled obscenities at the marchers. Lisa Kidwell, a UMass Police Department Detective who works as an Educator Advocate Volunteer with the Everywoman's Center, noted how this was a perfect example of what she calls the "third party co-conspirator."

Kidwell explained that in every sexual violence situation there are three people involved: the victim, the perpetrator and society. She said that society is the third party co-conspirator because it tends to blame the woman for what has happened to her instead of blaming the person who has committed the crime. She said that society puts out precautions that women should take to prevent sexual violence from happening, such as not

Bush urges Palestinians and Israelis to work toward 'path of peace'

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - Promoting his proposal for Palestinian statehood and a road map designed to carry it out, President Bush on Wednesday urged Israel and the Palestinians to "return to a path of peace."

Bush said the new Palestinian prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas, was "a man I can work with."

The president said the blueprint, developed with the European Union, United Nations and Russia, was a starting point toward achieving two states – secure Israel and a peaceful, democratic Palestine.

"We have good opportunity to advance the peace process," Bush told reporters. But he said that achieving peace requires that "all parties must assume their responsibilities."

"That includes the Arab nations which surround Israel and the potential Palestinian state. They must cut off funding for terrorists. They must create the conditions necessary for peace," Bush said.

"Israel is going to have to make some sacrifices to move the peace process forward," he added.

He acknowledged that previous efforts at resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict had generally failed. But, he said, "that doesn't mean we're not going to try. I'm an optimist."

Bush pledged to commit his own time and energy to the process.

More than 300 members of Congress promptly endorsed the president's approach to Mideast peacemaking. They urged Bush to ensure that the Palestinians comply with their obligations, including an unconditional and immediate end to violence. Israel would commit itself to Palestinian statehood and also pledge to end violence.

"It is a framework for progress toward lasting peace and security in the Middle East," Bush said earlier Wednesday in a written statement.

Bush said the success of the plan depended on "the good-faith efforts and contributions of both sides."

Abbas will be invited to the White House to meet with Bush, said the president's spokesman, Ari Fleischer, who did not say when the meeting would be held.

During a session with reporters, Bush was asked whether he had confidence in Abbas' ability to control terrorists. In the latest attack, a suicide bomber who detonated a bomb in a Tel Aviv restaurant on Wednesday, killing himself and at least three others, had links to Abbas' own Fatah movement.

Abbas "has publicly declared that he will fight terror," Bush said. "He's a man I can work with and I look forward to working with him and will work with him for the sake of peace."

Secretary of State Colin Powell spoke by telephone Wednesday with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel and Abbas – hose appointment triggered the U.S. peace effort. It is centered on establishing a Palestinian state by 2005.

Group takes back the night in march

AMELIA F. LINCOLN/COLLEGIAN

Student organization VOX hosted the second night of 'Take Back the Night' last night. The rally focused on campus safety and featured several speakers.

going out at night alone, not drinking too much or not wearing a certain outfit.

Kidwell said that instead of society saying women shouldn't do these things, they should be punishing the people who are committing the crimes against them.

"The hooting and hollering coming out of the windows, there's our society," Kidwell said in reaction to the people in Southwest.

When the march commenced outside of the Student Union, several speakers, including Kidwell, took the stage. First, student Caroline Goodman spoke of the need for sexual violence education on campus and how the budget cuts have affected it. Next, reading "Phenomenal Woman" by Maya Angelou was La Wanza Lett Brewington, Director of Community Education at the Everywoman's Center.

"This poem gives me strength when I need to check in and see where I stand," Lett Brewington said. "I believe you all to be phenomenal women."

Also speaking was Becky Lockwood, Associate Director of the Rape Crisis Services and Violence Prevention Programs at the Everywoman's Center. Lockwood told the audience that in the current Massachusetts state budget, there was no money allotted for rape crisis victims. She said it was very important for people to let their legislators know that this service is essential.

"Let them know the lives of survivors are just as important as their political careers," Lockwood said.

People who attended the event, including several men, felt that it was an important one to be involved with.

"I think it's important for men to speak on these issues [as well as women]," said UMass student Nathan Altrow.

Simonna Grant, a Smith College student who attended the event, said she was a survivor of sexual violence, and she also felt educating people about the crime was important.

"The guy in my experience didn't understand what rape was, and it's good to bring about what exactly it is and how exactly it happens," she said.

T-shirts designed by VOX member Lauren Helm were on sale for $10, with the proceeds going to next year's event.

"It has been a great thing," Bedick said. "We are hoping to continue it next year. All the funds [raised] from this event and the rest of the semester are going to the event next year."

Bedick said that support for the event was great from both the community and the groups on campus, such as the Everywoman's Center, the UMass Women's Studies Department and UMass Jewish Affairs, which provided them with the "Take Back the Night" banner that was held at the front of the march. However, Bedick said support from the UMass Administration had been lacking.

"There was not enough support from the UMass administration," Bedick said.

"As Brian said, they slashed payroll for the President, Speaker and the Chair of Ways and Means, and they didn't fund the Secretary of Diversity position," Carr said. "But they put in a lot of hard work and if that's how they feel an organization should get funded, then as President I support them."

The Executive Cabinet is complete after last night's meeting, with Donaghey approved for her second term as Secretary of Finance and Lisa Jollimore approved as Secretary of Administrative Affairs.

With over 20 motions on last night's agenda, members approved multiple SGA Constitutional by-law changes for the coming year.

Debate arose over a motion proposing money to be allocated to the Elections Committee to distribute to senators during their elections to help pay for fliers.

Speaker Dan Saunders advocated for the motion, saying that giving a small amount of money to the Senate was a positive act. The Senate approved the motion.

Debate again arose on a motion to approve $2100 to fund students to go to a Diversity conference in San Francisco this summer. Members of the SGA are scheduled to attend the conference, as well as other students who have joined together to discuss diversity issues.

The motion further proposed that those who attended the conference would return to the Senate in the fall of 2003 to make a factual presentation.

"The conference involves various schools, they come together and they talk about race, ethnicity, diversity and the issues that are present there," Chair of Finance Patrick Higgins said. "I completely feel comfortable with funding this, my committee felt completely comfortable with this, it's not a matter of paying for individuals it's a matter of getting those individuals back here in front of the Senate and bringing that information back to us."

Senator Olaf Aprons called for debate, saying that he felt it unnecessary to send individuals to San Francisco to discuss diversity and saw it as a waste of the SGA's money.

"You don't need to go to San Francisco to learn more about it [diversity]. It's $2100 to register for a conference, it's ridiculous," Aprons said. "This is pretty much paying $2100 for six people to go to San Francisco and talk about diversity and I think that's a little steep. I don't think we should be spending our money on that."

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Ways and Means Chair Brian Thompson shows weariness at last night's SGA meeting. The meeting was among the longest of the year.

Higgins said he felt this was a small price to pay in order to bring a better understanding of diversity and how other Universities handle issues surrounding it back to Amherst.

"$2100 is not that much to bring back new information about diversity to this body and to this campus," Higgins said.

The motion was passed by the Senate.

Other motions last night included the proposed change in mascot and the lack of student involvement in the decision process for it. The motion brought before the Senate requested that students be involved in any proposed changes. Due to a lack of information, the motion was tabled until the Senate's next meeting.

The budget's Senate approval and several tabled motions will be up for discussion at next week's Senate meeting. All meetings are open to the public.

Winners of mathematics contest to be honored

By DAVID GRANT
Collegian Staff

Three students who won the 18th annual Mathematics Competition on campus last month will be honored in a ceremony tonight in room 1634 of the Lederle Graduate Research Center.

Nicholas Richard, a sophomore electrical engineering major, won $1,000 in cash for his first-place finish in the competition, held April 9 at the University of Massachusetts. Edward Slavich, a freshman physics major, and Byn Choi, a computer science major, won $1,000 and $400 respectively for their second and third place finishes.

Sean Jacobs, Vitaliy Lvin, Subhash Patel and Tszicung To all were awarded $100 and received honorable mentions.

The two-hour, 10-question competition held each year is sponsored by a variety of corporations and is open to freshmen and sophomore students with an interest in solving critical mathematical problems.

"These questions are completely unlike anything you would get on a regular class exam because there's no single concepts that are being used," said Richard.

Slavich said, "Most of the questions were fiendishly hard."

Since the competition's inception in 1986, no contestant has received a perfect score.

Richard, who was on a math debate team in high school, said the competition is a fun way to be tested.

"The test seems to be made to find out how to use what you know," said Richard. "If you take a step back and truly think through what is being asked, then there's generally some clever way to approach the problem. The trick is finding that way."

One of the purposes of the competition is to offer first and second year students the opportunity to engage in an intellectually challenging, non-threatening extracurricular activity with substantial monetary rewards.

Slavich, who described himself as somewhat of a nerd, said he enjoys attempting to solve complex problems.

"I was thrilled by the prospect of challenging problems," said Slavich.

Henry Jacobs, a professor emeritus in the Department of Mathematics and Statistics, said another reason for the competition is to create awareness for the department.

"The competition gives mathematics a bit more campus visibility," said Jacobs. "Some of the winners have switched majors to math or selected math as a minor."

The number of participants jumped dramatically in 1999 when the prizes were changed from computer equipment to cash, and has remained steady at between 50 and 60 over the last few years.

Richard said he would spend some of the money on a cake to celebrate with some friends.

"I'll either get skis or take a small road trip or something," he said.

The awards ceremony will begin at 7:30 p.m.

Report says terror attacks down

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – Terror attacks around the world declined sharply in 2002 and the number of anti-U.S. attacks dropped as well, the State Department reported yesterday.

The United States again branded seven countries – Cuba, Iran, Iraq, Libya, North Korea, Syria and Sudan – as sponsors of terrorism. Cofer Black, who heads the department's counterterrorism office, said steps would be taken to remove Iraq from the list now that President Saddam Hussein's government has been overthrown.

"It's legally difficult to take them off the list," Black said, but Secretary of State Colin Powell "is recommending that steps be taken to do it."

Cuba was accused of sending agents to U.S. missions around the world to provide false leads designed to subvert investigations into the Sept. 11 attacks against the United States, the report said.

With the drop-off in attacks around the world, Powell said "unprecedented progress has been made across the international community."

He said that "with every passing month the campaign has intensified," and that for terrorists still on the loose, "life has definitely become more difficult." Powell said, "We cannot and will not relax our resolve, our efforts, our vigilance."

Iran was designated as the most active supporter, with its supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, referring to Israel as a "cancerous tumor," while Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps and Ministry of Intelligence and Security assisted Lebanese Hezbollah and Palestinian rejectionist groups including Hamas, the annual report said.

Iraq's ties to terror groups, which the Bush administration cited as one of its reasons for going to war to remove President Saddam Hussein, included laying the groundwork for possible attacks on the United States and other Western countries, the report said.

Syria permits some terror groups to maintain headquarters or offices in Damascus and helps Iran supply Hezbollah via Damascus, the report said.

The Syrian government insists the offices are involved only in political and informational activities, the report said.

Powell has said he would talk to President Bashar Assad about Syria's support for terror and U.S. allegations that it helped Iraq with military technology and did not stop Syrian fighters from joining the war against the U.S.-led coalition.

In 2002, there were 199 terror attacks worldwide, a drop of 44 percent from the 355 attacks recorded in 2001. A total of 725 people were killed last year, far below the 3,295 who died in 2001.

Attacks on the United States declined from 219 to 77. The drop was due mainly to a falloff in pipeline bombings in Colombia.

Thirty U.S. citizens, including seven at a resort in Bali, Indonesia, five at Hebrew University in Jerusalem and Daniel Pearl, the Wall Street Journal's South Asia bureau chief, in Pakistan, were killed in 2002.

The American victims included a hiker and a missionary in the Philippines, two American diners in a West Bank pizzeria, two attending church services in Islamabad, Pakistan, three people at a missionary hospital in Yemen and Laurence Foley, an administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development in Jordan.

"They will be more informed about decisions they are making," Brown said.

As Effrat and Schneider cite budget cuts as the central issue, some instructors and students say the benefits of the program far outweigh the costs.

"GPE is valuable program that deserves to be re-funded," said Laura Crosby, a senior political science major. "When the stress of the semester builds up, I can go to my GPE classes and work out that stress physically."

David Soffer, a senior SOM major, said, "It would be horrible to get rid of a program where the costs are minimal and participation rate is high."

Sean Jacquet, a senior journalism major, said he is taking a basketball class to earn one credit for graduation. However, he said he has gained more than just meeting a requirement.

"It's something I look forward to every week," said Jacquet. "It's scheduled exercise and socially important. I've made many friends."

Beth Novak, a junior psychology major and a swimming instructor for GPE, said her students are using the class as a viable option to remain physically active. She said the gyms available on and off campus are either too expensive or limited on availability.

"There is already limited time available for non-varsity athletes to use the facilities, and my swimming classes are full of students who were varsity water polo players until the school cut that sport," Novak said. "Taking a gym class was their only option to stay active after the school cut their sport, and now the school is going to cut the GPE program too."

According to figures from area fitness centers, the costs associated with joining a facility ranges from $150 to $300, a figure Jacquet said is too high. "I have no time and no money for membership to a gym," he said.

Will Raymond, a figure skating instructor, said the benefits of the program are not limited to just students.

"Teachers learn just as much or more about what they are teaching than students do," said Raymond.

Raymond believes the program is definitely not cancelled yet.

"It won't be definite until the Massachusetts government sets the budget for next year," said Raymond.

Despite the bleak outlook, instructors are holding to that hope, and will most likely have to wait until July to see if their efforts to keep GPE alive have proved worthwhile.

Effrat said that although there are more senior authorities he reports to, he would think he has the ultimate say.

"I'll take responsibility for whatever actions or decisions are made with respect to GPE or any of our programs," Effrat said.

going out at night alone, not drinking too much or not wearing a certain outfit.

Kidwell said that instead of society saying women shouldn't do these things, they should be punishing the people who are committing the crimes against them.

"The hooting and hollering coming out of the windows, there's our society," Kidwell said in reaction to the people in Southwest.

When the march commenced outside of the Student Union, several speakers including Kidwell took the stage. First student Caroline Goodman spoke of the need for sexual violence education on campus, and how the budget cuts have affected it. Next reading "Phenomenal Woman" by Maya Angelou was La'Wanza Tett Brewington, Director of Community Education at the Everywoman's Center.

"This poem gives me strength when I need to check in and see where I stand," Tett Brewington said. "I believe you all to be phenomenal women."

Also speaking was Becky Lockwood Associate Director of the Rape Crisis Services and Violence Prevention Programs at the Everywoman's Center. Lockwood told the audience that in the current Massachusetts state budget, there was no money allotted for rape crisis victims. She said it was very important for people to let their legislators know that this service is essential.

"Let them know [the lives of survivors are just as important as their political careers," Lockwood said.

People who attended the event, including several men, felt that it was an important one to be involved with.

"I think it's important for men to speak on these issues [as well as women]," said UMass student Nathan Albrow.

Simonna Grant, a Smith College student who attended the event, said she was a survivor of sexual violence, and she also felt educating people about the crime was important.

"The guy in my experience didn't understand what rape was, and it's good to bring about what exactly it is and how exactly it happens," she said.

T-shirts designed by VOX member Lauren Helm were on sale for $10, with the proceeds going to next year's event.

"It has been a great thing," Bedick said. "We are hoping to continue it next year. All the funds [raised] from this event and the rest of the semester are going to the event next year."

Bedick said that support for the event was great from both the community and the groups on campus, such as the Everywoman's Center, the UMass Women's Studies Department and UMass Jewish Affairs, which provided them with the "Take Back the Night" banner that was held at the front of the march. However, Bedick said support from the UMass Administration had been lacking.

"There was not enough support from the UMass administration," Bedick said.

"As Brian said, they slashed payroll for the President, Speaker and the Chair of Ways and Means, and they didn't fund the Secretary of Diversity position," Carr said. "But they put in a lot of hard work and if that's how they feel an organization should get funded, then as President I support them."

The Executive Cabinet is complete after last night's meeting, with Donaghey approved for her second term as Secretary of Finance and Lisa Jollimore approved as Secretary of Administrative Affairs.

With over 20 motions on last night's agenda, members approved multiple SGA Constitutional by-law changes for the coming year.

Debate arose over a motion proposing money to be allocated to the Elections Committee to distribute to senators during their elections to help pay for fliers.

Speaker Dan Saunders advocated for the motion, saying that giving a small amount of money to the Senate was a positive act. The Senate approved the motion.

Debate again arose on a motion to approve $2100 to fund students to go to a Diversity conference in San Francisco this summer. Members of the SGA are scheduled to attend the conference, as well as other students who have joined together to discuss diversity issues.

The motion further proposed that those who attended the conference would return to the Senate in the fall of 2003 to make a factual presentation.

"The conference involves various schools, they come together and then talk about race, ethnicity, diversity and the issues that are present there," Chair of Finance Patrick Higgins said. "I completely feel comfortable with funding this, my committee felt completely comfortable with this, it's not a matter of paying for individuals it's a matter of getting those individuals back here in front of the Senate and bringing that information back to us."

Senator Olaf Aprons called for debate, saying that he felt it unnecessary to send individuals to San Francisco to discuss diversity and saw it as a waste of the SGA's money.

"You don't need to go to San Francisco to learn more about it [diversity]. It's $2100 to register for a conference, it's ridiculous," Aprons said. "This is pretty much paying $2100 for six people to go to San Francisco and talk about diversity and I think that's a little steep. I don't think we should be spending our money on that."

JAMES M. HAPPEL/COLLEGIAN

Ways and Means Chair Brian Thompson shows weariness at last night's SGA meeting. The meeting was among the longest of the year.

Higgins said he felt this was a small price to pay in order to bring a better understanding of diversity and how other Universities handle issues surrounding it back to Amherst.

"$2100 is not that much to bring back new information about diversity to this body and to this campus," Higgins said.

The motion was passed by the Senate.

Other motions last night included the proposed change in mascot and the lack of student involvement in the decision process for it. The motion brought before the Senate requested that students be involved in any proposed changes. Due to a lack of information, the motion was tabled until the Senate's next meeting.

The budget's Senate approval and several tabled motions will be up for discussion at next week's Senate meeting. All meetings are open to the public.

Winners of mathematics contest to be honored

By DAVID GRANT
Collegian Staff

Three students who won the 18th annual Mathematics Competition on campus last month will be honored in a ceremony tonight in room 1634 of the Lederle Graduate Research Center.

Nicholas Richard, a sophomore electrical engineering major, won $1,000 in cash for his first-place finish in the competition, held April 9 at the University of Massachusetts. Edward Slavich, a freshman physics major, and Byn Choi, a computer science major, won $1,000 and $400 respectively for their second and third place finishes.

Sean Jacobs, Vitaliy Lvin, Subhash Patel and Iszieung To all were awarded $100 and received honorable mentions.

The two hour, 10 question competition held each year is sponsored by a variety of corporations and is open to freshmen and sophomore students with an interest in solving critical mathematical problems.

"These questions are completely unlike anything you would get on a regular class exam because there's no single concepts that are being used," said Richard.

Report says terror attacks down

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – Terror attacks around the world declined sharply in 2002 and the number of anti-U.S. attacks dropped as well, the State Department reported yesterday.

The United States again branded seven countries – Cuba, Iran, Iraq, Libya, North Korea, Syria and Sudan – as sponsors of terrorism. Cofer Black, who heads the department's counterterrorism office, said steps would be taken to remove Iraq from the list now that President Saddam Hussein's government has been overthrown.

"It's legally difficult to take them off the list," Black said, but Secretary of State Colin Powell "is recommending that steps be taken to do it."

Cuba was accused of sending agents to U.S. missions around the world to provide false leads designed to subvert investigations into the Sept. 11 attacks against the United States, the report said.

With the drop-off in attacks around the world, Powell said "unprecedented progress has been made across the international community."

He said that "with every passing month the campaign has intensified," and that for terrorists still on the loose, "life has definitely become more difficult." Powell said, "We cannot and will not relax our resolve, our efforts, our vigilance."

Iran was designated as the most active supporter, with its supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, referring to Israel as a "cancerous tumor," while Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps and Ministry of Intelligence and Security assisted Lebanese Hezbollah and Palestinian rejectionist groups including Hamas, the annual report said.

Iraq's ties to terror groups, which the Bush administration cited as one of its reasons for going to war to remove President Saddam Hussein, included laying the groundwork for possible attacks on the United States and other Western countries, the report said.

Syria permits some terror groups to maintain headquarters or offices in Damascus and helps Iran supply Hezbollah via Damascus, the report said.

The Syrian government insists the offices are involved only in political and informational activities, the report said.

Powell has said he would talk to President Bashar Assad about Syria's support for terror and U.S. allegations that it helped Iraq with military technology and did not stop Syrian fighters from joining the war against the U.S.-led coalition.

In 2002, there were 199 terror attacks worldwide, a drop of 44 percent from the 355 attacks recorded in 2001. A total of 725 people were killed last year, far below the 3,295 who died in 2001.

Attacks on the United States declined from 219 to 77. The drop was due mainly to a falloff in pipeline bombings in Colombia.

Thirty U.S. citizens, including seven at a resort in Bali, Indonesia, five at Hebrew University in Jerusalem and Daniel Pearl, the Wall Street Journal's South Asia bureau chief, in Pakistan, were killed in 2002.

The American victims included a hiker and a missionary in the Philippines, two Americans diners in a West Bank pizzeria, two attending church services in Islamabad, Pakistan, three people at a missionary hospital in Yemen and Laurence Foley, an administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development in Jordan.

long effort.

"They will be more informed about decisions they are making," Brown said.

As Effrat and Schneider cite budget cuts as the central issue, some instructors and students say the benefits of the program far outweigh the costs.

"GPE is valuable program that deserves to be re-funded," said Laura Crosby, a senior political science major. "When the stress of the semester builds up, I can go to my GPE classes and work out that stress physically."

David Soffer, a senior SOM major, said, "It would be horrible to get rid of a program where the costs are minimal and participation rate is high."

Sean Iacquet, a senior journalism major, said he is taking a basketball class to earn one credit for graduation. However, he said he has gained more than just meeting a requirement.

"It's something I look forward to every week," said Iacquet. "It's scheduled exercise and socially important. I've made many friends."

Beth Novak, a junior psychology major and a swimming instructor for GPE, said her students are using the class as a viable option to remain physically active. She said the gyms available on and off campus are either too expensive or limited on availability.

"There is already limited time available for non-varsity athletes to use the facilities, and my swimming classes are full of students who were varsity water polo players until the school cut that sport," Novak said. "Taking a gym class was their only option to stay active after the school cast their sport, and now the school is going to cut the GPE program too."

According to figures from area fitness centers, the costs associated with joining a facility ranges from $150 to $300, a figure Iacquet said is too high.

"I have no time and no money for membership to a gym," he said.

Will Raymond, a figure skating instructor, said the benefits of the program are not limited to just students.

"Teachers learn just as much or more about what they are teaching than students do," said Raymond.

Raymond believes the program is definitely not cancelled yet.

"It won't be definite until the Massachusetts government sets the budget for next year," said Raymond.

Despite the bleak outlook, instructors are holding to that hope, and will most likely have to wait until July to see if their efforts to keep GPE alive have proved worthwhile.

Effrat said that although there are more senior authorities he reports to, he would think he has the ultimate say.

"I'll take responsibility for whatever actions or decisions are made with respect to GPE or any of our programs," Effrat said.

One year later: Another look at safe haven laws

One year ago tomorrow, a dead child was discovered in the James dormitory of the Southwest living area. It raised a wealth of debate on the University of Massachusetts campus regarding a woman's options in child placement or care as well as the greater notion of safe haven laws in state and nationwide.

A year later Massachusetts remains one of less than a dozen states — including Vermont, Nebraska and Alaska — that have not officially enacted some form of safe haven law, a legislative method in which parents can anonymously leave their children into a safe environment. Yet the implications for such actions, the implications that could and the situations that run counter — such like the one at UMass — that have sparked national debate in an already charged discussion.

Quite frankly, as we too long ignore the reality and potential necessity of such laws, we couldn't be left for only "others" to bleed, as Amherst hosts an active campus with a strong voice, hybrid it choose to speak. Last year it did. This maybe in the wake of a tragic event in the local community was teeming with discussion. Then it.

And then it went.

That's where momentum is lost along with legitimacy, as we pursue our individual interests. Those who waver in and out of the movement lose credibility; it's a situation where a ground is gained, it seems, by others' losses.

Opinions contrary to one's personal haven discourse often follow a similar hard grasping the mothers as careless and the law themselves as an encouragement of such tendencies. "By providing a 'no hassle' route for ending parental responsibility, safe haven laws encourage mothers to conceal their pregnancies," read a report released by the Evan B. Donaldson Adoption Institute early last month. "[To] give birth unsafely and leave their children anonymously, undermining established and effective child welfare and adoption policy," the report says.

And the sympathizers have a point as well. As Michael Morrisey, a citizen advocate for safe haven legislation, said in an interview with The Collegian last Spring, "Somebody's going to get hurt or killed and this person is going to be a one-day or one-minute-old infant who cannot defend itself," he said. "I would so much rather see any child live. Save the life of the child first."

Regardless of political stances, it's a deafening argument that is impossible to ignore. Massachusetts too should key in more closely to such debates rather than shrug its shoulders for a population unable to voice a stance in its own defense. There are two sides to every case, of course, with natural pros and cons attached to each argument, but when it comes to the most basic safety of a newborn child – the right to live – we at The Collegian can't think of a more persuasive motivation to act positively towards a basic human right.

The real spice of life

Paige Cram

With finals approaching and an increased workload not to mention living half of the cyril SPIRE system in an attempt to register for classes and housing, things have been kind of crazy. And I don't know about you but when things get hectic for me I tend to manage the stress by organizing and planning out my time.

I make myself little lists of things I have to do and when I will do them. It's an efficient system and sure helps. But it's dangerously easy to get locked into a rigid uninteresting routine that was. And who wants to look like that? Certainly not me, and I've found that when I'm lost in my own agenda, all I need is a little wake-up call to remind me that life is not all about the mundane details.

My friends gave me that wake-up call this weekend. Like any other weekend near the end of a semester, I had set aside Saturday as an all-in-all get my work done. My little list of chores and homework was all prepared after sleeping in and getting breakfast. I had laundry and dishes to do, and I had also allotted a night to flexible, three hour block for all of my reading.

So when something suddenly came up and my three best friends proposed an impromptu road trip, I had a decision to make. No, was I busy, was I behind in my work? But this weren't letting me off that easy. And before I knew it, the four of us were piling into a Volkswagen Jetta and setting a course for Fall River, my roommate's hometown about two hours away.

Now, there's something to be said for spontaneity. While at first I was extremely reluctant and all I could think about was how I would never get everything done when I returned, I completely gave in to the moment as soon as we popped in a CD, rolled down the windows and started to just swear. This was exciting, it was random, adventurous even, and any worries or obligations went right out the window.

I don't know what exactly it was that made our little outing so great. Maybe there's just something about singing along to a blasting radio with your friends playing the punch buggy game on the highway like when you were little and laughing like you haven't laughed in a long time. Or maybe it was simply the fact that 10 minutes beforehand, I had a completely uninteresting day all planned out and then, all of a sudden there I was without a clue of what would happen in the next several hours.

> "Whoever said that variety was the spice of life clearly never did anything spur-of-the-moment..."

Whoever said that variety was the spice of life clearly never did anything spur of the moment, because after my experience, I've discovered that spontaneity, not variety, is what really gives life that extra kick. It's the perfect reminder to anyone who's forgotten that life can't be planned out nor should it be because there's no greater feeling than not knowing exactly where the road will lead.

Spontaneity is like any other spice. Exactly how much is necessary depends entirely on the person's taste buds and appetite. Some people like to break into a sweat when they eat, while others prefer to barely taste their food. So the people who like to shock their systems will obviously have to take more drastic spontaneous measures than those who simply like to gently awaken their senses.

Now, don't get me wrong. I'm not saying that just because you like the Afterburner buffalo sauce from Wings means that going out and doing anything without thinking is a good idea. There's a difference between being spontaneous and being stupid, and if you're one of those people who doesn't see the distinction...well then hopefully you're not reading this column.

But as for the rest of you, if you find yourself like me, drowning in work and "to do" lists, don't just settle in and resign yourself to having a bland life. Spice it up. Make your eyes water for once. Do something spontaneous. So what if you get a little behind? You'll catch up.

If an opportunity arises, don't let it pass you by because in the end, it's your time. It's your life, and which would you rather have as a memory: a nice mellow day with your books that keeps you on schedule or a random adventure with your friends that puts everything in perspective?

Seventy lines 'til sunrise

Jamie Loo

Saying goodbye never gets easier. Whenever I look back on my first days in journalism at The Blue and White Banner at Randolph High, one of my first thoughts is always the farewell I wrote in our senior tribute. I had been putting off writing it because I thought my co-editor and I were going to write it together; however he fell through and I was left to write it at the last minute.

It was wicked cheesy and is one of the few regrets I have about high school. I don't think I properly said goodbye in those sparse 500 words to my classmates, some of whom I had been going to school with since kindergarten.

And now here I am again, this time trying to say goodbye to over 17,000 of my classmates in 70 lines. This is my final column, before the traditional notes you'll see from me next week. What I'm feeling as I write this can only be described as this: it's that moment at the end of the movie when the main character is saying goodbye to another character for the final time. The main character looks at the other person with lightly teary eyes that seem to stare off into the distance at times past, and with a dry throat, choking back tears, the character sighs deeply and bursts out something like, "Well, it's been a wild ride."

Indeed it has. All I ever wanted to be was a simple reporter for the news section of this newspaper. My biggest aspiration by the end of college, aside from getting my degree, was to possibly be the news editor, or maybe something bigger.

But God had other plans for me, more amazing than I could have ever imagined. Who knew. The Collegian would have no room for me as a writer freshman year, and that I would be sidetracked for a while into broadcast television. Or that I would spend two years fighting for people of color on this campus with the ALANA Caucus. I never expected to be asked to run for student trustee. I never thought I would be delivering a speech at a graduation banquet. After freshman year, I never thought I would become an editor, let alone the editor of this page.

These were all unexpected blessings, and I wouldn't trade any of them for anything. College isn't just about studying and getting out of here with a degree. Heck, I feel bad for those who have lived it that way. It's about the people who love us, the experiences we share with them and the futures we carve for ourselves with or without them. It's also about pride and school spirit, something which is dead here.

If everyone on this campus participated and gave back a little, whether it's going to support the Minutemen (not Gray Wolves!) at a sporting event or being an active RSO member, this school could be even better. Not having enough money is only a part of the problem – student life here is dead; selfishness and lack of motivation is a crime of our current student body. One of the few reasons it sucks to be leaving from here is that I won't get to see all the great things Chancellor Lombardi is going to do for this campus. I have full faith that he's going to turn this place around, and in 10 years being a UMass alum is going to really mean something.

> "What I'm feeling as I write this can only be described as this: it's that moment at the end of the movie when the main character is saying goodbye to another character for the final time."

A few things I've learned. Your parents will get cooler as you get older. Just because you're a senior, doesn't mean you can't meet new people and have them become your dearest friends. Work isn't worth it if you don't enjoy it. I've learned to love more deeply than I thought I could. And most importantly, life really isn't worth it if you don't take a few healthy risks. In the spirit of risk taking, I'm peacing out of Massachusetts for graduate school to try a different part of the country. In September, I'll be at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. I've never been to Illinois, but I look forward to this move with a healthy amount of fear and optimism.

I also learned what true passion looks like. I saw shimmers of it in the rallies and protests I've been to. I've seen it reflected in the eyes of my friends at UVC, on those late nights as I watched them in the editing suite perfecting their productions, frame by frame. I've seen it in the eyes of my coworkers here at the Collegian as they worked tirelessly to produce a professional newspaper, day after day, on top of classes, schoolwork and for some another job. I've seen that passion waiver when they've watched students flip to the crossword or toss the paper on the ground. And yet, there people crawl back to the office still and put just as much care into the next day's paper.

Seventy lines 'til sunrise is a phrase that every writer who has passed through this office has lived. We've all seen the sunrise at some point, hunched over notebooks or keyboards making sure we were getting it just right. And even then, it's still not good enough. I've had the amazing opportunity to work with a group of people who share this life-blood with me. I'll never forget you guys. Seventy lines is never enough, and it's still not enough for me to say a proper goodbye.

Readers, you guys gave me more credit than I truly deserved over the past four years (whether it was praise or hate), and for that I sincerely thank you. Maybe we'll cross paths again some day, in the pages of another newspaper, maybe a book, or broken down on the side of a road in Illinois. Because in the words of another long gone columnist, "Storytellers never die, we just fade away."

Jamie Loo is (and will always be at heart) a Collegian Columnist.

Too good for Murphy's Law?

Mark Ostroff

People can think of a lot of laws that the Bush Administration has overlooked in their quest for global liberation, but one of them stands out in my mind – Murphy's Law. The idea is simple: anything that can go wrong will go wrong. For Bush and the Project for a New American Century (PNAC), things have certainly gone wrong...very wrong.

The first on this list of things not to expect upon "liberating" an oppressed Middle Eastern nation is the possibility for a theocracy to emerge. How did we not see that one coming?

Regardless, thousands of Muslims – worshippers and clerics – have taken to the streets in demand for an Islamic state. Although the Shiites started the movement, clerics are calling on Sunnis and Kurds for the creation of an Islamic state "equal in rights and duties."

> "Islamic Faith and individual destiny will ultimately rulethe day in Iraq."

Unfortunately, such talk in the White House would probably have you cleaning out your desk by the end of the day. The Bush Administration has recently responded to the idea with Rumsfeld (a member of the PNAC) remarking, "That's not going to happen."

With no one to point the finger at, the United States ended up giving a rhetorical spanking to Iran, accusing it of being behind the Islamic movement in Iraq. (It just goes to show that Bush quotes like "The Iraqi people are fully capable of self-government," are only good for approval ratings.)

The pressure for self-determination leads to yet another problem for the Bush Administration – dead Iraqi civilians. In a two-day span, coalition forces have already killed 13 protesters who had taken to the streets to demand an Islamic state as well as for the Americans to leave Iraq. Apparently, some overly enthusiastic demonstrators fired at American troops, and the troops returned fire. Three children under the age of 11 were killed as well.

I am aware of the Geneva Convention as well as the American military's high standards on rules of engagement. I also know that it is in the best interest of American soldiers and our government to not have troops massacring civilians. I give them the benefit of the doubt and say that self-defense and chaos caused these deaths. But don't tell that to me. Tell that to the Iraqi civilian who picks up the rumor that American troops are indiscriminately killing people. The point is that among a population so backward, these rumors will spread like wildfire. After that, American domestic opinion is even more irrelevant than it was before the war.

Another unexpected problem is that there are actually some loose cannons in the coalition forces, and Iraqis are not exactly pleased by this. According to an Amnesty International report, American soldiers took some Iraqi looters and made them walk naked through downtown Baghdad with the words "Ali Baba – Haram" ("Thief – dirty") written on their chests.

Another American soldier is on trial for executing a surrendering soldier. On top of that, a group of Iraqis have caused a rift after deciding that Gen. Tommy Franks and other officials should be tried for war crimes. The case, which is to be brought up in Belgium, has brought the United States to administer another rhetorical spanking to the Belgians.

Why is the Bush Administration surprised at these developments and reacting to them like a deer caught in headlights? The surprise that Iraq may not want to be the 51st state is most likely taking the PNAC by storm as well.

Personally, I think it's a good lesson to learn for the neo-conservatives who think that everyone else is willing to dump their religions and ideals to emulate America.

In reality, the fate of Iraq is out of our hands, out of the hands of the American government and out the hands of the PNAC. Islamic Faith and individual destiny will ultimately rule the day in Iraq. The people of Iraq have washed their hands of Saddam Hussein and are now ready to wash their hand of what they call the "American Occupation."

When will we learn that there has never been a time in all of history that a nation, without dire consequences, has told another nation how to exist? The irony of this all is that in 1776, America was one of the first voices of this notion. Boy, do the years change someone.

Letter to the Editor:

Minuteman is not marketable

To the Editor:

I am writing in regards to an article printed in yesterday's Collegian, "The New UMass Bird." Upon reading this article I was completely stunned, not only by this individual's lack of education in the matter, but that it had even been printed. The article was an attack on a proposal for a new UMass mascot that took into consideration no real facts.

To start with Mr. Brochu claims that the idea of a new mascot for this school is just another case of old people undertaking a task that he/she shouldn't be given to, among who is battling an severe hemorrhoid medication." He goes on to assume that these people have no idea what the hell they're doing.

Maybe before that statement was made, some research should have been done on Phoenix Design Works, which is the company working on the project. Their list of clients includes Disney, NASCAR, the NBA, NFL, numerous colleges and the list goes on. Furthermore, I have had the privilege of meeting Jay Williams and Robert Crawford, both representatives of this company, and I can assure you they are highly professional and they do know what the hell they are doing.

This article goes on to call this project a waste of money. The Athletic Department here is looking for ways to boost the school spirit at UMass as well as its marketability. Quite frankly, the Minuteman is not marketable. I doubt that this project has been commissioned without the proper research showing that ultimately there will be a return on investment in a new mascot. And if you want to talk about school spirit, who cares if the sports teams "suck?" If you have true school spirit, you would be going to the games anyway.

Mr. Brochu also has some ideas as to what UMass can do. My favorite was that by polling students at UMass, you would find that half say Marcus Camby was a major part of their decision to come here. Maybe if they are on the 10-year plan. Additionally, he states that "realistically, only basketball and football can bring in massive amounts of revenue." If the proper research had been done, he would know that football loses on average $2 million per year. Basketball loses $500,000.

Lastly, I would like to comment on the idea that the Minuteman is sexist. There are more female than male undergrads at this school, and as one of those women, I do care.

I agree the Gray Wolf is not the best idea for a mascot, as I have never seen a Gray Wolf either. It also is too similar to the Huskies. But it is only a proposal, and on the right track. As a sport management major with a strong commitment to this school, it is important to me and many others that school spirit and revenues increase. The Minuteman is outdated and not marketable. A new mascot would be a great change for this school.

The Greatest X-Man Story Ever Told: The Dark Phoenix Saga

By Erik Taylor
COLLEGIAN STAFF

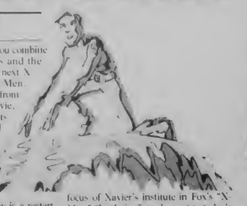
Of all of the various X-Men stories throughout their 40 years of history, none have achieved the mantle of success and influence "The Dark Phoenix Saga" acquired around 23 years ago. Chris Claremont and John Byrne set the example for comics to follow, where villains triumphed, heroes fell and love and compassion resulted in the ultimate sacrifice.

The Phoenix Force, a fiery cosmic force representing the flow of life in the universe, united with Jean Grey's mutant psionic abilities. This marriage of power allowed the Phoenix control over thought, manipulation of matter and unaided flight through endless space, resulting in God-like capabilities. The X-Men believed such a power at their disposal could only aid in their fight towards mutant acceptance and peaceful coexistence with humanity.

It was a time when each X-Man got a chance to flesh out their individual characteristics while coming together as a team. Cyclops, Wolverine, Colossus, Nightcrawler, Storm and the ever-powerful Jean Grey as Phoenix meshed to become a seemingly unstoppable force against any outside opposition. Their greatest challenge, however, came from within, as the omnipotent Phoenix Force succumbed to the darkest sides of human nature.

The Inner Circle of the Hellfire Club, a wealthy and powerful organization of power hungry mutants wanted to exploit the Phoenix force for their own elitist gains. Mastermind, a mutant with the ability to project illusions, began to manipulate Jean Grey to become the Inner Circle's Black Queen. These subtle and convincing manipulations brought out dark aspects of Jean Grey's persona. The Phoenix Force fed off these sinister impulses, eventually transforming the loving and passionate Jean Grey into a corrupt being obsessed with power and destruction: Dark Phoenix.

After effortlessly defeating the X-Men, Dark Phoenix took to the stars. Drunk with power, she found sustenance by destroying a sun. This caused the deaths of billions in a foreign solar system for which she felt no remorse. Feeling satisfied, she returned to Earth hungry for more experiences. She encountered her old mentor Professor Xavier, who battled her telepathically for the fate of the universe. A small part of Jean Grey allowed Xavier to regain her sanity and end her devastating reign.



With Dark Phoenix contained, the X-Men believed the worst was over. But the destruction of the foreign sun garnered the attention of an intergalactic empire. The Shi'ar Empire deemed Phoenix's existence to be a grave threat to all existence and sentenced her to death. The X-Men valiantly chose to defend Jean Grey's life by battling the Shi'ar's Imperial Guard on a battleground located on the Blue Area of the Moon. The X-Men fought hard for their teammate's life and after a grueling and devastating battle the X-Men fell. Feeling the corrupt Dark Phoenix emerging again, Jean Grey heroically took her own life so the universe could live.

"The Dark Phoenix Saga" touches so many levels, the love between Jean Grey and Scott Summers (Cyclops), Wolverine's self-saving of the Hellfire Club, young innocence portrayed by Kitty Pryde, the corruption ultimate power can bring and human sacrifice is what made the story resonate so powerfully even today.

According to mythology a Phoenix dies only to be reborn, and Marvel Comics has since resurrected the character of Jean Grey. Her character in "New X-Men" has once again manifested powers of the Phoenix Force. With the bold directions the X-Men are currently embarking on, Phoenix's return could be the event fans have been waiting 23 years for.

GET READY TO EVOLVE

By Mike Kulak
COLLEGIAN STAFF

What do you get when you combine teenagers, mutant powers and the Kids WB? Evolution. The next X-Men cartoon is here. "X-Men: Evolution," which spun off from the hit summer 2000 movie, "X-Men" and it's hitting its stride now in the midst of season three. New episodes are not only shown on the Kids-WB, but can also be viewed on Cartoon Network.

The premise of the show is a restart of the world of the X-Men, focusing on the mutant superheroes discovering their powers while dealing with high school and evil forces.

"It's an interesting idea because a lot of things these guys deal with as mutants are similar to teen issues. It's a metaphor for finding out you're different, gaining social acceptance," says producer Boyd Kirkland.

Season one set up a great cast of characters, pulling from the comics and creating its own story line as well. "Evolution" does a great job of keeping its own reality while staying true to the comics.

What's different about this show is that it very much focuses on high school. While the X-Men comics progressed to show the mutants as adults, "Evolution" is very kid-oriented. Based upon the focus of Xavier's institute in Fox's "X-Men," "Evolution" reaches out to today's kids and gets them hooked on the comic. Our generation had an X-Men cartoon growing up, and now this one does too.

But this new X-men story is not without respect for the comics from which it comes. Story lines such as the Mystique/Rogue/Nightcrawler relationship are very much touched upon. Even before their triangle is brought to light in the cartoon, Rogue can be heard saying about Nightcrawler, "He's like an annoying little brother!" An diehard X-Men fan is nodding and saying, "you're so right" when she says this.

This kind of subtle connection to the comics can also be seen with Spyke, Storm's nephew, who was created for "Evolution." While creators deny any connection with the character Marrow, giving her a God-like quality that has been slowly building up for a momentous event.

Currently, the "Murder at the Mansion" storyline continues, as the X-Men search the Institute for the murderer of one of their own. Emma Frost, while in her diamond form, was somehow shattered. With the Institute locked down during the investigation, the killer hides among them, and could be the last person anyone expects.

"Uncanny X-Men"
Writer: Chuck Austen
Artist: Ron Garney

"Uncanny X-Men" is the X-Men's flagship title. It has been an ongoing series since the X-Men's creation in the early 1960s. Countless artists and writers have contributed, but now it is Chuck Austen's turn to invigorate the series to new standards.

The cast of "Uncanny X-Men" features classic characters and newcomers alike. Iceman, Archangel, Wolverine and Nightcrawler bring the experience, while new recruits Juggernaut, Northstar, Stacy X and Husk supply fresh blood. Capitalizing off the relative unfamiliarity of the newcomers allows Austen more creative freedom to play with his team.

Despite the changes in Morrison's "New X-Men," "Uncanny X-Men" still has its roots firmly in superhero lore. This X-Men "away team" travels the world, championing Mutant Rights. An upcoming story will return the Church of Humanity, a group of religious zealots out to purge the world of the "mutant abomination."

There is also further exploration of Nightcrawler's past and his connection to the priesthood. New relationships will be forged while others are forever severed, a major villain returns while a new villain emerges and an X-Man will die. To capitalize on "X2's" success, issue No. 423 will attempt to draw new readers by costing only 25 cents five days after the film's release.

"X-Treme X-Men"
Writer: Chris Claremont
Artist: Igor Kordy

Storm, Bishop, Rogue, Gambit, Sage and Thunderbird comprise this offshoot of Xavier's X-Men. Storm believes that once Xavier exposed his school to the world and declared his mutation for mutant acceptance, he compromised his dream of co-existence. Storm's X-Men have no home as they travel the world enhancing mutant/human relations.

Chris Claremont, the writer most responsible for who the X-Men are today, writes "X-Treme X-Men." His knack for spinning epic sagas rife with extreme action, coupled with appealing characterization, adds to the excitement of the book.

Recently, this X-Men splinter group fended off an enormous alien invasion, led by the conquering Khan. Its success in defeating Khan rendered Gambit and Rogue powerless, causing them to leave the team. Thunderbird, Slipstream and Lifeguard also split from the team to pursue other interests, leaving Storm, Bishop and Sage to continue their mission.

"God Loves, Man Kills Part II" is Claremont's next story-arc for his X-Men. This is the sequel to the original graphic novel that inspired events in the upcoming "X2." The X-Men's old enemy Stryker returns, but the X-Men may have to reluctantly join forces with him to face a greater threat. Also, guest appearances by Wolverine, Kitty Pryde and new team member Cannonball only add to this impending classic story-arc.

"Ultimate X-Men"
Writer: Mark Millar
Artist: Andy Kubert

Marvel's Ultimate Line was introduced three years ago as a means to start from scratch with Marvel's most popular characters. The idea was to take the core concepts and apply them to modern times without the burden of years of continuity. These "Ultimate" modern retakes of the classic characters are considered by many to be to best comics on the stands.

All of the X-Men are younger, placing them inside Xavier's School for the Gifted during adolescence. Like horny and competitive teenagers in a private school, these X-Men are a far cry from their classic Boy Scout counterparts.

Millar's modernized heroes exist in a harsh and realistic world. Wolverine attempts to murder Cyclops to get closer to Jean Grey. After Iceman was injured on a mission, his parents sued Professor Xavier's school. Magneto ripped a naked President out of the White House by his metal dental work for an execution, only to be nearly gutted by a ferocious Wolverine. Jean Grey is now plagued by visions of a Phoenix God, which possesses her body.

Currently, Magneto caused the meltdown of a Miami Nuclear Power Plant, and the only hope for survival lies in unleashing Jean Grey's inner Phoenix. With none of the rules that apply to other X-books, Mark Millar has proven that anything is possible, as he recreates X-Men history.

Quick Bits:

"Emma Frost"
Writer: Karl Bollers
Artist: Randy Green

Following the popular comic book trend, "Emma Frost" delves into the early years of the Xavier Institute's resident telepathic and diamond-skinned teacher. Fans of the ex-villainous White Queen will witness from the very beginning her journey towards evil and eventual redemption to the ranks of the X-Men.

"Exiles"
Writer: Chuck Austen
Artist: Clayton Henry

"Exiles" is a perfect mixture of "Quantum Leap," "X-Men" and "What If...?" There are countless alternate realities that exist where anything is possible. Marvel's classic "What If...?" series exposed us to these sometimes blissful, but more often hellish, realities. Wrong choices were made, heroes died, battles were lost and these various worlds crumbled as the outcome. "Exiles" features a continuing cast of X-Men plucked from different realities who travel to these broken-down worlds to alter events and set things right.

"Mystique"
Writer: Brian K. Vaughn
Artist: Jorge Lucas

"Mystique" is a cross between "James Bond" and "X-Men," as the shape-shifting mutant terrorist enters the world of espionage. Professor Xavier sends Mystique on clandestine missions all over the world, but Xavier's pacifist agenda and Mystique's murderous methods complicate their arrangement. Forge, the ex X-Man with the mutant ability to invent anything, acts as Mystique's gadget supplier. It seems the notorious blue-skinned mutant criminal has joined Xavier's mission for peace, or has she?

"New Mutants"
Writer: Christina Weir
Artist: Keron Grant

The relaunch of the popular series brings much of the original members of Xavier's youngest mutant class back to school to train a new generation of X-Men. It has been years since the original New Mutants graduated, and now Dani Moonstar (Mirage), Wolfsbane and Magma are recruiting new mutant students to enroll at the Xavier Institute. With a private school backdrop, the New Mutants will be given a chance to learn more about their powers and where they fit into a world that doesn't necessarily want them.

"Sentinel"
Writer: Sean McKeever
Artist: Udon Comics

Teenager Juston Steyford stumbles across something amazing amongst his father's salvage yard – a downed Sentinel. "Sentinel" focuses on one of the gigantic mutant hunting robots recently responsible for the genocidal extermination of 60 million mutants. This socially inept high

Spyke does sport a similar mutation. He also goes on to join the Morlocks in season three, and Marrow was the leader of the Morlocks for a while. Coincidence? Maybe. On the other hand, Storm led the Morlocks for a while in the comics, so Spyke's move to join them could be reminiscent of that, refuting the Marrow connection.

"Evolution" portrays many characters from the Marvel universe – 48 so far. The initial X-Men that found their way into season one were Professor X, Jean Grey, Cyclops, Nightcrawler, Shadowcat, Rogue, Storm, Wolverine and Spyke.

The Brotherhood of Mutants was also formed, consisting of Magneto, Mystique, Toad, Avalanche, Blob, Quicksilver, Scarlet Witch (season two) and Sabretooth.

In season two, new recruits were introduced, including Beast, Iceman, Cannonball, Magma, Sunspot, Boom Boom, Wolfsbane, Berzerker, Jubilee and Multiple.

The Sentinels, Bolivar Trask and Edward Kelly have all sported roles as well.

Other mutants making appearances include Havok, Angel, Gambit, Pyro, Colossus, Agatha Harkness, Mastermind, Mesmero, Juggernaut, Forge, Destiny, the Morlocks, Callisto, Arcade, Magik II and Apocalypse.

Nick Fury and Captain America have also made appearances on the show.

A DVD has just been released. This is a must-have for any "X-Men: Evolution" fan – or any general X-Men fan for that matter. Sporting the first four episodes from season two and special features, including character bios and an introduction for each episode from the creator, this DVD is fantastic.

With "X2: X-Men United" coming out on Friday, propelling X-Men fans into a frenzy, "Evolution" can look to evolve a broader fan-base.

'X2: X-Men United'

But what makes the movie really work is the genius in the villain characters. William Stryker is the mutant-hating human in this movie, and he makes Senator Kelly look about as menacing as an infant child.

On the outside he is simply a man hell-bent on eliminating the so-called mutant threat. But Stryker's hatred for Professor Xavier (Patrick Stewart) and mysterious relationship with Wolverine make him a deep character.

In the middle we have the sometimes righteous and often misguided Magneto (Ian McKellen). Magneto consistently wanders in and out of the audience's favor, finally making a major turn near the end of the movie. That twist, coupled with an open-ended conclusion, will likely leave viewers hanging. But what they engage in epic-scale conflicts. In their many incarnations, the X-Men have battled gods, saved entire galaxies, toppled corrupt governments, fought embittered and misguided mutants and consequently suffered numerous deaths among their ranks. With extremely powerful mutants such as the fan-favorite Wolverine, Colossus, Cyclops, Havok, Avalanche, Proteus and Storm viciously battling, they create extensive amounts of collateral damage. As the old adage goes, "You can always tell where the X-Men have been."

With the "X-Men" film in 2000 being a large hit and with the expected success of May 2's "X2: X-Men United," the comics have capitalized on the public's attention. The movies' vision has blended into the source material, making the comic more familiar with the movie's fans. Gone for the most part are the colorful spandex costumes, replaced by the film's influence of leather and Kevlar uniforms. "Suddenly, I don't have to look like an idiot in broad daylight," grunts Wolverine on losing his classic blue and yellow spandex uniform. Also, upcoming storylines in both "Uncanny X-Men" and "X-Treme X-Men" are comparable to "X2's."

Numerous writers and artists have left their marks on the X-Men mythos, bringing hundreds of different characters and storylines to the adoring fans. It is almost impossible to summarize an average of 40 years of X-Men history. Every issue contains a "Previously" page where first-time or returning readers are privy to relative information necessary to understanding current events. For the more curious reader, www.uncannyx-men.net is a vast resource of current and past information regarding everything X.

"Everything Changes" is the fundamental evolutionary principal of The Xavier Institute. With A-list writers such as Chris Claremont, Brian Michael Bendis and Mark Millar combining their talents with dynamic artists such as David Finch, Phil Jimenez and Frank Quietly, the X-Men comics are evolving, quite possibly, into their finest era.

school sophomore is about to make a dangerous new acquaintance, the world's most vicious and destructive mutant-killing machine.

"Weapon X"
Writer: Frank Tieri
Artist: Georges Jeanty

The Weapon X program, notoriously famous with the creation of Wolverine, has a history of exploiting its mutant agents' powers for corrupt gains. "Weapon X" focuses on a group of villains, including Wolverine's nemesis Sabretooth, each a part of the program for their own purposes. Ironically, they are being manipulated by the enigmatic and vengeful Director to eradicate all mutant kind.

"Wolverine"
Writer: Greg Rucka
Artist: Darick Robertson

This series relaunch brings the feral mutant back to his violent roots. Logan ventures solo as he seeks vengeance for the slaughter of an innocent young girl. His quest for answers will give readers the unpredictable and brutally claw happy Wolverine fans have been waiting for. The intention for "Wolverine" was to create a world outside of the X-Men for Wolverine to interact with and hack away as he sees fit.

"X-Men Unlimited"
Various Artists and Writers

This ongoing anthology series acts more as a character study than an action packed comic. "X-Men Unlimited" is an outlet for creators to lay tribute to their favorite X-characters, alive or dead. Upcoming issues will showcase short stories, featuring Nightcrawler, Wolverine and the deceased pair of Psylocke and Colossus.

"X-Statix"
Writer: Peter Milligan
Artist: Philip Bond

While the X-Men fight for mutant rights and acceptance, the media members of X-Statix are looking to cash in on the mutant culture phenomenon. Caring more about fame and money above all else, this self-destructive, yet effective, mutant superhero team struggles to satisfy their demographics and advertisers. "X-Statix" is an intensely clever satire towards celebrity life, reality television and the fads that dominate the entertainment industry.

Chew on this, kids: We promise you will enjoy it

Remember eating mud pies when you were a kid? How about paint chips? Yeah, neither did I. But for some children and adults, the desire to consume nonfood items continues for an abnormal period of time. The term for such a practice is known as "pica" (pronounced PIE-kah).

The origins of this term come from the Latin word for magpie. This species of bird is best known for its tendency to eat whatever it comes across in nature. Another term for consuming dirt or rocks instead of nutritional food items is called geophagy.

Persons who feel they may have pica must exhibit symptoms for a minimum of one month. Children, more often than adults, tend to develop the disorder. Statistics show between 10 and 20 percent of children between the ages of two and six experience pica in some form. The reasons behind their actions frequently stem from imitation of a family pet or – in rare cases – low consumption of vitamins such as iron or calcium. It has been reported that children eat paint chips due to the sweet taste of lead-based paint. Unfortunately, the result of eating paint chips is a complete loss of mental faculties.

Pregnant women with cravings have been known to practice pica as well. In most cases, placing the patient on vitamin supplements chases away the desire to eat things that are better left on the forest floor. Symptoms also tend to disappear after childbirth.

Jessica Pelletier

It is estimated that over 200 cultures participate in the consuming of substances such as dirt or clay. The practice dates back to ancient Greece and is still practiced by certain cultures in Central Africa and South America. This does not qualify as pica due to its cultural and historical significance. Wandering into your backyard and chewing on a clump of mulch, yeah, that would be pica.

Possible problems associated with pica include intestinal blockage, lead poisoning or intestinal parasites. Regardless of the symptoms, persons with anorexia occasionally develop pica as a way to avoid nutritional foods and also to reaffirm their feelings of being "unworthy" of eating normal food.

Even though the disorder may seem new to many, if you suspect yourself or a loved one of having pica, seek help. There is no known prevention for the disease, but a diet rich in nutritionally valuable food may help. The disorder is far from new, and research continues to be done to gain further insight with regards to causes and prevention.

Mullins to kick off Spring with weekend promotions

This weekend marks the official kickoff of spring on campus with the annual Spring Concert, headlined by rapper 50 Cent, and perhaps the Mullins Center's most anticipated concert of the year on Monday, Dave Matthews and Tim Reynolds.

The Mullins Center has a series of activities planned leading up to both events. Tonight, the Monkey Bar and Delano's will be hosting "Two Steppin' in Da Club" night in anticipation of the weekend's events. Beginning at 10 p.m., customers will be given the opportunity to win the final two tickets available for the Dave Matthews Show, as well as a pair of tickets to see hip-hop masters The Roots at Amherst College on Saturday.

The Spring Concert, sponsored by University Productions and Concerts, begins at 5 p.m. on Sunday with Cold Duck Complex opening. Hip-hop talent Rahzel will be featured during the evening, as well as ska band Reel Big Fish, and finally headliner 50 Cent. Tickets are still available at the Mullins Center or at ticketmaster.com.

Monday night, the Mullins Center presents the highly anticipated "Acoustic Evening with Dave Matthews and Tim Reynolds." This event is a fundraiser for the Tiger Kloof School, an educational facility in South Africa that provides its students with a Christian education and plays a vital role in the process of social integration in the region. The show is completely sold out, but tickets will be given away at promotions in town over the weekend.

For more information, contact the Mullins Center at 545-0505 or visit its website at www.mullinscenter.com

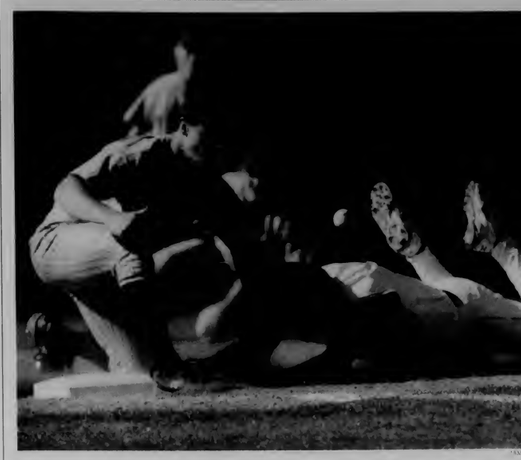
Amherst art Gallery to color outside the lines

In Amherst today, Gallery A3 will begin its exhibit of three local abstract/non-objective artists. Exhibited painters will include Keith Hollinworth, Cathy Osman and Dorothy Osterman. All three artists have a unique direction to their work, but the exhibit's eclectic style will give it a strong sense of exploration and discovery.



Hollinworth's artwork is done primarily on canvas. His works strive to be serine and calming, suggesting an almost meditative state to the viewers.

Osman also utilizes oil on canvas, but she also explores the area of drawing. Osman uses paint and pencil to develop textures and layers in her artwork. Osterman shares the realm of oil on canvas with her accompanying artists, and makes use of glosh as well, a water-based paint substance, on paper. Osterman explores the possible representations of gestures and emotions in her artwork.

When asked what rhyme or reason there was behind the coupling of these artists, Hollinworth said, "Firstly, it is because we are all friends and beyond that it has to do with the fact that we all work out of progress as opposed to concept. That is to say we do not form our art in our minds before we lay it down; it is more of an explorative and developmental experience for us to create our works."

The opening reception and gallery walk will be held today from 5 to 8 p.m. at the A3 Gallery. The gallery is located at 28 Amity Street, directly across from the Jones Library. All three of the featured artists will be on hand opening night to answer questions and share impressions on their work. The exhibit will run through the month of May and will close on Saturday, May 31.

crossing the plate, and threw three and 2/3 scoreless innings of relief, allowing only three hits while striking out four to pick up his second victory of the season.

"Anthony pitched really well," Stone said. "He had good command and got us out of a jam with good damage control. He was throwing well with good juice and hitting his spots."

The lead was pretty big, so I figured if I held them then we could keep chipping away at it," Gallo said. "I tried to get ahead of the hitters and keep us in the ballgame. I know we've been hitting well lately, so I knew if I held them there we could come back."

After being unable to get to UVM starter Jared Slater, other than a tremendous homer by senior designated hitter Chris Morgan, the Minutemen began to chip away further off the UVM bullpen in the seventh. They rallied for three runs off of freshman southpaw Chris Blazek to narrow Vermont's edge to 7-4, with the big blow an RBI double off the bat of sophomore outfielder Curt Szado.

"Things weren't looking good for awhile. They had gotten some runs they probably shouldn't have, and the game should've been closer then it was," Stone said. "We just tried to start with a clean slate in the seventh inning. We got a few runs and started to pile it on in the eighth."

Senior first baseman Jeff Altieri began the eighth with a one-out double and then scored on an RBI double by junior third baseman Matt Reynolds. After freshman outfielder Frank Curreri drew a walk, senior outfielder Matt Boulanger's RBI single drove in Reynolds, and Curreri followed to tie the game when the ball eluded Brault in leftfield, setting up Twomley's heroics.

"The pitcher was throwing fastballs and trying to get guys out with just that, so [assistant coach Tim] Laurita said to just sit dead red," Twomley said. "I was looking for that fastball and I got it and the rest is history."

Senior catcher and co-captain Tom Ellerbrook then walked and scored on an RBI double by junior shortstop Mike Athas. UMass concluded the scoring on a two-run homer by fellow co-captain John Seed.

Junior righthander Eric Chown picked up the save for the Minutemen, recording the game's final out with the bases loaded in relief of Gallo.

Righthander Brett Dubens took the loss for Vermont, allowing five earned runs on four hits in 2/3 of an inning.

The Minutemen will return to action tomorrow, as they head east on the Massachusetts Turnpike for a doubleheader with intrastate rival Boston College in Chestnut Hill. Game one is scheduled to begin at 2 p.m.

"This game was definitely a confidence booster for us heading into a big day tomorrow against a Big East team like BC," Twomley said.

Tomorrow is a big day, playing BC. That'll be a real good test for us," Stone added.

USOC correct in clearing Lewis

By STEPHEN WILSON
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) – The U.S. Olympic Committee was right to clear Carl Lewis and other Americans after positive drug tests in 1988, track and field's world governing body ruled Wednesday.

The USOC followed the rules in dealing with eight positive cases for stimulants at the 1988 Olympic trials, the International Association of Athletics Federations said.

According to documents released by Dr. Wade Exum, the USOC's former director for drug control, U.S. athletes tested positive for drugs more than 100 times from 1988 to 2000. Only a handful were barred from competing and 19 went on to win medals.

Exum said Lewis, a nine-time Olympic champion, tested positive three times at the trials for small amounts of banned stimulants. The USOC first disqualified Lewis, then reversed itself after he appealed, claiming inadvertent use.

"This decision validates our position and clearly illustrates that the rules that were in place in 1988 were followed," USOC spokesman Darryl Seibel said.

But World Anti-Doping Agency chief Dick Pound insisted the USOC acted improperly and the athletes should have been disqualified from the Olympics.

"There are people who probably should have been on the U.S. Olympic team who didn't make it because other people were using drugs," he said.

Exum has indicated he released the documents to reform the system, but Seibel said anti-drug rules in the United States and around the world already have undergone many changes since 2000.

Lewis won two gold medals in Seoul, in the long jump and the 100 meters. He was awarded the 100 gold after Canadian sprinter Ben Johnson was stripped of the medal for a positive steroid test.

Exum's documents have led to accusations around the world that the USOC covered up positive tests and that Lewis and others should have been barred from competing.

"The IAAF is concerned that the continuing controversy over these cases is tarnishing the image of the sport unnecessarily and wishes to make its position clear based on what actually happened in 1988," the IAAF said.

The federation said it had reviewed the relevant documents from 1988 and found that, although the athletes' names were not disclosed, the IAAF was informed of eight positive findings for ephedrine and ephedrine-related compounds "in low concentrations."

"The IAAF medical committee felt satisfied, however, on the basis of the information received that the cases had been properly concluded by the USOC as 'negative cases' in accordance with the rules and regulations in place at the time and no further action was taken," the statement said.

The IAAF said the athletes who went on to compete in Seoul were "eligible to do in accordance with IAAF rules."

Barron Pittenger, who was executive director of the USOC in 1988, said last week that an investigation at the time concluded the level of banned stimulants found in Lewis' system was not significant enough to be performance-enhancing. That prompted the USOC to reverse its decision.

"The rules at the time called for us to determine intent. These levels were less than 10 micrograms per milliliter, consistent with accidental use," he said.

Pound, a senior IOC member from Canada, said he has written IOC president Jacques Rogge, urging an independent inquiry. He said WADA is willing to carry out an investigation if asked.

"I remain very troubled by the whole thing," he added. "There was certainly an enormous lack of transparency. Somebody has to say, 'Look, this is probably not the way it ought to have been handled.'"

Weber is Illinois' new coach

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. (AP) – Bruce Weber is back in the Big Ten, moving to Illinois as head basketball coach Wednesday after five successful seasons at Southern Illinois.

He has roots in the conference, having worked 18 years as an assistant to Gene Keady at Purdue.

"Our goal is to win a national championship at the University of Illinois," athletic director Ron Guenther said. "I believe that Bruce Weber is the coach to lead us to the next level."

Guenther praised Weber for his integrity and commitment to academics.

"I am honored and humbled to be named the coach here," Weber said. "It's a tremendous honor."

He replaces Bill Self, who went to Kansas after Roy Williams left for North Carolina.

Weber went 103-54 in five seasons at Southern Illinois.

Last season, the Salukis went 24-7 and won the regular-season Missouri Valley Conference championship. They lost to Missouri in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

Weber's best year with SIU came in 2002, when the Salukis went 28-8 and made it to the NCAA tournament's round of 16.

On Tuesday night, Weber told an Associated Press reporter at his home in Carbondale that he would be joining the Illini.

Burnett out 12-to-14 months

MIAMI (AP) – Florida Marlins right-hander A.J. Burnett won't pitch again this year, and he might miss next season, too.

Burnett underwent reconstructive elbow surgery after renowned orthopedist Dr. James Andrews found the ulnar collateral ligament in Burnett's throwing arm fully torn. A full recovery is expected, but it's projected to take 12-to-18 months.

'We don't want guys that are too smart ...'

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Further proof that it's possible to think too long and hard about the draft:

The psychological test the New York Giants give prospective draft choices totals 380 questions. That's four or five times more than the tests most other teams use, and nearly eight times as many questions asked during the standard Wonderlic intelligence test given to every potential draftee.

The main reason for the Giants' giant version is simple to wear players down. At some point, examiners believe, they get real answers instead of the spin players have been programmed to respond with.

Just difficult, though, aren't so sure. Instead of the exam's difficulty, what impresses most of them is its preoccupation with suicide.

"They asked that a lot of times in a lot of different forms," former Utah tackle Jeremy Ware and current Carolina Panther Sione Smith said in a recent interview. "You know, like 'Have you ever thought the world would be better off without you?'"

Smith told the Charlotte (N.C.) Observer that he'd already practiced that day and taken three or four other teams' exams when somebody dropped the Giants' test on his desk. He got through some 50 questions before fatigue set in, then resorted to an old college ruse. "If you don't know the answer, just mark C."

Looking back, it's no wonder he didn't wind up with the Giants.

"They probably thought I was a psycho," Smith said.

Yet for such wacky evidence are multimillion-dollar decisions made.

Young men, sudden fame and fortune and a livelihood that rewards reckless behavior made for a volatile mix long before there were full-time draftnicks like Mel Kiper Jr. and detailed report cards handed out to every organization afterward. But the stakes remain a maddeningly inexact science.

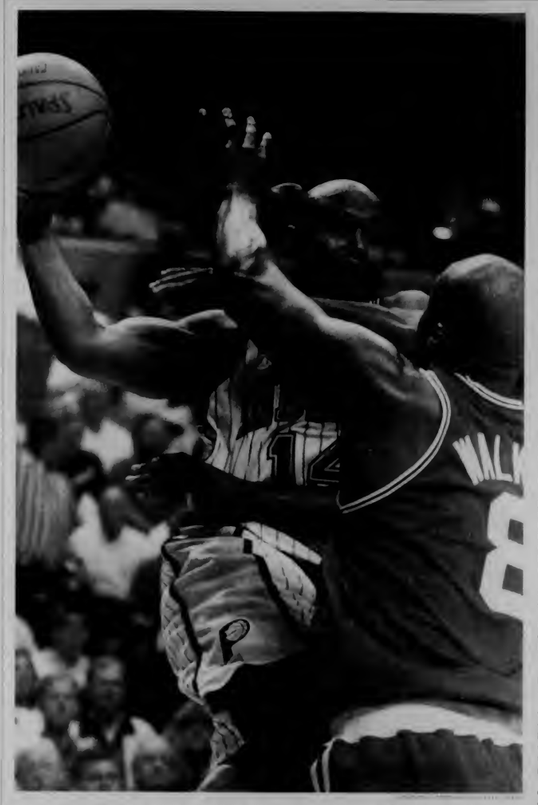
For all the sophisticated timing, measuring and poking that takes place at the scouting combines and smaller workouts, there's still precious little objective probing of what's taking place between a draftee's ears. The Wonderlic test in use today was first developed in the 1950s and is half given to 2.3 million job applicants or professionals across the board. Whether it has any relevance as far as NFL players are concerned depends on whom you ask.

While some agents encourage clients to spend the months after their final season working out in the gym, Memphis-based Brian Parker believes there's still at least as much to be gained in the classroom.

"Teams used to evaluate on just height, weight and speed. Now, they're at least as interested in character, consistency and smarts," he said.

In that sense, Parker considers the 2001 draft a formative experience. He was representing linebacker Matt Stewart, a Vanderbilt grad the top scouting services projected to go in the seventh round. Instead, the Falcons and coach Dan Reeves decided to grab Stewart early in the fourth.

"He told me they looked at Matt and another linebacker with equal ability, and that basically it came down to who was the smarter player," Parker said.



A 32-score (out of a possible 50) on the Wonderlic sealed the deal and nobody has had any regrets since. Stewart got his degree in mechanical engineering and Atlanta got a defender who started 15 of 16 games last season, finishing third on the team in tackles.

Parker, meanwhile, got an object lesson that he used to persuade Memphis lineman Wade Smith to finish his degree this spring. Apparently, that impressed the Dolphins enough to take Smith (and his 29 on the Wonderlic), in the third round, four rounds higher than the consensus of the scouting services.

But like more than a few general managers, not every agent is sold on the idea a good Wonderlic score translates into football intelligence. Pittsburgh-based Ralph Cindrich said more than one of his clients said a reputation as a "brainiac" can get a football player in trouble.

"I think Tim Ruddy, who was from Notre Dame and whose parents might have both been teachers, came within a point or so of a perfect score on the Wonderlic. But he wanted to keep it quiet and I think I understand why," added Cindrich, a tough-guy linebacker in the NFL some 30 years ago. "I've been around a lot of guys who were too smart to be good football players."

Ruddy, a second-round pick who has developed into Miami's starting center, was exactly the sort of pick who used to worry the late George Young.

Indiana Pacers' Tim Hardaway, top, crashes into Boston Celtics forward Antoine Walker as he makes a pass in the second quarter of their first-round playoff game Tuesday night.

missed 12 straight shots, and Artest clinched it with two free throws with 12 seconds left.

"The only thing on my mind was to win," Artest said. "I'm the type of guy who always wants the ball, but I had to wait. We had to make the right thing happen."

The Pacers made things happen offensively in the fourth quarter after a sluggish start. It was Hardaway who gave the Pacers the boost they needed off the bench. After playing only 17 minutes in two playoff games, he hit several clutch shots in the fourth.

Hardaway tied it at 86 on a 3-pointer with 3:40 left in regulation, and Artest followed with a left-handed layup for Indiana's first lead since the second quarter.

Walker's basket tied it at 88 with 2:01 remaining, and that would be Boston's last field goal.

Hardaway, signed in late March after working as a television analyst, hit a 3-pointer from the top of the arc that pulled Indiana within one with 6 1/2 minutes left.

Pierce followed with two jumpers, but Hardaway had an answer with a runner in the lane to get it back to three. He finished with 15 points in 27 minutes, as starting point guard Jamaal Tinsley played just three minutes in the second half.

"Tonight is what they brought me in for, the playoffs and veteran leadership," Hardaway said.

Each team missed jumpers in the final minute, and regulation ended with Artest swatting Pierce's shot out of bounds from behind.

Artest scored 10 points in the fourth quarter as the Pacers shot 75 percent (11 for 15).

They also limited Pierce, who was averaging 28 points in the series, to 3 of 10 shooting in the fourth. In the first half, he only took three shots and two of those were airballs on step-back jumpers against Artest.

"It's the same stuff he's been doing all series," Pierce said. "I can't say he's got any new tricks or anything. He's just playing straight up defense."

One for the title

UM can wrap up ECAC with win

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

It has been just five days since the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team knocked off No. 7 Syracuse, ending a 21-year drought against the Orangemen, but the Minutemen have had little time to celebrate, with a season-ending matchup on the road against conference foe Rutgers on Saturday.

"I don't think you ever will [come down from the high of beating the Orangemen], but the guys understand that they have another task at hand this weekend," UMass coach Greg Cannella said, "and that's to go down there, play Rutgers and hopefully come out on top."

The Maroon and White (12-1, 3-1 Eastern College Athletic Conference) moved up to No. 3 in the national polls this week, helped by Dartmouth's victory over then-No. 2 Princeton this past weekend.

The Scarlet Knights (9-4, 2-2 ECAC), on the other hand, have lost their last two to Georgetown and Penn State, and dropped to No. 9 in the nation.

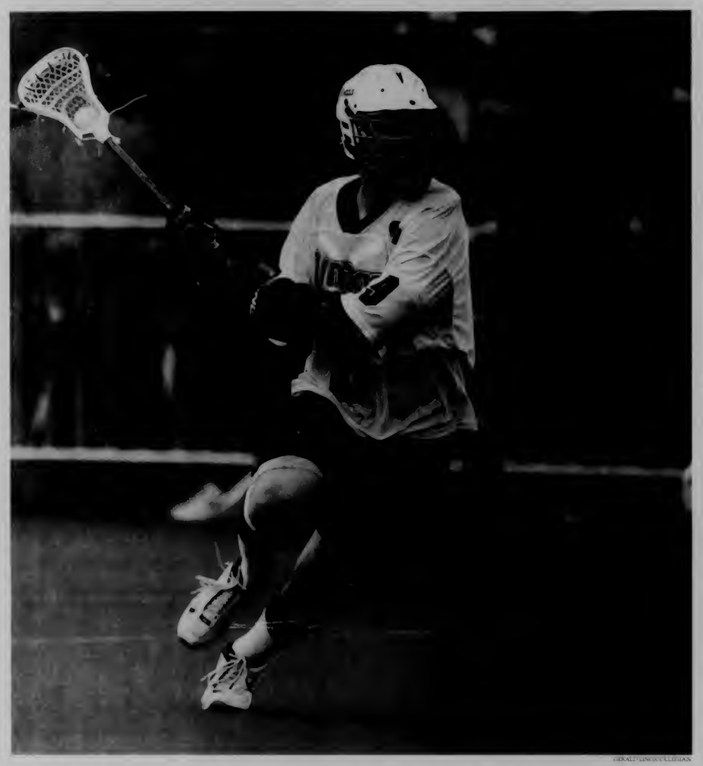
"Penn State beat us and our Georgetown game could have gone either way," Cannella said. "They're playing tough teams. They're a very good team, and they'll be ready for us."

With a victory Saturday, the Minutemen would pick up a share of the ECAC title and an automatic berth in the NCAA Tournament, though they have likely already wrapped up an at-large bid to the postseason. A victory would tie the Maroon and White with Georgetown at 4-1 in conference for first place.

"[Winning the ECAC] is very important," Cannella said. "This is one of the goals that our guys set at the beginning of the year – to win the ECAC title. We've been able to win a share of it in 2001 and win it outright in 2002, and no team has won it three years in a row since the ECAC lacrosse conference has started."

Though the Scarlet Knights have dropped consecutive contests and four of their last six, they have mixed in wins over Maryland, Baltimore County and on the road at Syracuse. According to Cannella, getting up for the game should be no problem for the home squad.

"There's a lot on the line," he said. "It's their senior day. They're going to be emotional, they're going to be fired up, ready to play for their seniors on their home field for the last time. They have a chance to beat a top quality team to get them into the NCAA Tournament, so there's really a lot on the line for this game, and there should be enough motivation for both teams."



Rutgers is led offensively by senior Jeff Duca and attackman Delby Powless, while freshman net minder Greg Havalchak has turned aside approximately 63 percent of the shots he has seen.

"Certainly they'll be aggressive," Cannella said. "They're very well coached. They'll be aggressive on loose balls and they have to play really solid defense. They have an outstanding goalie. He's having a great year, as a freshman. They're pretty similar to us."

One potential concern for the Minutemen is that this, the 14th game of the season, will be their first on natural grass in 2003. The team has been practicing all week on the Lower Boyden Fields, and according to Cannella, Rutgers has one of the finest facilities in the nation. He sees no reason to think that the grass will affect his team's play.

"What we say to our guys, we don't care if it's snowing, raining, windy, cold, hot, turf, grass – that shouldn't determine how we play," he said.

Notes: Senior midfielder Kevin Leveille was awarded the ECAC Player of the Week for his hat trick against Syracuse. It was his second such award this season, as the co-captain is second on the team with 44 points. The other co-captain, Tom Fallon, was injured for the second time this season in last week's victory. According to Cannella, the team is unsure as to how much time, if any, the senior will miss. Fallon missed 39 days with a groin injury earlier this year.

Minutemen rally past UVM

Eight-run eighth propels UMass past Catamounts

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

At the end of each season, coaches can often look back and find one game that had a lasting effect on a team's fate for one reason or another.

For Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone, Wednesday afternoon's contest with Vermont could be that game.

Trailing the Catamounts (21-9, 6-2 America East) for most of Wednesday afternoon's game, Stone watched his club exude their resiliency by responding with a furious comeback in the non-league affair.

In sending all nine men to the plate in the bottom of the eighth, the Maroon and White (15-15, 9-6 Atlantic 10) rallied for eight runs and six hits, including a towering two-run homer off the bat of sophomore Jason Twomley that proved to be the game winner in the 12-7 contest.

Vermont	7

"A win like that absolutely pumps us up," Twomley said. "We were sluggish through most of the game, but we're a team that never quits. If there's nine innings of ball to be played, we're going to play all nine innings because that's what kind of team we are."

"After [struggling over the past week] we were a little stunned," added sophomore Mike Crane, the game's starting pitcher. "But an effort like today really gets us back into things and gives us a big confidence boost."

The game did not begin as well as it ended for Crane and the Minutemen. Coming into the game with a perfect 4-0 record and considered by all but a few to be the ace of Stone's young staff, Crane was touched up for seven runs, five earned, on nine hits in five-plus innings by the Catamounts, including a pair of home runs in the fifth inning by freshmen classmates Kyle Brault and Chris Marsh.

"It's safe to say [I wasn't on my game] today," Crane said. "I wasn't hitting my spots, but picking each other up is what we're all about. If one guy can't get the job done someone else does."

Entering the game in a bases-loaded, no-out jam in the fifth, it was sophomore Anthony Gallo who got the job done. The righthander got out of the inning with only one run

Pacers send series back to 'Jungle'

By Dan Gelston
Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) – Indiana might have the momentum after a thrilling and record-setting Game 5.

Boston, however, still has history on its side.

Ron Artest had 26 points and 10 rebounds and the Pacers held the Celtics scoreless in overtime in a 93-88 victory Tuesday night.

It was the first time in modern NBA playoff history a team was held scoreless in OT. The five points by both teams were the second-fewest in an overtime in playoff history.

"It's a very tough game to win when you're trying to stay alive, but they hung in there," Pacers coach Isiah Thomas said.

The Celtics still lead the series 3-2, and only six teams have come back from 3-1 deficits – just two since 1981. Game 6 is Thursday in Boston, where the Pacers already lost twice in this series.

To advance the Pacers will have to rediscover a level of sustained success that's been missing for months. Since they were 37-15 on Feb. 14, they've had only one three-game winning streak.

Jermaine O'Neal had 19 points and a team playoff-record 22 rebounds. He just missed his second 20-20 game of the series, but scored only two points in the second half.

Antoine Walker led the Celtics with 21 points. Tony Delk had 19 and Paul Pierce 16.

"We should have closed it out today," Pierce said. "We can't give this team any more breathing room. We took our hands off the choke hold and let them breathe a little bit."

Whether fatigued or nervous, neither team got going offensively in overtime. Boston missed all six field-goal attempts and the Pacers were 1-for-10.

The difference came at the line, where Boston missed its only two attempts while the Pacers went 3-for-4. Walker missed those with 1:58 left while Artest hit the game winner with 1:08 remaining. He missed the first, but sank the second.

O'Neal added a baseline jumper after the Pacers had

Future of Phys. Ed is uncertain

By David Grant
Collegian Staff

The Dean of the School of Education, Andrew Effrat, told about 30 supporters of General Physical Education he is "cautiously pessimistic" about the future of the program last night at a meeting in the Campus Center Basement.

Linda Griffin, faculty coordinator and Iris Schneider, a coordinator, joined Effrat in an effort to communicate and address the many concerns instructors and students have over the possible elimination of the program.

"I appreciate the emails as they have shown the value of the program and how important it is to you," Effrat said, addressing the supporters. "You have made your voice heard."

But the value may come down to dollars, as the uncertainty on how big the overall budget cut will be is still in question.

"One hundred thousand dollars may not sound like a lot of money but every $100,000 adds up," Effrat said. He said he wouldn't learn about the budget until June.

Effrat told supporters that Chancellor John Lombardi would be addressing the budget cuts with the University as a whole in just a few days and opportunities for participation will be offered.

Before taking questions from students and instructors, Effrat said he hopes people appreciate the toughness of the decisions that lie ahead, calling them hard because people's lives and jobs are on the line.

One of those questions concerns the $1,000 increase in tuition for students next year. Amanda Brown, a junior nursing major and ice skating instructor who organized the meeting, asked why this money isn't being used to save programs like General Physical Education (GPE).

Effrat said while some of the revenue generated by the increase in tuition will go to pay off debt services, he certainly did not want to speak on behalf of the chancellor.

Brown then asked Effrat to address a rumor about GPE classes being moved to Continuing Education. Effrat then posed his own question.

"How do people feel about Continuing Education as a last resort if we can keep it lower than the market is?" said Effrat.

He said his staff is exploring the idea of offering the GPE classes through Continuing Education for $100 per credit. Most GPE classes are one credit.

Most GPE supporters balked at this idea, saying the whole point of the program is the peers-teaching-peers model. They also believe the costs of hiring part-time instructors would be too high.

Griffin said it's only one of a number of ideas being looked at right now. She thinks the possibility of preserving the model through Continuing Education could be done. The peer-teaching-peer model is unique to UMass.

"There's no question that we have the only program in the nation run like this," Griffin said. "All other institutions are run by part-timers."

She said her office is testing the waters but stressed the importance of the program run by students for students.

Effrat said his office is considering sending surveys out to determine if students would take GPE classes through Continuing Education.

When asked if the program cuts were all or nothing, Griffin said her office has been talking about ways to preserve some classes in the program.

"We will look at trends to determine participation rates, how facilities are used, when classes are offered and times instructors can teach," Griffin said.

She said doing this research would give her the information necessary to determine which classes are utilized the most.

Effrat admitted he has never attended a GPE class, but said he has learned a great deal about the classes through Griffin.

Katy Noone, a sophomore journalism major and swimming instructor, told Effrat the most affected students are the ones with health concerns.

"These people are going to be the most harmed," Noone said.

Meanwhile, Brown said she and the many supporters who attended the meeting are not giving up. They plan to continue to write letters, send emails and ask students to fill out surveys to prove the value of the classes.

Another idea passed among supporters was volunteering their time to call and ask for donations through the annual fund as well as a post card campaign.

Brown handed out a document listing all contact information for key decision makers both at UMass and in Boston.

Katie Grassa, a senior elementary education major who works part time in the GPE office, called for continued support for the program.

"The letters and emails are making a difference, it really does matter," Grassa said.

Powell discusses Mideast

Warns against derailing negotiations 'road map'

By Sonya Ross
Associated Press

MADRID (AP) – Secretary of State Colin Powell warned Israel and the Palestinian Authority on Thursday against letting violence "immediately contaminate the road map" toward peace that President Bush has offered.

Opening a three-day trip built around Middle East peace efforts, Powell said much work remains before Bush's goal of a Palestinian state by 2005 can be met. That work includes ending suicide bomb attacks and harsh defensive actions by Israel, he said.

"We have got to get beyond this period of suicide bombings and retaliatory actions, or other defensive actions that are taken," Powell said. "We can't let these sorts of incidents immediately contaminate the road map, or contaminate the process that we are now involved in."

A road map, or blueprint, for negotiations between the two sides was announced on Wednesday. It calls for establishment of a Palestinian state within three years, an end to violence by both the Palestinians and Israel, an immediate cease-fire and the dismantling of some Israeli settlements – along with a freeze on new construction.

"There is a significant difference now," Powell told Spanish Television TVE. "And that is that the Palestinian Authority has begun to transform itself."

The new Palestinian prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas, "has independent authority, not just authority from Arafat," he said. And while Abbas immediately condemned violence and said "we must end the terror," Arafat is a failed leader, Powell said.

Still, Powell said there were groups in the Palestinian Authority who do not want to see progress.

The proposal's announcement was followed closely by a bomb attack in Tel Aviv that killed three, and an Israeli crackdown on a Hamas stronghold in which 12 Palestinians died.

Powell urged Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Abbas, also known as Abu Mazen, to work with the United States and other international partners "to find the peaceful way forward, even when faced with these kinds of tragic scenes that we have seen in recent days."

"This is the time to redouble our efforts, and not say 'Let's not do anything,'" Powell said. "We have the tools we need to get started and we now have the international political will to get started."

Powell spoke after meeting with Spanish Foreign Minister Ana Palacio in Madrid – the place where the "road map" first began taking shape a year ago between the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia.

Later Thursday, Powell was to have dinner with Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar. He then heads to Albania on Friday and then to Syria, where he will meet with the foreign minister and President Bashar Assad. Those talks are a prelude to another Mideast journey by Powell next week for talks with Abbas and Sharon.

In Syria, Powell said he intends to take up U.S. allegations that Syria supports terrorism, the "changed strategic situation" in the Middle East now that Saddam Hussein is gone from power, and the movement of wanted Iraqi leaders across the border into Syria after war was under way in Iraq.

The fact that Syria now has a different Iraq as a neighbor, plus the road map and the new Palestinian leadership, "is a new strategic dynamic that they should consider," Powell said. He said he expects his sessions in Syria to be "rather full and candid," but he is not seeking any specific outcome.

"It's an opportunity to review where we are," Powell said.

Thursday's meetings came a day after Bush urged Israelis and Palestinians to immediately end the violence and "return to a path of peace." While Powell worked, Bush spoke by phone with Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia from Air Force One, to talk about the road map and "the importance of working with the parties for peace in the region," said White House spokesman Ari Fleischer.

Powell and Palacio discussed Spain's role in rebuilding Iraq and setting up peacekeeping functions there, as well as helping move the Middle East peace process along.

"There is now a new dynamic in that part of the world," Powell said. "And we will be working very closely with Spain as we pursue these two new dynamics."

Palacio said they also talked about NATO expansion, building up democracy in Equatorial Guinea and "the Hispanic factor" – the rise of Hispanic leaders and culture within the United States. "This is something that interests Spain a great deal," she said.

Also, Powell was questioned about the death of Spanish cameraman Jose Couso, who was killed last month when U.S. soldiers shelled a Baghdad hotel that was a media operation base. Powell called the shell attack "one of those tragic incidents of battle" and said U.S. authorities are still investigating it.

"We regret that it happened," Powell said.

Bowl Weekend kicks off in Orchard Hill

By Jesse Hirsch
Collegian Staff

The Orchard Hill Bowl Weekend kicks off tonight at 9 p.m. with a luau in the center courtyard of Orchard Hill. Running through Saturday night, this free yearly tradition will boast an open mike competition, free barbecued food and drink and much more.

The festival, which has been held for many years, has been in the planning stages since November, according to Katie Abbondanza, Lieutenant Governor of the Orchard Hill Area Government. She said that this year's event should prove to be one of the most fun yet.

Tonight's luau will feature leis for the first couple thousand attendees as well as dancing until 1 a.m. DJ Menace will provide the tunes.

Tomorrow things get going at 11 a.m., with an open microphone performance featuring residents of Orchard Hill showcasing their diverse talents. One of the highlights will be the Stage Crew Dance Team, a group that has been practicing all year in the basement of Van Meter Hall.

During the day, there will be a variety of attractions for all in attendance. A daylong free barbecue will take place, with hot dogs and hamburgers being served as well as vegetarian options like garden burgers. The Magic Bus, a real London double-decker bus serving Herrell's Ice Cream will be parked nearby during the afternoon.

For physical activity, there will be inflatable amusements as well as the ROTC rock wall. The Crafts Center will have a tie-dye station set up where people can get their cotton goods dyed for $2.

The House Council will be raffling off a DVD player among other prizes, as well as serving strawberry smoothie "mocktails." Additionally, a Bowl version of MTV's hit show Singled Out will be taking place, with two contestants being matched with people from the crowd.

At 4 p.m., the "Fill the Hill" band fest kicks off, with five bands playing for 45 minutes each, with headliner Stephen Kellogg, playing for an hour and a half. Fill the Hill will run until 11 tomorrow night, when the Orchard Hill Bowl Weekend will wind down for the year.

This year's events cost a total of around $13,000, according to Abbondanza, some of which was obtained through grants from the Arts Council and the Alumni Association. Other sponsors include Coca-Cola, which will provide all the weekend's beverages free of charge, and the Dining Commons, which will help with the barbecue.

"Everything has worked out so well, planning this and getting everything we need," Abbondanza said. "The only thing that could go wrong now is the weather. We'll have our fingers crossed."

President says 'difficult work' remains

President Bush lands in a U.S. Navy S-3B Viking on the deck of the USS Abraham Lincoln in the Pacific Ocean off the coast of California on Thursday. The S-3B Viking is dubbed Navy One because of its presidential passenger

By Scott Lindlaw
Associated Press

ABOARD THE USS ABRAHAM LINCOLN (AP) – President Bush, on an aircraft carrier homebound from the war, told the nation Thursday that "we have difficult work to do in Iraq" to rebuild the country and promote democracy – and to find Saddam Hussein and any weapons of mass destruction.

"Our coalition will stay until our work is done," the president said.

Bush flew out to the carrier on a small jet and made a screeching stop as his plane was snagged by a cable stretched across the deck. The ship was about 30 miles from San Diego. Bush, a former pilot, apparently got a turn at the controls on the way. He emerged in a flight suit and shouted to reporters, "Yes, I flew it! Of course I liked it!"

In a speech prepared to be delivered from the deck of the ship, Bush said, "We have difficult work to do in Iraq. We are bringing order to parts of that country that remain dangerous. We are pursuing and finding leaders of the old regime, who will be held to account for their crimes. We have begun the search for hidden chemical and biological weapons, and already know of hundreds of sites that will be investigated."

Bush added, "We are helping to rebuild Iraq, where the dictator built palaces for himself instead of hospitals and schools for the people. The transition from dictatorship to democracy will take time, but it is worth every effort. Our coalition will stay until our work is done."

The president sought to give the nation a close to the fighting while avoiding a sweeping claim of victory. Thursday morning brought fresh reminders that the hostilities had not ceased: Seven U.S. soldiers were wounded in a grenade attack in Fallujah, Iraq.

Moreover, central questions remain unanswered. Saddam is unaccounted for, no weapons of mass destruction have been found and there is no new evidence that Saddam's government had ties to al-Qaida.

The president cast the Iraq war as

Turkey rescuers still search for students

By James C. Helicke
Associated Press

CELTIKSUYU, Turkey (AP) – Listening for small voices, rescuers early Friday searched for dozens of children buried in the rubble of their dormitory after an earthquake struck southeastern Turkey. At least 100 people were killed and 1,000 injured.

Search teams working all day Thursday and into the early hours Friday were in contact with four of the children, state-owned TRT television reported from the scene. But there was little sign of 80 other children trapped in the collapsed four-story building.

Some of the parents were giving up hope. Cevriye Bartir, the mother of missing 13-year-old Sinan, sat on the step of a fire truck wailing, "My dead son, let me be sacrificed instead."

The 198 students in the dorm, ages 7 to 16, were asleep when the tremor hit early Thursday morning and collapsed the building. At least 21 were killed, along with a teacher. But 93 others were pulled out alive.

Steel bunk beds and steel closets helped hold up some of the walls of the school, saving many lives, rescuers said.

Soldiers, rescuers and ordinary citizens lifted huge concrete slabs with cranes and jackhammers in a search for survivors. Some just used their bare hands.

Every now and then, noisy equipment was turned off to allow rescuers to listen for voices. Dogs also sniffed for survivors.

The quake was centered just outside Bingol, a city of 250,000 in a largely rural area mostly inhabited by Kurds. The school was intended for the children of poor farmers from villages that have no schools.

Relatives rushed toward soldiers every time a rescued child was carried out on a stretcher.

"Oh my God! Oh my God! My son is lost, he is lost, he is lost! I cannot take the pain any more!" cried out Sefika Celik, whose 14-year-old son Alican was trapped in the debris.

Many students were being treated for their injuries on mattresses laid out near the flattened building. Naim Gencgul, a 15-year-old boy, was pulled out of the rubble with a broken arm.

"The whole building was on top of me. We all started screaming," he said.

In Bingol, a bridge and at least 25 buildings collapsed. Mayor Feyzullah Karaaslan said. Damage could be seen throughout the city, where the streets were filled with terrified residents.

Many said that officials had not learned any lessons from past earthquakes because shoddily constructed buildings like the dormitory were allowed to stand in the quake-prone region.

Thousands of buildings collapsed when two massive earthquakes struck western Turkey in 1999 and killed about 18,000 people.

"This building is made out of dirt," said Remzi Sonmez as he stood in front of the collapsed dormitory where his 8-year-old son Ilhami was trapped. "If they had spent more money it would not have happened. Everyone is going to die, but this shouldn't be because someone is using cheap material on our children's school."

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who traveled to the region Thursday, said about 100 people were killed in the quake. He said the government would investigate those responsible for the dormitory's construction.

"Those guilty will be prosecuted," he said.

Some Cabinet ministers said politicians had to accept part of the responsibility for the building's collapse.

"We are responsible of the deaths and we need to take measures," Culture Minister Erkan Mumcu said. "(Earthquakes) happen all around the world...but no country in the world loses as many people to quakes as Turkey."

"Our biggest mistake is that we have a very bad memory. We forget disasters easily," said Guldal Aksit, the minister responsible for family affairs.

More than 200 aftershocks hit the region, for years the scene of fierce fighting between the Turkish army and Kurdish autonomy-seeking rebels.

Doctors at Bingol's state hospital appealed for help to deal with the crisis. The hospital was damaged in the quake and scores of injured were being treated outside.

The mayor said the city also needed more large tents. The Red Crescent sent 2,100 tents, 13,000 blankets, food as well as mobile kitchens, generators, ambulances. Soldiers, emergency workers and mountaineers with rescue experience were also headed to the area.

Earthquakes are frequent in Turkey, which lies on the active North Anatolian fault. A 1971 quake in Bingol killed 900 people.

Bush discusses rebuilding Iraq

but one phase of the overall fight against terrorism. Indeed, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld announced during a visit Thursday to Afghanistan that major combat activity in that country had come to an end, long after U.S.-led forces drove the Taliban regime from power.

"From Pakistan to the Philippines to the Horn of Africa, we are hunting down al-Qaida killers," Bush said. "The liberation of Iraq is a crucial advance in the campaign against terror. We have removed an ally of al-Qaida and cut off a source of terrorist funding."

Bush spoke to Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia earlier Thursday about the road map the administration offered a day earlier for ending Israeli-Palestinian hostilities.

Bush arrived on the carrier aboard a Navy jet that landed on the deck at more than 125 miles an hour and was stopped in seconds by a stretched cable. He had crossed the country on Air Force One, exchanged his business suit and tie for a flight suit and got a refresher course on ejecting from a jet. He took his place up front in the S-3B, next to the pilot, for the flight to the carrier 150 miles off the coast of San Diego.

It was an apparent presidential first. Presidents traditionally use helicopters to visit aircraft carriers.

Bush toured the carrier's operations center, watched jets take off and met with F-18 pilots and with Capt. Kendall L. Card. After his speech, he was having dinner with about 150 enlisted sailors.

The Lincoln, which was commissioned in 1989 by Dick Cheney, then defense secretary and now the vice president, was returning from a 10-month deployment, the longest by a nuclear-powered carrier in history.

Its aircraft dropped nearly 1.2 million pounds of ordnance on Iraq, about 40 percent of the firepower that U.S. carriers and their jets rained down.

The bombs and missiles destroyed Iraqi air defense units, tanks, government and military buildings, fuel and ammunition stores, and provided cover for U.S. and British troops. White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said.

The president was spending the night in the quarters that the ship's captain usually uses when the carrier is in port.

Overnight, the carrier was heading close enough to its San Diego destination that Bush could helicopter back to land on Friday morning.

In keeping with his practice in recent weeks, Bush was using a defense contractor as the setting for a speech Friday on both national security and the economy. He was visiting the Silicon Valley offices of United Defense Industries, developer of the Bradley fighting vehicle.

The valley is on the fringe of the strongly Democratic San Francisco bay area, one of the cradles of the anti-war movement.

Later Friday, Bush was to pick up Australian Prime Minister John Howard for a weekend summit at Bush's Texas ranch. The president was swinging through Arkansas on his way back to Washington on Monday.

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, MAY 2, 2003

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Students deserve to know fate of physical education during Add/Drop

General Physical Education may be cut. It's still floating in the gray area of speculation, but rumors have surfaced and been slightly confirmed that all the classes may fall under the axe.

This gray area is where most programs, departments, majors, students and professors are residing in now. No one is certain where the proposed – and it's still just that – 20 percent budget cut Gov. Mitt Romney has placed on the table will slice deepest.

The problem this year is that rumors have surfaced with whispers of truth behind them. Phys Ed, a department that runs on a $1 million annual budget has been denied its spot on University course listings, held from SPIRE until the Add/Drop period. University officials – save the dean of the Education Department – have remained mute on the issue and the best authoritative statement, that of Dean Andrew Effrat's, has been a muddied possibility.

More than just the elimination of a department, cutting the programs takes away credit for 1,500 UMass students who take the credit-courses and more who instruct the classes for credit – including some looking to finish their tenure here with one or two credits.

And no one told the students.

Before the news surfaced on the front page of The Collegian, no one had told the students. A band of students working to find the answer has been spreading the potential news – and disappointment – around campus but even this group can't speak officially on the matter. They are stuck in the same gray area as the rest of students.

Wait and see. This is Effrat's approach and understandably so. The dean himself has no definitive answers from above, has no finite numbers or understanding of what money he'll have to work with or what constraints his department will be held to.

So throwing caution to the wind, he took his "wait and see" stance and the problem remains. When the rumor mills turn out program cuts and class eliminations those rumors spread like wildfire.

While Effrat said he will cut the entire program if there is a risk that other programs will suffer, there is also a chance that no harm will come of the GPE.

There is a chance – though seemingly slim – that Effrat will be able to preserve the basketball, aerobics and weightlifting courses the department offers.

There is a chance – though seemingly slim – that Effrat will be able to keep the department, which pays instructors by credit.

There is a chance – though seemingly slim – that the dean will be able to put all the Phys Ed. courses back on the list for add/drop next fall.

However, with seemingly slim chances for any of this happens there needs to be some official word. More than Effrat's wait and see, the students who have invested or hope to invest in the department deserve a more official answer and word from the top.

Something more than a blurred possibility.

The Dining Commons: deceit or delight?

Erika Lovley

The transition from home to college life in the dorms is always a drastic change. We are suddenly torn from our most reliable, steadfast support system. The family kitchen. There the refrigerator is always stocked, the cupboards are full of snacks, and Mom is always ready to whip you up a sandwich. Nutritionally stranded on our own for the first time in our lives, we dorm dwellers scavenge for food, subsisting on Ramen Noodles, Domino's and Pop Tarts.

Thank God for the UMass Dining Commons. A place where you can get a hot meal of waffles, pizza and ice cream, all for breakfast. This is the wonderful establishment that brings us the Grab n' Go, Restaurant Night, and free Starbucks. However, our major food source has recently been getting a bad rap. People seem to believe that with the termination of the school year comes the demise of edible DC food. Most recently criticized have been the DC hours, the food selection, and the quality of the food it serves.

Some of these complaints are hard to validate. The Food Service staff works extremely hard to provide us with a variety of hot and fresh foods 12 or more hours a day. First of all, if the quality of the food is so horrible, then why are we eating so much of it? Both girls and guys alike can be seen coming out of those buffet lines with as many as three plates of food on their trays and up to four different drinks. What are we here? Famine victims?

The setting of the dining halls is perfect. They are all in central locations, and easily accessible. Our dining halls are well lit, creatively set up, and well decorated. Who else would bring us restaurant night? We are very fortunate to be a Coke school, boasting unlimited quantities of Coke, Cherry Coke, Sprite and all the essentials.

Secondly, what other school has a dining hall where sushi, pasta, sandwiches, fast food, ice cream, and cereal bars are available around the clock? I traipsed through many different dining halls during my prep school days; some of the finest private school dining facilities, cannot not hold a candle to those at UMass.

> "It looks like the salad bar on the East side went to war with the fast food on the West side, resulting in an all out slaughter."

Some people argue that the DC hours should be adjusted. A common complaint is that the dining hall doesn't serve dinner long enough or it should be open until classes end at 10 p.m. for a late night snack. The dining room staff has lives besides serving us food 24 hours a day.

Most dining halls open at seven in the morning and close at seven or later.

If you do not have enough time to grab a full meal somewhere during that time span, there is something seriously wrong with your schedule.

The Food Service staff deserves our respect and admiration, not our ridicule and criticism. If you don't like the hot meal of the day, just smile and say "No, thank you." The cooks do not want to hear that you think their food looks disgusting.

A growing number of people have been getting up and leaving stacks of dirty dishes sitting on the tables after eating. This is not creating jobs; this is just making more things to clean up for the staff. In Franklin Dining Commons, someone has decided that it is fun to splatter the stairwells with all sorts of waffle toppings, salad dressing, ice cream, etc. This happens on a daily basis. As soon as someone cleans up this horrific mess, another appears. It looks like the salad bar on the East side went to war with the fast food on the West side, resulting in an all out slaughter. If the dining commons have to shut at 7 p.m., it's probably because they have to start cleaning up these horrendous messes.

As a community of mature, well-educated adults, it is shameful that we are treating these workers with such immature disrespect. It is time that we begin to commend the Food Service staff and give them the praise that they truly deserve.

Stupidity all around

Johnny Donalson

Stupidity. We are all victims of it. No doubt we have had that moment in our lives when a crush happens to talk to us and we end up stammering out some half-gurgled phrase of advice that we end up regretting as we say it. No doubt more than a few of us do that on a regular basis. God knows that I may be king of the absent-minded phrasing, not an hour goes by without me putting my foot and half my leg in my mouth. My mouth and my brain are connected half the time. And if it isn't vocal, we've all done something to make us look foolish in the eyes of others – spilling food upon ourselves, tripping on the stairs, failing to pay attention.

This kind of stupidity is all fine and dandy because it's a universal thing. When I make an ass of myself in front of a girl I like (a usual occurrence in my life) or anyone in general, I know I'm not the only one to have looked bad because of a momentary lapse in rational thought. I know that at sometime or another we have all been the victims of our own big, fat mouth.

This is all okay, but some stupidity is not okay. This is the kind of stupidity that makes you – well, me – want to bash my head into a brick wall. This is the kind of stupidity that makes me want to give up on humanity. This is the kind of stupidity that makes it seem like changing the Minuteman mascot is a good idea.

> "God knows that I may be king of the absent-minded phrasing; not an hour goes by without me putting my foot and half my leg in my mouth."

Oh lord, isn't there something better to worry about than whether the Minuteman is a good mascot or not? The fact that people would get offended because it isn't gender neutral worries me. Never mind the fact that the Minuteman represents a history unique to that of the Western Massachusetts area. It has "man" in the title. Oooohhh, we can't have that can we? To me, that's just more PC nonsense from running roughshod on a college campus. The Minuteman is special to our area and to our history in a way that the Grab Wolf (uhhh) will never be.

Besides, if you are going to change the name of our mascot, do so to something that actually fits our campus; the UMass Protestors, or the UMass Drinks, for example.

The Minuteman isn't the only painfully stupid item I have come across in my life. Remember "lackass?" Of course you do. Remember the 12-year-old who lit himself on fire emulating a stunt from that show? Yeah, you do. You know what? It may sound insensitive, but that kid deserved it. I knew by age five that fire was bad. By age 12 I knew not to pour gasoline on myself and then light the gas on fire. He wasn't even copying the stunt right. And the same goes for the 18-year-old guy who died falling out of a speeding truck perfecting his own "lackass" stunt. To me anyone who is dumb enough to jump off a 50-foot cliff into the ocean, or to perform any kind of extreme stunt without the proper protection deserves exactly what they get.

It's not just the big acts of moronitude (yeah, I know that isn't a real word and I don't care) that need to stop. No, it's the small things that need to stop too. Like the people who respond to opinion pieces in magazines or newspapers without getting the point, or the guys who actually take time out of their day to call the newspaper to complain about the fact that the crossword was a repeat of yesterday, as if a repeated crossword puzzle meant the end of the world.

Look people, it isn't that hard to act smart. You don't even have to be truly intelligent to act like you know how to navigate your way through life. Just stop it with the idiotic blather that turns the lives of those around into a giant headache. It's okay to say stupid stuff once in awhile, just please stop standing at every entrance to every building shoving slips of paper into people's faces. In other words, stop acting like an idiot.

Hitchhiking nowhere

Yousef Munayyer

Now that the Palestinians have selected a Prime Minister, Muhammad Abbasi (a.k.a. Abu Mazen), the road map has been revealed. It seems that not talking to Arafat worked as a wonderful delay tactic for the Bush administration to sidetrack from conflict peace talks and to deal with Iraq. However, it's time to get down to business, and frankly I do not see how this "road map" can work.

It all starts with a new Palestinian figurehead, Abu Mazen. It's not that Arafat is gone, in fact he will be right there pulling the strings, but Abu Mazen is younger, dresses in Western garb, and most importantly to the West, he isn't Yasser Arafat.

It is easy to spot someone who isn't informed on this issue because they blame Arafat for the continuation of the conflict but seem to neglect the Israeli occupation, the bulldozing, the killing of children, the closing of schools, the checkpoints and on and on. Arafat became the scapegoat. However, removing Arafat does not stop the occupation, it does not return the refugees and it does not free an oppressed population. Needless to say, Arafat has somewhat stepped aside.

So now peace can commence, right? What! Are you kidding me? Why should anyone believe that now that both sides have a script to follow that peace will show up from under Arafat's headdress (or wherever else the West claims he might be hiding it?)

These aren't new ideas either; they're basically the same ideas on paper. We tell one side to stop blowing up people and tell the other side not to retaliate disproportionately and to dismantle settlements. Brilliant! Why hasn't anyone thought of this before? Wait, they have and it didn't work then and it's not going to work now for one simple reason: it starts off at the wrong place.

> "The creation of hundreds of thousands of Palestinian refugees in 1948, in a process we would today call ethnic cleansing, has always been the root of the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians."

Arafat was not the start of the problem, and Israelis knocking down people's homes was not the start of problem. The beginning of the problem was the way in which the state of Israel was created and until that is acknowledged you can draw up as many maps as you like but you will end up going in circles.

The creation of hundreds of thousands of Palestinian refugees in 1948, in a process we would today call ethnic cleansing, has always been the root of the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians. It is the refugees of 1948 who own land, which is to this day not in their possession. It is the refugees of 1948 who lived in tents because their homes were stolen. It is the refugees of 1948 who were made refugees again and again with every Israeli incursion and house razing. And it is these very people who are being ignored in this so-called road map.

We cannot forget that Israel did not exist before 1948 and that this land was not barren. There were people there, Palestinian people, who worked the land and the ports, and worshiped in the holy sites. The Zionists that came to Palestine were overwhelmingly European. I guess the geniuses of the day in Washington and London saw no problem in creating a homogeneous mix between Europeans and native Palestinians or maybe they just didn't care.

It is imperative to understand that during the greatest era of nationalism in the Middle East, Palestine was denied sovereignty and self-determination over the land, which its people called home. It is that sovereignty that they are still struggling for today. It is that sovereignty which they have been struggling for over the past 50 years and this road map will not provide that.

Also, I get very angered when I hear people suggesting that other Arab states should assimilate Palestinians in their society and solve the problem that way. That is the most asinine argument I have ever heard. It completely stereotypes Arabs. Anyone who thinks all Arabs are the same should take a trip to Egypt, Lebanon, Morocco, and then try to make the same assertion. It would be ridiculous to ask Europe to take back all the Zionists and assimilate them there, wouldn't it?

If all works smoothly with this road map and neither side forgets its lines then it will ideally end with a Palestinian state. This does not solve the problem. This plan does not deal with the refugees. It does not deal with the theft of their land. And whatever "state" that ends up being created for the Palestinians will only be a state by name. It will most likely not have the monopoly over the legitimate use of force. That will remain with Israel. The creation of a Palestinian army is not going to be permitted. So what kind of state will the Palestinians be left with? It seems that it will be a tiny fraction of the original land with many restrictions and no freedom, is that even worth calling a state?

This road map will not work; in fact it will go down in history as yet another failed initiative from Washington (or the quartet) because it is blind to the history of the conflict. I don't know why the powers that be will not acknowledge the events of 1948. Maybe it's because they don't want to or maybe it's because they don't care but until they do, a peaceful settlement will be left behind on a part of a road they refuse to travel.

Letter to the Editor:

SCERA a positive influence on campus

To the Editor:

We of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) are writing in response to Jamie Loo's editorial printed in last Thursday's Collegian. Ms. Loo has accused SCERA of falling short of its mission to empower and advocate on behalf of UMass students. If she had only contacted our office, Ms. Loo would have learned of the many ways SCERA has advocated on behalf students at this University this past year.

In the fall of 2002, SCERA hired five new student advocates who make up the bulk of our group. Composed of nearly an entirely new staff, SCERA organized and executed a "Dorm Storm" in which our advocates created informational flyers and handouts, went door to door throughout the dorms, and mailed students voter registration forms to their local towns. The goal? Registering students to vote and informing them of the impact the November gubernatorial election would have on UMass.

Later in the semester, responding to recent assaults on campus, SCERA compiled a comprehensive public safety report comparing UMass Amherst's safety policies with those of our sister schools throughout the country. SCERA presented the report before the student government and forwarded it to several local newspapers including the Daily Collegian. Unfortunately, the Collegian did not run a story publicizing the report.

This semester SCERA led several teach-ins in conjunction with the Massachusetts Society of Professors, encouraging students to write letters in support of UMass to their senators and representatives. We prepared fact sheets, a template letter, envelopes, and even traveled to the State House in Boston with fellow UMass students to deliver the letters by hand.

Additionally, SCERA has sent out five bulk mailings to the legislature, recently one that informed representatives and senators across the state, of the number of students at this school they have in their district. Many legislatures had no idea the numbers of constituents they had that attended UMass Amherst. This was a great way to show the statewide impact UMass Amherst has.

Ms. Loo suggests in her editorial that SCERA tried to exploit RAs into funding our events. In fact, we hoped to organize a more efficient Dorm Storm focusing on writing letters to legislators. We believe working with RAs helps us reach the maximum amount of students.

Resident Assistants are supposed to hold several educationals for their residents each semester; SCERA offered to help RAs by running the educational. The only thing the RAs had to worry about was getting students to come. This is usually accomplished through incentives like food. Because RAs are obligated to organize educationals anyway, we were attempting to launch a joint venture in which SCERA would do most of the work.

We of SCERA apologize to Ms. Loo and any other student who feels uninformed about the work we do. Please understand, however, that we direct the majority of our resources to serving the students' needs and it is difficult to publicize everything we do while fulfilling this responsibility.

At a time when our campus needs to work together in fighting this 18% cut, we feel it is important that the Collegian should inform students of the good works accomplished on their behalf. We need help; we need great articles; we need a more unified student body.

The countdown continues

By Nikolas P. Markantonatos

Sunday's Spring Concert featuring 50 Cent, Reel Big Fish, Rahzel and The Cold Duck Complex sold out yesterday, according to Sarah M. Fitzgerald, production manager for University Productions and Concerts and a senior communications and marketing major.

50 Cent, who was booked before his album "Get Rich or Die Tryin'" was released Feb. 6, has proven to be a big draw as the headlining act.

Hundreds of students lined up to purchase tickets to the show when they went on sale last Friday. The 1,000 tickets that had been put aside for the general public sold out that day.

"We figured he's the hottest act right now and we thought the UMass system would enjoy him," Fitzgerald said.

Nancy Beauchamp, executive director of the Mullins Center, feels confident with the safety measures in place for the more than 10,000 students that will be in attendance for the concert.

"I am very comfortable with the way the building will be staffed," she said.

The Spring Concert lineup is formed by cost and availability of artists as well as by measuring the popularity of artists among students, according to Fitzgerald.

"We started with a list of 50 acts and investigated them and saw if any of them were a possibility," she said.

She said a survey was conducted in the Campus Center to see what students were interested in seeing. Hundreds of students responded.

"The most written in person was 50 Cent," she said.

The Cold Duck Complex will open the show at 5:30 p.m. Reel Big Fish will follow and hit the stage at 6:30. Flava Unit, a University of Massachusetts dance team, will make a transition between rock and hip-hop at 7:30. Rahzel will then perform at 8:30 followed by 50 Cent at 10, according to Fitzgerald. The times are subject to change.

Comedian Eric Nieves and DJ Menace will be entertaining the audience between set changes.

The doors will close 15 minutes after 50 Cent takes the stage, according to Fitzgerald. Although patrons can leave at any time, no reentries will be allowed.

The ubiquitous 50 Cent, who is in the middle of an extensive touring schedule, will be the musical performer on "Saturday Night Live" the night before.

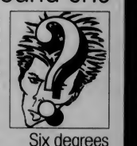
50 Cent will also be performing at Parkfest 2003 at Altamont Fairgrounds in Altamont, N.Y., sponsored by the student association at the University of Albany, earlier in the day. He is scheduled to be the last to perform at the fairground, according to Karen I. Erskine, administrative assistant at the University of Albany, although she doesn't know what time that will be. The festival ends at 7 p.m.

Despite the time schedule, Fitzgerald is confident 50 Cent will arrive on time.

"His management has assured me that he will be here earlier in the day," she said.

"Get Rich or Die Tryin'" is one of the fastest selling debuts in pop music history. The album sold in excess of 872,000 units in one week, according to SoundScan, making it the best-selling debut album since SoundScan started its tracking system in May 1991. It has gone on to sell more than four million copies.

The rapper's "New Breed" CD/DVD hybrid, released April 22, has so far sold 322,000 copies.



50 Cent's rise to fame was partially fueled by his endless string of underground mixtapes and boosted by Eminem and Dr. Dre's support (he's signed to Eminem's Shady Records and produced by Dre). He has received much attention for the nine bullet shots pocketing his frame.

Students should bring their University of Massachusetts identification cards along with their tickets to the concert at the Mullins Center on Sunday. Doors open at 5 p.m. The show is expected to end by midnight.

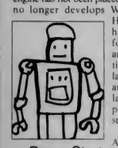
Game one, round one

Six degrees of ... ?

Jake D. Lewis

By now you know the game "Six Degrees of Kevin Bacon," but can you play it by connecting any two random actors?



The rules are the same: Connect the two actors below by no more than six degrees where each step is a link in the chain between them.

1ST PLACE - FEWEST STEPS, FASTEST TIME - 100 POINTS
2ND PLACE - FASTEST TIME ONLY - 75 POINTS
3RD PLACE - MOST CREATIVE/THEMATIC ROUTE - 50 POINTS

This game is only two rounds in length. Send your responses to Jake at collegianbacon@yahoo.com. Be sure to include your name, college, major and Y.O.G. Answers must be in by Saturday by noon.

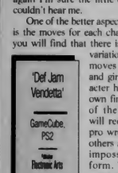
'Def Jam Vendetta:' Game lacks depth

Press Start to Play



Reid Davenport

For many pro-wrestling fans it has been years since a decent wrestling game has hit the market. World Wrestling Entertainment has only had one decent game in "Smackdown! Shut Your Mouth" and the "Legends of Wrestling" series proved to be a great disappointment to old school fans. The reason behind all of this is because the engine for wrestling games that was so popular in the Nintendo 64 titles was produced by AKI. Up until now, that engine has not been placed because AKI no longer develops WWF games. However, they have finally found a way around the big time wrestling label by using another popular group of people in rap stars.

In EA and AKI's "Def Jam Vendetta" you have the ability to use four different characters in story mode and about 30 characters for versus mode. Anyone who has ever played the wrestling titles on the N64 will know just how to handle the controls of this game. This is definitely not a game that you can get by with simple button mashing. Like other fighting games, it takes strategy and skill to beat each opponent you face.

For those looking for the same type of easy flowing story mode as the older N64 games, look somewhere else. This game is as hard as wrestling games can come. It will take you hours of frustration to get past some guys depending upon how quickly you can develop your skills. This is where you will find one of the faults in the game. There is no skill level you can change and the guys, at times, will seem nearly unbeatable. I spent a fair amount of time yelling at the television because the computer was able to block everything I had, but then again I'm sure the little digital rapper couldn't hear me.

One of the better aspects of the game is the moves for each character. While you will find that there is not a lot of variation in standard moves for the guys and girls, each character has his or her own finishers. Some of the moves you will recognize from pro wrestling, while others are physically impossible to perform. This special move system is very similar to the old system. Your character must build up his "popularity bar" and tap the taunt stick to get into his special mode. Then grapple your opponent and watch the fun.

Adding another problem with the game is the reversal system. While the computer can reverse pretty much anything you throw at it, you will find yourself lucky to reverse a tumbuckle whip. This is very frustrating to anyone who hates seeing the computer opponent getting the best of you every time. It is definitely a skill that takes hours and hours of practice to learn how to reverse each individual move.

Also, unlike the old games, there are no weapons at all. So, rappers wrestle each other without using weapons. It just makes it seem more fake than pro-wrestling really is. It takes a certain fun factor out of the game when you cannot play as Redman and take a steel chair to DMX's head over and over again. This will definitely disappoint wrestling fans who ran out and grabbed the game before reading the reviews.

The worst part of the game is the story mode. You are limited to four non-rapper guys and you would expect each guy has their own special story at least, but that's not the case. Each guy goes through the exact same storyline and they don't speak a single word during the course of the story. You go through rappers like DMX, Method Man, Redman, Ludacris, Ghostface Killah, and Scarface.

On the bright side of the game, the characters are extremely detailed and animated. Each opponent has some form of trash talk to throw at you before the match. The most amusing comments coming from Method Man and Redman, and the rappers look very much like their real life counterparts. Each rapper has a wrestling style to fit his personal tastes and features songs like DMX's "X Gonna Give It to Ya!" This game will provide a big, but beatable, challenge to pro wrestling gamers out there. If anything I'd say rent it first to see how you like it because it is definitely a desired taste. "Def Jam Vendetta" is available now for GameCube and PS2. It retails for $49.99.

The play 'The Skriker' hits Northampton this weekend with its influences from UMass

By Jesse Hirsch
Collegian Staff

The Serious Play Theater Ensemble will perform a rendition of Caryl Churchill's 1994 play, "The Skriker" this weekend in Northampton. The play, which utilizes an all-female, five-person cast, is billed as "a mixture of old myth and modern madness."

The play follows two troubled teenage women, one pregnant, the other having killed her baby, as they are plagued by ancient underworld spirits. The narrative poses an open-ended question to the audience as to whether these fairy/demons are real or just figments of the protagonists' imaginations.

What makes this work so compelling, according to Carla Tome, a University of Massachusetts student and Serious Play ensemble member, is the mythology's richness.

"I come from Venezuela, a place where you are brought up to be familiar with your mythology and legends," Tome said. "Here, I feel like we are missing the importance of mythology in our day-to-day lives."

In "The Skriker," a nightmarish blend of the real and the fantastic, the particular mythology used is a blend of many Western fairy tales and legends, according to Dan Barnes, former UMass student and co-director of the play.

Churchill, the play's author, uses these legends "to illustrate how we view that which is good or bad, what is kindness and what is nastiness, and how we expect young women to behave."

"In a time when words like 'good' and 'evil' are tossed around far too casually," Churchill points out that "nothing is black or white and things are seldom what they seem."

The Serious Play Theater Ensemble has been based in Northampton since its inception in 1992 as a two-week summer program. Originally just a theater-training program, the group has since grown to become an independent theater ensemble comprised entirely of young actors. Some of their plays in the last several years have included Shakespeare's "Titus Andronicus" and the groundbreaking "Laramie Project."

"Serious Play is ensemble-based," said ensemble member Anne-Marie Wayne, a UMass junior. "It is also community-based. This means that everything we do, we do together. There is no one costume director telling you, 'This is what you're wearing.' We all have input on every decision that is made."

In this current play, these decisions included the addition of some music by Mary J. Blige and a choreographed dance sequence to accompany it. These additions underscore the play's blending of the modern and the mythic.

"All told, the great thing about ["The Skriker"] is its strange balance," Wayne said. "It entertains, but it also makes you think. Parts will make you laugh, but parts will also make you cry. And that's what gives the play such power."

"The Skriker" will play tonight and Saturday at 8 p.m. at the Thorne's Marketplace third floor Artspace before moving onto performances next week in Boston. Admission prices are $8 for students and seniors and $12 for the general public.

Familiar foes clash today

Coaches Association annual preseason poll. They stayed in the top 20 for two more weeks after that, but stopped receiving votes after their fourth loss in five games.

This game will be played on Geasley Field at Temple, one of the former stomping grounds for UMass Coach Carrie Bolduc.

Bolduc played two years for the Owls, reaching the semifinals once before leaving after her second year to the dreaded Syracuse Orangewomen.

Today she returns to Temple as the head coach of UMass looking for a conference championship and a bid to the NCAA playoffs.

A high school All-American in 1995, Bolduc looks to lead the Minutewomen from the bench to their first A-10 title since 2000, her second year here as an assistant coach.

The Spiders have been coming on strong since their horrific season-opening homestand where they dropped three of their first four home games.

The Minutewomen, quickly rebounded after a loss to North Carolina and defeated Saint Joseph's 8-6 in overtime at Garber field. St. Joe's dropped to 4-11, and missed the playoffs.

Defending A-10 champion Temple will square off against St. Bonaventure as the No. 1 seed for the fourth year in a row. Temple has only lost one conference game in the past four years, and was perfect this year at 7-0. If the Minutewomen advance to the championship game they would play the winner of Temple/St. Bonaventure.

Notes: Kurtz, Doyle, senior Iada Emery, and sophomore Kristin St. Hilaire were named to the 16-player All-Conference team yesterday. Kurtz also was named the A-10 Defensive Player of the Year. The senior has grabbed 24 ground balls, forced 19 turnovers, and won 23 draw controls as the spotlight member of the Minutewoman defense, which is currently working at a 7.63 goals per game clip.

Celtics roll

Advance past Pacers

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – The Boston Celtics are moving on in the playoffs for the second straight year, while the Indiana Pacers couldn't make it out of the first round for the third consecutive season.

Pacers	90

Paul Pierce had 27 points and eight rebounds and Antoine Walker scored 21 Thursday night as the Celtics took a 23-point first-half lead and coasted to a 110-90 victory over the Pacers in Game 6.

The Pacers didn't get within single digits after Tony Delk's 3-pointer made it 22-10 with 4:03 left in the first quarter. They trailed by as many as 27 in the second half.

The Celtics missed the playoffs for six consecutive years before going to the Eastern Conference finals last year. To make it there again, they'll have to go through Milwaukee or New Jersey, which played later Thursday night.

Jermaine O'Neal had 25 points and 19 rebounds for Indiana before he was ejected with 3:25 left in the fourth quarter, along with Boston's Mark Blount, for a minor altercation.

Indiana has now lost in the first round three times under coach Isiah Thomas, who got little in this series from two key players – Brad Miller and Reggie Miller.

Reggie Miller, a future Hall of Famer, scored eight points on 2-for-8 shooting in what might have been his last game for the Pacers. He shot only 28 percent from the field.

Brad Miller, an All-Star, shot 0-for-4 in Game 6 and had just two points and two rebounds in 14 minutes.

Ron Artest scored 20 before fouling out late in the fourth, apparently losing a tooth on the play.

Indiana stretched the series to six games by rallying from a nine-point, fourth-quarter deficit in Game 5 to force overtime. Once there, the Pacers held the Celtics scoreless – the first time that's happened in the NBA playoffs in the shot-clock era.

The Celtics scored their first basket 50 seconds into the game, ending a scoreless streak that covered the last 2:02 of regulation and all five minutes of overtime during Game 5 in Indiana, which the Pacers won 93-88.

And they just kept scoring.

They opened a 14-4 lead and led 33-15 at the end of one, hitting 13 of 16 shots in the first quarter – 5-for-6 from 3-point range. Indiana was 6-for-27.

Tony Battie blocked two shots on one trip with 3:50 left in the first quarter. The second sprung Tony Delk for a fast-break jumper that gave Boston a 24-10 lead.

The Celtics posted a 19-5 run to open a 23-point lead, 40-17, with 10:20 left in the half, making 14 consecutive shots in the first and second quarters.

The fight for indoor

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

March 11, 2002 was a dark day for UMass Athletics. Citing budget problems, the Athletic Department cut seven varsity teams, including the men's indoor track squad.

Unlike some of the other teams that got the axe, though, the indoor runners still had a place in the sports landscape. The outdoor season survived the cuts, but now the men are working to gather enough support to bring back the indoor team.

The effort is being spearheaded by David Falvey and John O'Neil who, in addition to being members of the team, are both senators in the Student Government Association. They recently proposed a motion that would return the program, and the SGA passed it unanimously, something Falvey says never happens.

The motion, according to O'Neil, "basically puts SGA's name behind our efforts to return indoor and because the Student Senate represents the entire student body, that means they're behind us too."

"In order of most ideal, we want one; to get indoor back, two; to receive increased funding to compete in more outdoor meets, or three; to be allowed to seek our own private funding," Falvey says.

Falvey also did some research, and found that many schools in the area are struggling without indoor teams.

"I've come to a conclusion that the other athletic departments realized that without indoor there was a problem," he says, "particularly in the Northeast where weather is a huge factor. You won't find 10 teams in the Northeast without indoor. Not many runners are going to want to come here when we don't have indoor."

The runners are stressing that the lack of an indoor season puts the team at a disadvantage when the weather does finally allow them to compete outdoors.

"The indoor season's when we get all the junk out," senior Joe Gans says, "and it's hard to stay motivated when your season's so far away and you might only have a few races to look forward to."

The Atlantic 10 championships are scheduled for this weekend, and captain Ken Scheider admits that things look bleak for the team.

"Because we didn't have indoor, a lot of teams are ahead of us and it looks like we don't have a shot at winning," he says.

UMass and Duquesne are the only two schools with outdoor track teams that don't sponsor an indoor season. Duquesne's squad competes indoors as a club during the winter.

While the Minutemen remain mostly diplomatic about the events of last spring, there is still a lingering feeling of betrayal among the ranks.

"We are neglected," O'Neil says. "Try telling the basketball team that they only have four games before 4:00. It's really quite ridiculous."

Now, all the squad has to go on is defiant optimism. Says Gans: "we've made the best of it and when we succeed this week it won't be because of anything the Athletic Department did, it'll be from our hard work and dedication."

Streaking at home

UMass holds on to down Terriers

By Jeff Boyd
Collegian Staff

Boston University had its fair share of chances to end the Massachusetts softball team's home winning streak. However, a game saving double-play in the top of the seventh, followed by a game-winning RBI by Brandi Cross in the bottom of the inning extended the Maroon and White's home winning streak to 31 games with a 3-2 win yesterday.

BU	2

The Minutewomen (29-13, 9-1 Atlantic 10) found themselves in a dogfight all afternoon against the Terriers, but were able to pull out the victory thanks to a perfectly executed seventh inning. With the game tied at 2-2, senior Emily Robustelli led off the seventh with her second double of the game, and then advanced to third base on a sacrifice bunt by sophomore Hilary Puglia. Cross then drove a fly ball to right field that was deep enough to bring Robustelli home and secure a UMass victory.

After the game, UMass coach Elaine Sortino was pleased to see that her team could come through against a competitive team like BU.

"This team needed the heat of the game against an NCAA Tournament team, which I believe BU will be, and to know that we can prevail and come through," Sortino said. "I though that this was a great game. It's a tough game to lose and a great game to win."

On the mound for UMass was senior Kaila Holtz, who pitched all seven innings of the contest, scattered seven hits and allowed just one earned run while fanning eight.

The most trouble that Holtz encountered came in the top of the seventh inning when the Terriers loaded the bases with only one out. BU's Liz Alley hit a soft ground ball back to Holtz who got the force out at home. With Alley sprinting down the first base line, UMass catcher Jamie Cahalan unleashed a missile to first base to turn the double play and get the Minutewomen out of the jam.

"It felt like it was in slow motion. We practice that all of the time in practice. You can't hope for a better play than that," Holtz said. "That's exactly what you need to get out of the inning. You don't even want a strikeout at that point, you just want a double play. I couldn't have scripted it better."

Against Boston College on Tuesday, the Minutewomen struggled to put together any offense and ultimately fell to the Eagles 2-0.

BC scored its first run in the bottom of the third when Erin Mackey drove in Jennifer Ashbury who had doubled to lead off the inning.

The Minutewomen had an opportunity to put up some runs in the fifth inning when they loaded the bases with only one out. However, a move to the bullpen brought in Takae Malandris who then struck out the next two UMass batters to free the Eagles from the jam.

A solo homerun by Michelle Daily in the sixth inning added some insurance for BC, putting the Eagles up 2-0.

GERALD LINCOLN/COLLEGIAN

Maura McGarrity has scored 22 goals and four assists for the Minutewomen this season, and her 36 ground balls ties her for the team lead with Jada Emery.

Old friends to meet today

By Ari Jankelowitz
Collegian Staff

It will be a matchup of familiar foes when the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team faces the Richmond Spiders in the first round of the Atlantic 10 playoffs today.

Last year, the Minutewomen left the conference playoffs with a bitter taste in their mouth. Not only did Richmond beat the Maroon and White in the regular season, but the Spiders also ended the Minutewomen's season with a 9-5 victory in last year's first round.

This year might have a different ending, as the Minutewomen took the regular-season meeting, 11-6.

The Spiders are led by a spunky attacker in the form of Polly Purcell, although she might have to subdue herself just a bit, as she received a yellow card in the game against UMass on April 13.

Purcell is the A-10's leading scorer this year with 41 goals and 24 assists. She is teamed with Katie Dolan and Libby Berlacher to give the Spiders three players with over 40 points. Dolan has 34 goals and 10 assists and Berlacher has 34 goals and 9 assists.

UMass goalie Cyndi Doyle is the leading goalie in the conference with a 7.68 goals against average. Doyle has made 121 saves, with 106 goals allowed.

While Boston College and Connecticut provide the rivalry for most UMass teams, the women's lacrosse team looked south and found a perfect foil in Richmond.

In April's game, the Minutewomen had all but won and had possession of the ball with a little over a minute to play.

Lydia Robinson elected not to run out the clock, though. Instead, the Minutewomen's leading scorer waited until all but .2 seconds had ticked off the clock to put the ball past the Richmond goalie for a symbolic goal, a sucker punch before the bell rang.

Richmond's season was supposed to be a little bit better than 10-6 and a number three seed in the A-10's. The Spiders were picked to finish at 19th in the Intercollegiate Women's Lacrosse

BU's Wolff may lead the Rams

BOSTON (AP) – Boston University head basketball coach Dennis Wolff is among those under consideration to replace Bob Hill at Fordham, according to a published report.

Hill, a former NBA coach who last season led the Rams to their worst ever record, 2-26, was fired on Wednesday.

Wolff, 149-118 in nine seasons at BU, was on a recruiting trip in New York, and was not available for comment. His Terriers won the America East regular-season title the last two years, and went to the NIT last season.

According to Thursday's Boston Globe, citing unnamed university sources, Fordham athletic director Frank McLaughlin is expected to contact BU and seek permission to talk to Wolff.

Wolff, a 1978 University of Connecticut graduate, grew up in New York City and has maintained strong recruiting ties in the city, the Globe said.

Besides Wolff, other possible candidates for the Fordham job include assistant basketball coaches Tom Moore of UConn, Steve DeMeo of Providence and Jimmy Patsos of Maryland.

The Rams finished last season with 15 straight losses. Hill never had a winning record in four seasons at the school, going 36-78 overall.

Hill, who had six years left on his 10-year deal with Fordham, was a head coach with the Knicks, Pacers and Spurs. He most recently guided San Antonio from 1994-97, leading the Spurs to two Midwest Division championships.

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) – Iowa State basketball coach Larry Eustachy was suspended after acknowledging he is an alcoholic, and the athletic director urged the school to fire him.

Three hours after Eustachy said he has sought treatment but will not resign, athletic director Bruce Van De Velde held a news conference of his own to announce that Eustachy would be suspended with pay and should be replaced.

Baseball

PHOENIX (AP) – Four-time NL Cy Young Award winner Randy Johnson will have arthroscopic knee surgery and miss three-to-six weeks.

The Arizona left-hander, who was 24-5 last season, won his first game in three decisions Sunday after spending two weeks on the disabled list.

The operation in Phoenix will be performed to clear out debris that caused an inflammation in his right knee.

WASHINGTON (AP) – More than half a century after Jackie Robinson broke major league baseball's color barrier, Congress wants to honor him with its highest award.

Robinson, a four-sport star at UCLA, ended decades of segregation in the major leagues when he broke in April 15, 1947. He retired after 10 years, six pennants and one World Series with the Dodgers and was inducted into the Hall of Fame in 1962. He died in 1972.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. (AP) – Worried about unruly sports fans, members of a key state Senate committee voted to toughen penalties for attacks on coaches or officials, and for running onto the playing field.

The legislation followed an attack two weeks ago on an umpire at a Chicago White Sox game. A spectator ran onto the field and tackled umpire Laz Diaz, who was not injured.

Seven months earlier, Kansas City coach Tom Gamboa was attacked at a White Sox game by a spectator and his son.

Auto Racing

CONCORD, N.C. (AP) – Busch series points leader Todd Bodine secured enough financing to race Friday night in Richmond, Va.

Employer Supporting Guard and Reserves will sponsor the No. 92 Chevrolet for the next four or five events, Bodine said.

Bodine has competed all season without a sponsor for Herzog-Jackson Motorsports, partially owned by baseball Hall of Famer Reggie Jackson. Despite the lack of backing, Bodine has a victory and six top-10 finishes in 10 Busch starts.

Romney demands vote on Bulger

By Jennifer Peter
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Gov. Mitt Romney demanded an up-or-down House vote on the elimination of the University of Massachusetts president's office Thursday, declaring that he is not backing down from his showdown with former Senate President William Bulger.

A proposed amendment to the House budget plan, which is scheduled to be debated next week, would reinstate Romney's proposal to abolish the office, now held by Bulger, and dedicate the $14 million in savings to student aid.

"I want to make sure that the members of the House and the Legislature face the question of keeping the office of the UMass president," Romney said. "I don't want them to be able to duck that question. I want there to be a stark clear choice: are you in favor of spending $14 million on the president's office at UMass or do you want the money to go to students?"

If House Speaker Thomas Finneran does not allow the vote to take place during the budget debate next week, Romney said, he will definitely include the elimination of the office in his master restructuring plan, which he had originally planned to unveil Thursday.

Finneran said that he would not block the vote but predicted defeat.

"There may be some (appetite to eliminate the office) but I'm not sure that it's even close to a majority and therefore I think the president's job is probably fairly safe," Finneran said. "The position of the president of a multi-campus university seems to most members to be the appropriate structure."

Romney did not say what he would do if the House defeated the amendment.

On Wednesday, Romney said he was not likely to include the office's elimination in the master reform plan, known as Article 87, which must be accepted or rejected without amendment. This means that the Legislature's opposition to one element – such as the elimination of Bulger's office – could force the rejection of other more legislatively palatable reforms, such as the reorganization of health and human services.

Romney said he wanted to present a package that had a chance of passing. He said that he delayed submitting the Article 87 proposal, which had long been scheduled for Thursday, because of a request from Sen. Dianne Wilkerson, D-Boston, who has been conducting hearings on some of the proposals as chairwoman of the State Administration Committee.

Romney's wavering on including the UMass proposal in the reform package prompted the Boston Herald to run a blaring headline Thursday morning that said "Mitt Blinks", accompanied by pictures of Romney and Bulger.

"Let me make this very clear," Romney said Thursday. "I don't blink."

Chicana activist, editor to speak on war tonight

Elizabeth [Betita] Martinez, a leading Chicana activist for the past 40 years, will speak tonight at 7 p.m. in Thompson Hall room 102. The theme of the lecture, entitled "What is the Color of the Anti-War Movement," is the importance of building multi-racial alliances in order to strengthen the anti-war movement.

Martinez was first inspired to activism while working as a researcher for the United Nations during the 1950s. She was assigned to study the many decolonization efforts taking place at that time in countries around the world and was inspired by the successful people's movements in those newly developing countries.

During the 1960s, Martinez was an integral part of the civil rights movement in this country working for the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) as head of their New York office.

As the decade progressed, she moved on to take part in the growing Chicano land grant movement in New Mexico, which was an attempt to reclaim land taken by the U.S. during the Mexican-American War of 1846-48. There she started the movement's newspaper, El Grito del Norte.

Publishing and writing became a regular part of Martinez's activism career as she went on to publish six books, the most popular being "500 Years of Chicano History," as well as countless other publications and articles. She is a frequent contributor to Crossroads, Z and The Nation.

Most recently, she is the editor of War Times, a national bilingual newspaper, and co-founder of the Institute for Multi-Racial Justice. Started in 1997, the organization is a resource center to help build alliances among people of color in fighting white supremacy.

Moving to the San Francisco Bay Area in 1976, Martinez has been teaching women's studies and ethnic studies in the California State University system. In 1982, she ran for Governor on the Peace and Freedom Party ticket. Martinez continues her work today conducting anti-racist workshops and working with youth groups.

Martinez was originally slated to give her lecture during Umass' "Women of Color" week in March, but was involved in an auto accident right before it.

Riot results in fires, violence

'Hobart Hoedown' connected to melee

By Morris Singer
Collegian Staff

Intense rioting between students and police officers broke out late Saturday night on N. Pleasant Street near Puffton Village and Hobart Lane, resulting in fires, 45 arrests and severe property damage.

At about 11:15 p.m., a large police presence which had developed along the street attempted to break up a crowd of several hundred people, many of which gathered on the west side of North Pleasant Street near Puffton Village. Thirty Amherst Police Department (APD) officers, 12 UMass police officers and four State Police officers patrolled the streets, using shields, nightsticks and pepper spray.

Of those arrested, 28 were arrested for disorderly conduct, 11 for inciting a riot, 4 for having open containers of alcohol, 1 for driving under the influence of alcohol and 1 for assault and battery on a police officer.

The riots were connected to a large party of between 1,000 and 1,500 college-aged people that police dispersed at about 4 p.m. on Hobart Lane from the annual 'Hobart Hoedown.' According to the APD, several arrests were made, but most of the people at the party followed the officers' orders. Students said that crowds began to form later in the evening in response to the arrests.

Many students protesting police action threw glass bottles, rocks and lawn chairs at the officers, injuring 15 of them. The police countered with clubs and pepper spray. The incident remained a constant struggle between the police and the rioters for three hours with the police moving up and down the street several times.

The police used pepper spray on those on the street and sidewalks. People ran to take cover behind houses and in the bushes.

"Spray the f—ers," commanded one police officer, referring to a small group of people who would not back up after repeated requests.

The police charged at people in the street on numerous occasions. Some were thrown on the ground, others pushed and beaten with clubs. Some of those whom the police pushed to the ground were sprayed in the face with pepper spray and could not see well enough to move without the help of friends.

During one such incident, some students fled to 107 Puffton Village Drive to avoid police action. Those remaining outside of the apartment were sprayed with pepper spray by officers.

According to Eric Hamlin, who was in the apartment at the time, police took advantage of a brief moment when the front door was open to use pepper spray on those inside the apartment. Several left the building saying they felt the air outside the house was less harsh than the air inside.

Onlookers watch a 40-foot tall pine go up in flames during a riot on N. Pleasant Street Saturday night. Multiple other fires were started, including a blaze that leveled a Puffton Village Apartments bus stop.

Pablo Roskell, a junior management major who was in the house, said that the police caused the violence. He said that before the police showed up, the parties were peaceful.

"Everything was cool until the riot police came," he said. "The riot started when the riot police showed up."

A few police vehicles were damaged by the rioters who threw projectiles. Large stones smashed cruiser windows and dented the sides of the cars. A number of people who drove past the area on North Pleasant Street had their cars severely vandalized as well.

The war in Iraq had just gotten under way, and more than 2,000 people endured the chilly March weather to gather outside the Westover Air Force Base in Chicopee to protest the actions of the United States government.

Former UMass student Eric Wasileski was among those in attendance, speaking in front of the crowd before leading a number of fellow protestors in an act of civil disobedience. Along with 52 other peace activists, he was arrested and sent to jail for the second time in a few weeks.

Unlike many of the protestors at Westover, Wasileski had firsthand knowledge of war. He had served in the U.S. armed forces for six years, and had participated in "Operation Desert Fox," a bombing campaign in Iraq in 1998.

He even came from a long military legacy, as his grandfather served in World War II and his father and stepfather both parrticipated in Vietnam. His brother is currently in the air force.

Still, even though his family almost unanimously supported the war in Iraq, Wasileski has committed himself completely to the anti-war movement.

"Veterans have a special testimony to offer about peace," said Wasileski, who currently lives in Wendell, Mass. "They understand it in a different way than everyone else does."

Becoming a peace activist

Wasileski was not always against war, and did not question U.S. foreign policy when he first joined the National Guard after dropping out of high school.

Compounding the situation was that his stepfather had committed suicide when he was 15, and at that point he had no idea what to do with his life.

"I figured I needed discipline," Wasileski said. "My life was heading nowhere quick and I didn't know what to do."

After two years in the National Guard, Wasileski joined the navy so he wouldn't have to go on active duty in the infantry. For the next four and a half years, he served as a fire controlman on the U.S.S. Stoud, a destroyer, working on guidance and missile systems.

"When I served in combat, that was the beginning of the switch," Wasileski said. "I knew at that point that combat was wrong."

A woman raises her hand in the air with a peace sign during an anti-war rally on March 28 in Northampton.

Wasileski also trained with the troops on the U.S.S. Cole, and he knew many of the 17 soldiers who died as a result of the terrorist attack in Yemen on Oct. 12, 2000.

"I had a spiritual awakening," he said. "I realized my launching missiles into Iraq resulted in a hatred of America which resulted in a terrorist attack.

"I was kind of naive at the time," he added. "But I started asking questions, and American foreign policy came to light in my eyes."

Since he left the military, Wasileski has been involved in the peace movement (a term he much prefers to anti-war) for almost two years now. And last August, after spending two and a half years at Greenfield Community College and another semester at UMass-Amherst, he dif-fered his enrollment and joined Veterans for Peace, an organization dedicated to the "abolishment of war."

Thur-day he was elected to the head of the Wally Nelson Chapter of Veterans for Peace, which is based out of the Pioneer Valley. He has no plans to go back to school.

"I felt like my education was complete and I needed to act on that knowledge," Wasileski said.

GERALDYN LING/COLLEGIAN

A woman in a wheel chair carries a sign protesting war in Iraq on the Student Union steps March 25.

THE SITUATION IN IRAQ

Since tensions in Iraq began to build last October, Wasileski has been especially busy. He estimated that he has attended 60-80 rallies in that time, sometimes attending more than one rally in a single day.

He also regularly speaks in Amherst, where the anti-war movement gained a lot of momentum on the different college campuses.

When the Radical Student Union and the International Socialist Organization first founded the UMass anti-war coalition, only 50 students came to their first rally in October.

"At first we were disorganized," said Ryan Coughlin, a senior member of the Radical Student Union. "But we became a lot more structured as time went on."

By March 5, two weeks before the start of the war, a walkout was scheduled that drew 2,600 students, despite a pouring rain.

"It was our largest rally, and we only fliered for it three days in advance," Coughlin said. "There was so much energy and momentum going for it at that point. If we had sustained that amount of energy, we could have accomplished anything."

During this time, the opinions of veterans were especially powerful.

"I'm friends with a lot of the veterans for peace who turned in their stripes and are now anti-war," said Coughlin. "They are angry peace activists. It's not an abstract thing for them and they're not restrained with their emotions."

DIVERSITY OF PEOPLE AND OPINIONS

Though the anti-war movement has garnered much of the attention at UMass, there are many people in the Pioneer Valley who are not anti-war at all.

Wasileski knows this better than anyone, as his family generally supports U.S. foreign policy.

"My father thinks I'm crazy," Wasileski said, "but he is proud of me for living up to my ideals."

Wasileski's brother, who is still serving in the armed forces, also supported the war in Iraq.

"We agree to disagree cordially," Wasileski said. "He is still my brother and I still love him, but I pray that he will come to see the light."

At UMass, support-the-troops rallies have appeared sporadically. On April 2, the Republican Club joined with UMass quarterback Jeff Krohn to host a rally supporting the troops, which was attended by around 75 people. Another similar, but smaller rally, was held in February.

"On campus there has been a lot of anti-war sentiment, so we countered that with two support-your-troops rallies," said Christopher Carlozzi, the President of the Republican Club. "The difference between the anti-war rallies and our rallies is the red, white and blue."

Carlozzi also said it was impossible to be anti-war and support the troops at the same time.

"The fact of the matter is the troops have one mission," he said. "When you are telling them they are bad people ... you are slapping them in the face."

As a former troop himself, Wasileski completely disagreed.

"I was a troop – it's not possible for me to be anti-troop," Wasileski said. "(But this war) is illegal, immoral and unethical, and the best way to support the troops is to get them out of there."

In addition to fighting pro-war sentiment, the peace

Riot leads to fires, violence

As forces patrolled the street, they frequently ran after people with their nightsticks. At times they shouted threats at the crowds of people.

"The beatings are going to start," yelled one officer. "You're next gentlemen."

A police officer wearing a helmet with the number 66 yelled at a man who was walking up the street toward UMass. The man said that he was struck across the left shoulder with a nightstick.

"I'm going to f—ing smash you," the officer shouted at him as he attempted to walk away.

Many people said they were trapped in the middle of the violence, with the police actually preventing them from leaving.

"Honestly, how are we supposed to leave?" asked Melissa Harkavy, a junior sports management major. "When we do leave, they [the police] harass us."

An officer wearing a helmet with the number 28 on it stopped one woman, who appeared to be going inside a house. He lunged at her feet, bringing her to the ground. Within minutes she was arrested and taken away, all the while shouting her innocence.

A man nearby was also taken away while attempting to protest his arrest.

"I didn't do anything, sir," he said repeatedly.

His plea was ineffective.

APD reported that an unidentified college-aged male sustained a stab wound to his arm while the disturbance took place, although they said they are unsure if it is related. The matter is under investigation.

Dana Sanford, a senior political science major, was hit in the back of the head with an aluminum baseball bat during the riot, according to friends carrying him from the scene. He was brought to 1057 N. Pleasant St., where he remained until an ambulance arrived. Sanford's friends moved him to the house shortly after 12 a.m. and were protected by a police officer in the middle of the street, who put his club away after seeing the severity of the injury.

Police officers arrest two women on N. Pleasant Street Saturday night during a riot connected with the "Hobart Hoedown."

Puffton Village endured heavy property damage. The crowd set many small fires and also flipped over a car. A bus stop was burned to the ground.

Keith Hoyle, chief of the Amherst Fire Department (AFD), said that around 12:30 a.m., AFD received a call that a large pine tree was on fire at the entrance to Puffton. Rioters used a flaming couch to help build the fire.

"I received a phone call ... from one of our captains on duty advising me that things were getting out of hand," Hoyle said.

According to Hoyle, the AFD prepared for potential problems with bringing their trucks onto the scene by placing them into a designated staging area nearby. It only took a minute to respond to the flaming pine, Hoyle said. The fire was put out within the next few minutes by five firefighters.

Hoyle said the fire department had trouble moving away from N. Pleasant Street to respond to other fires because of people in the street.

"We couldn't really get off of N. Pleasant Street at all," he said. "We had one firefighter hit by a bottle."

Hoyle said the fire department responded to numerous emergencies Saturday night, both for fire and medical reasons. More than half of them were related to the riots.

Hoyle said that between 6 p.m. Saturday night and 8 a.m. Sunday morning, the AFD made 27 ambulance and fire runs.

"Seventeen of them were directly related to the Hobart Lane and Puffton situation," he said.

Shortly after 2 a.m., police had cleared the area of nearly all crowd activity and were lined across the street, allowing people to slowly return home. Smoke was still in the air, but most of the violence had stopped.

movement has also struggled to gain a diverse following.

"There was a lot more of the stereotype than not," said Coughlin. "Activists tend to be liberal, geeky, vegetarian and sometimes queer."

However, Coughlin said the anti-war movement had a much more diverse body of students than previous movements, and many students who participated were not "traditional activists."

"There was a sense of solidarity with the war going on," Coughlin added.

Felix Poon, the founding member of Asian Americans for Political Action, agreed that the war brought people together.

"Just like any other protest, it feels empowering to see thousands and millions of other people share your concerns," he said of a New York rally in February that drew tens of thousands of people on February 15. "We didn't all agree on the details, but we agreed there shouldn't be war."

Though he was happy with the diversity of opinions at the anti-war protests, Poon was not necessarily happy with the racial diversity, and called the movement "pretty white."

THE FUTURE

Now that the war in Iraq is over, the hype surrounding the anti-war movement has also lowered significantly.

"We definitely don't have the goal we had before, and that was to prevent war," Coughlin said. "We need a sustainable movement that won't taper out like this one did."

However, that does not mean Wasileski is giving up, and he expressed pride in what the peace movement was able to accomplish.

"We are using peaceful, Gandhian methods to achieve our ends, and these methods have never successfully been opposed by force," Wasileski said. "I truly believe our success is foreordained."

He also said he would continue using non-violent means of protest until the ultimate goal of world peace is accomplished.

Sunday, Wasileski spoke at the Earth Day festival in Amherst, and he plans on spending a night on the Town Common in Greenfield to raise awareness for the homeless.

After six years in the military and three years in school, he finally seems to have found his calling.

Pope visits Spain; may stop in Russia

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

MADRID, Spain (AP) – Showing unusual energy, Pope John Paul II proclaimed five new saints yesterday before a crowd of 1 million people as he urged Spaniards to remain faithful to the Roman Catholic Church.

Facing the vast crowd spread out in the form of a cross, John Paul spoke in a strong and clear voice in the major event of his weekend visit to Spain.

"Don't break with your Christian roots," the frail 82-year-old pope said during a three-hour Mass, taking up a theme he has sounded across an increasingly secular Europe.

The Spanish royal family and most members of the government attended the service, with the vast congregation filling four boulevards intersecting at Madrid's central Plaza de Colon, where a white altar was erected.

The pope sat in a special hydraulic chair on wheels that allows him to celebrate Mass without getting up. He suffers from the symptoms of Parkinson's disease – slurred speech and trembling hands – and crippling hip and knee ailments.

John Paul uses the chair in St. Peter's Basilica, but it was the first time the Vatican brought it on a foreign trip.

He held up remarkably well on his first journey abroad in nine months, the start of an ambitious travel agenda for the most traveled pope in history. In June, he is scheduled to visit Croatia – trip No. 100 – and Bosnia.

Papal spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said Sunday that "if everything goes as expected," John Paul will visit Mongolia in August and the Vatican is hoping to arrange a historic stopover in Russia en route. It would be the first papal visit to Russia ever.

The Russian Orthodox Church has been opposed to such a stop, accusing the Roman Catholic Church of seeking converts in traditionally Orthodox lands.

The earlier Madrid ceremony canonized two priests and three nuns, all 20th-century figures commemorated for their work with the poor. Giant pictures of the five hung from an office building overlooking the plaza.

One of the priests, Pedro Poveda, was assassinated in 1936 during the opening days of the Spanish Civil War.

The other four new saints are Angela de la Cruz, who founded the Sisters of the Company of the Cross; Genoveva Torres, who founded the Sisters of the Sacred Heart and of the Holy Angels; Maravillas de Jesus, who founded convents for the Order of Barefoot Carmelites; and Jose Maria Rubio, a Jesuit priest.

Queen Sofia of Spain kisses the hand of Pope John Paul II after arriving at Madrid's Barajas airport Saturday. The Pope canonized five religious figures during his two-day visit to Spain.

Iraqi remains exhumed

Mass graves dug up to identify Hussein regime victims

By Scheherezade Faramarzi
Associated Press

KHAN AL-RUBEA, Iraq (AP) – Haidar Mohammed al-Atwan was 29 years old when he was blindfolded, tied up and shot in the back of the head following a failed Shiite uprising against Saddam Hussein in 1991.

Sabah Amir Mohammed al-Tamimi was 19. So was Amna Ali.

Their remains, complete with ID cards, were dug up with the bodies of 69 others Saturday and Sunday from a shallow mass grave about 13 miles northwest of Najaf, one of Shiite Muslims' holiest cities. Bullet casings also were found in and near the graves.

Iraqis exhumed bodies with shovels and their bare hands, and they expected to find more. Others were searching the area around Najaf for additional mass grave sites they believe are in the area. At least one smaller site, guarded by U.S. Marines, turned up a few miles away.

"This is the tip of the iceberg in this country," said Marine Capt. Mike Urena. "I am sure you will find more."

More than 25 bodies were unearthed Saturday, and at least 10 had been identified, local Iraqis said. About 47 sets of remains, including those of women, were uncovered Sunday afternoon. The men and women were apparently lined up and shot.

It was unclear how many bodies were buried at the site, but several mounds were visible dotting the flat farmland – mounds that U.S. Marines said could mark additional gravesites.

"I'm looking for my relatives," said Jawad Shaker, searching the site. Another person said he was searching for a nephew who disappeared in 1991.

Human rights groups have said they believe Iraq is dotted with mass graves, many containing what they say could be victims of Saddam's various purges, retribution and crushing of any opposition to his absolute power. Access to such suspected sites was prohibited before Saddam's government fell.

"Everybody knew and could see, but they kept quiet," said Kamel al-Tamimi, a farmer. "We were told to stay away from this area, not to go near it, that it was a security zone."

The large grave being excavated Sunday, residents said, was linked to the Shiite uprising that took place after the 1991 Gulf War. Shiites seized control of most of Iraq's south, and Saddam's armed forces used helicopter gunships and tanks to defeat the lightly armed rebels.

A man searching for a loved one looks for identifying clues yesterday, as Iraqis wander through unidentified remains of dozens of people who were recently exhumed in Babylon, Iraq.

Thousands of people are believed to have been executed after the failed revolt. Shiites, a minority in the Islamic world, make up 60 percent of Iraq's Muslims and were ruled for a generation by Saddam's overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim Baath Party.

For many residents of the Najaf area, that excruciating saga of more than a decade ago is being brought home painfully now that Saddam's regime has gone and they are free to search once-forbidden parts of the landscape for their missing.

On Sunday, as five people dug away at the site, a farmer who refused to give his name said he saw people blindfolded, their hands tied behind them, and shot in the back of the head after the 1991 uprising.

A few miles away, Marines guarded another site where two bodies and four bullet casings were found. A red keffiyah was wrapped around the eyes of one skull. Some bodies – including those of al-Atwan, al-Tamimi and Ali – had identification cards in their pockets.

At the larger site, items horrifying in their ordinariness were unearthed, one by one: women's blue and black slippers; a comb; a piece of a traditional cloak; decaying gray pants; fragments of wristwatches.

Al-Atwan's remains and others found during the weekend were wrapped in white shrouds after they were dabbed in sand, a Muslim ritual. Plastic bags tied to the shrouds contained some of the dead people's belongings. Names that had been handwritten in ink on most of the identity cards had faded, though some had photos still stapled to the cards.

The Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Shiite Muslim group, was directing the excavation of the site and said it was preparing a special section of a cemetery for what it called the "Martyrs of the 1991 Uprising."

Later Sunday, the Marines handed over control of their site to the Iraqi Unity Association, led by U.S.-appointed Gov. Abdel-Monem Abboud.

Before they left, the troops barred local farmers and Supreme Council representatives from approaching the mass graves. Marine Cpl. Sean G'Meara assured onlookers that special care would be taken to ensure Muslim law is followed at the site, but many were angry nonetheless.

"Islam dictates that the remains of one person should not be mixed with those of others when they are buried. We take good care of the remains, just like they take care when they dig archaeological ruins," Abu Mujahed, a farmer, complained as he stood a few yards away from a guarded grave.

"They are not letting us see our relatives," he said. "My cousin is there. We prefer to dig them ourselves. We can identify them, from their clothes. We know how to get the remains out intact."

The Provost of the University of Massachusetts, Charlena Seymour, and the Phi Kappa Phi Chapter of this University are proud to announce the following new members invited from the Junior and Senior Classes as well as the Graduate School and approved by the Chapter in accordance with the laws of the National Society.

Phi Kappa Phi was founded in 1897 at the University of Maine and was originally named The Morrill Society, in honor of the sponsor of the Congressional act which provided for land-grant colleges and universities. In 1900 it was transformed into a national society by the Presidents of The University of Maine, The University of Tennessee, and Pennsylvania State University. The next Chapter to join was the University of Massachusetts Amherst, which remains the fourth-oldest Chapter in the United States. The society was renamed Phi Kappa Phi in 1900, from the initial letter of each Greek word forming its adopted motto: Philosopia Krateito Photon, "Let the Love of Learning Rule Humanity."

The Honor Society of Phi Kappa Phi

To be eligible for membership, Juniors and Seniors must have a GPA which places them in the top ten percent of their respective classes. Only two Graduate Students per program are nominated by their Graduate Directors.

The Phi Kappa Phi Initiation Ceremony will be held in Mahar Auditorium, on Sunday, May 18th, 2003.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Police reaction during Hoe-Down unprofessional

The Hobart Hoe-Down erupted in a way never seen before by most UMass students.

The annual party on Hobart Lane drew about 1,500 students. According to a press release from the Amherst police department, several arrests were made but the crowd was cooperative and dispersed. Later in the evening, a crowd outside of Hobart Lane and Puffton Village began throwing bottles and cans at police officers.

From here the situation escalated.

Officers continued to be hit with bottles, cans, rocks and objects such as lawn chairs. Police cruisers were damaged, a fire was set on North Pleasant street and one vehicle was overturned by the crowd. There was a total of 45 arrests for charges such as disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and driving under the influence of alcohol. Fifteen police officers were injured in the fray.

It is clear from the events that unfolded that both the police and students were responsible in some fashion. Students have no right to destroy private property, throw rocks and bottles at cars or set things on fire. The police are bound to do whatever is necessary to keep the peace in situations like these.

The result however, was unnecessary and unprofessional.

Based on the allegations that are being made by eyewitnesses and students involved, the police acted with intense force. The police attacked students with pepper spray in an unorganized frenzy. In addition to this, unnecessary threats and expletives possibly instigated students to fight back even more (many of whom were intoxicated and were already exercising decreased levels of judgment).

Armed with guns, nightsticks and pepper spray, the police clearly had an advantage over the students. With this upper hand, the police should have exercised more restraint and professionalism in dealing with this matter. Instead, the police violently assaulted students both intoxicated and innocent, both sets who were obviously bewildered and confused by these actions. Innocent bystanders, who sought help and protection from the police were met with the same treatment as partygoers, and were arrested and cuffed like criminals. Many partygoers who had nothing to do with the destruction and were trying to get out of the area were beaten with nightsticks.

These actions by the police are completely unacceptable.

It was the responsibility of the police to keep the peace this weekend, not to incite further rioting and to physically assault citizens. Admittedly, the students forced the police into a tight situation, but years of training and tactics should have helped the police control the night differently.

The Republican proletariat

Robert Carey

In this country there is a contingency of people with beliefs so cruel that they alone corrupt the laudable, though flawed, intentions of democracy. I am, of course, talking about right-wing conservatives. The ultra conservative in a three-piece su- it is exceptionally pernicious. These men are the true alpha predators in the business/political world. They are usurptious and extremely unkind.

I'd like to talk about their following, the people behind these ambitious men that give them their 'umph.' These are the blue-collar nine to fivers. They are hoi polloi, too wrapped up in blinding hyper-patriotism, and misguided religious ideology, to ever be able to discern the forest from the trees. They are hoodwinked by their superiors to believe in laws that suppress their own liberties, and push towards turning this country into an Orwellian state of control and spiritual numbness.

While they may be apt in sports trivia, the proletariat Republican is a poor historian. They believe the French owe us something for liberating them from the Germans over a half a century ago. However, this flimsy argument can be quickly put to rest with a broader look at America's brief history. For instance, would America be free had it not been for the intercession of the French during the American Revolution? Would General Cornwallis have surrendered at Yorktown to a navy-less country had It not been for the aid of French ships? The answer, in my opinion, is no. In fact if it were not for the French, America would still probably be a struggling colony in the grips of Guerilla warfare with an imperial power. Therefore because, the French liberated America, and we liberated France from Germany, then I guess that would make us even. Would it not? Oh, how quickly the minds of the mob forget the settlings of their own history. But then, of course, no nation liberates another without projecting an immediate benefit in return, so therefore this whole "you owe me because I liberated you" nonsense can be put aside.

Most of the misguided population hasn't traveled very far – generally no further than a quick excursion to Canada, or to a few random points in the lower 48. This lack of varying geographic experience allows them to stay within the confines of cultural relativism, and not question the beliefs they've been taught to take as gospel truth. For instance, many of these people believe that if someone doesn't know the language of the country they live in, then they should "get the hell out." However, if these people ever vacationed to spots outside the confines of the United States, they'd come to realize that most people know English the world over. Therefore, wouldn't it seem hypocritical to chastise the infidels of other countries for not knowing our language and when we are the infidels everyone knows ours'. How would these people react if you went up to them and told them that in other first world nations health care is actually free for all citizens. Or what would they say if you told them that not all Frenchmen are dirty swine.

These logical arguments would fall on deaf ears, because for a proletariat Republican any knowledgeable person unwilling to take part in the nationalistic frenzy praising the American government should "get the hell out" of the country. That way we can leave these poor fools to extolling Dick Cheney as a philanthropist, and to eat their "freedom fries" in peace. In this way the unrelenting light of truth would no longer sting their darkened eyes. And their false pretense of morality would go unchallenged.

This loyal mob of mediocre thinkers is not entirely without hope. They're like a young child trying to grasp the world around them on no prior knowledge. Teach them, and eventually they'll learn. In an ideal world there would be a moratorium set on voting for every citizen, until they had read certain texts, or passed certain courses. However, because this would never happen in an effective manner, I will take the liberty of making a list myself: "Good and Evil" by Fredrick Nietzsche, any political dissertation by Noam Chomsky, Thoreau's "Civil Disobedience," and Howard Zinn's "People's History of the United States." Do not consider yourself an informed voter until you have read at least one of the above-mentioned texts.

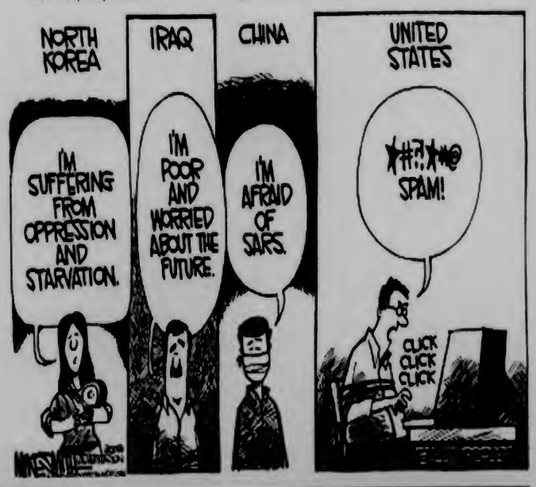
GPE important to students

Katy Noone

After a long day of economics, journalism or honors classes, teaching my intermediate swim class is just what I need. This Spring is my second semester teaching swimming for the University of Massachusetts General Physical Education Program, the only one of its kind in the United States which utilizes a peer-teaching-peer model. As a lead instructor, I have been able to observe all of the swim and water aerobics classes and have seen firsthand how beneficial physical education classes are to this campus. All of us at UMass are used to having to scramble for classes, live in dirty dorms, and learn in disintegrating classrooms. Most of us struggle to pay for tuition, room, board and fees, which will be increasing yet again next fall due to a $40 million cut to our Amherst campus. Now UMass students may have to live without Phys Ed classes as well.

Many of you probably read the front page stories in The Collegian last Thursday and Friday regarding the possible elimination of the GPE program and are aware of the effort being exercised by many individuals involved with the program to try and save it. As a student who has benefited from not only teaching two semesters of swim classes but also taking a ludo class, I know firsthand how important it is for GPE to survive yet another round of unfair budget cuts to our public school system.

I was able to participate in an informative question and answer session between the Dean of Education, GPE staff, instructors, and participants. What I heard at the meeting gave me new insight into why GPE is so important. Those of us who attended public school in Massachusetts are required to take Phys Ed classes from first grade through high school. It seems strange that while lower levels of our state's public education insists upon maintaining student health and well being, our major state university is considering eliminating an excellent physical fitness program.



Secondly, there are many individuals who take GPE classes not only as a way to earn a credit, but to help deal with health problems or minor disabilities. I have had diabetics and asthmatics in my classes that really benefited from structured, supervised swim time. Without my class, those students would have been unable to exercise or learn as much as they did throughout the semester. An additional benefit of swim classes is that they provide a basic life skill. Non-swimmers take advantage of GPE's beginner swim class and are able to learn how to gain strength and enjoy the water. Teaching someone how to perfect an advanced stroke, do a flip turn, or learn to dive is such an amazing feeling, as is teaching someone to float or to not be afraid of deep water.

"It seems strange that while lower levels of our state's public education insists upon maintaining student health and well being, our major state university is considering eliminating an excellent physical fitness program."

Aside from health concerns, it is beneficial for students to have access to the various gyms, pools and weight rooms on campus. Unlike other universities, UMass lacks an all-hours, centrally located fitness facility. Because of this, many students are unable to use the facilities due to limited availability. If GPE is eliminated, what will happen to all of the extra hours that are freed up? Will students be able to use Boyden, Totman, and Hicks more often, or will the university be forced to restrict hours even more severely? Many UMass students cannot afford area gym memberships and rely on GPE classes for their physical activity.

I love UMass because students and faculty are passionate about issues that affect them. The General Physical Education Program means a lot to me personally, and I know that it means a lot to the students in my classes, as well as those in other areas such as basketball, volleyball, and figure skating. All of us in the UMass community will be affected by this cut, and may have to look elsewhere for our physical exercise. Some things are worth fighting to save, and I think the battle to save GPE is one of those things. There will be a table in the Campus Center this week for anyone who wants to help with this cause, and of course, you can always write to the university President, Dean Effrat, or the Chancellors. And who knows? You may burn some calories in the process.

Letters to the Editor

Index will publish for last time

To the Editor:

In October of 1867 the Massachusetts Agricultural College opened its doors to students and, by the third graduating class, it had established the first yearbook in New England and the third yearbook in all 36 of the United States. One hundred and thirty four years later the Index Yearbook continues to document each academic year. It has seen the transition from "Mass Aggie" to UMass, from the Redmen to the Minutemen. It has been part of a university that is constantly expanding and constantly becoming more welcome to and tolerant of the diversity that fills its walls.

Now, however, as the 134th volume of the Index Yearbook comes to completion, we regret to inform you and, soon, the UMass community that we have no choice but to close the yearbook. While the yearbook is currently financially stable and seeks no monetary support from the university, there is and has been an undeniable lack of moral support from the administration, including the Alumni Association. In fact, the only continued support we have is from our advisor in the Campus Activities Office. We have sought for many years to gain a standing on this campus – to become a presence that the entire student body would know, but have been held back in many respects.

First is our ability to advertise to the campus. When we asked for e-mail rights to be able to send periodic messages to all students about book availability, student involvement, or senior photography sessions, we were denied. We were told that the yearbook did not "pertain to the entire student body."

Second, when the student body voted in the 2001 elections to place the Index Yearbook on senior tuition bills as a positive check off, we thought we had finally overcome one hurdle. Almost two years later this has not been added to tuition bills, and upon a follow up, we were told it had never been addressed. To my knowledge a vote passed by the student body and not addressed, or responded to, becomes policy and is automatically put into effect. We have not seen that.

Third, we have previously asked for the right to take orders for the yearbooks at the graduation ceremony, and were not granted space under the tent. Why, I might ask, does this university allow a vendor to sell class rings in this location, but not yearbooks?

When we succeeded in our fourth challenge, becoming a business, we thought that offering payroll to students would increase staff size, and the association with the Board of Businesses would allow us better advertising ability. Quickly however we were dismissed by the Center for Student Businesses because we "did not fit the idea of a student business." Most recently, although we are still on the books as a student business, we were not extended an invitation to the dinner held by the CSB.

Most interesting to our plight is that we have been told on multiple occasions that the yearbook is not an "official" university publication. I ask though, how a book published by students and for students for the past one and one third centuries can be so easily discounted.

Perhaps a valid point of interest is to mention that the University W.E.B. DuBois library currently houses 112 bound yearbooks in its archives, and considers them as part of the university's historical records. In fact, on their page they include this: "The first undergraduate yearbook was published in 1869 and described by its editors as 'a pamphlet designed to represent the internal growth and status of the College, and which we hope may prove of interest alike to members of the College and to the public.' As that interest has diminished within the administration of this university over these past 134 years, we can only conclude that that general sentiment is to cease keeping records of university life in the form of a yearbook.

The end result, of a graduating class of 4,000 students, not even 300 books have been sold for the 2003 school year. Previous years do not reflect any better sales. This cannot be explained as lack of interest, as the most common student response is "I didn't even know UMass had a yearbook." In fact, it is not uncommon for students to call five, 10, and even 60 years later to try to obtain a copy of their yearbook. We simply do not have the ability to supply books to most of these people. Thus we need the ability to get the word out. I do not have, after three years working closely with the university's yearbook, any confidence that the oldest student run organization on campus will begin to get the support and respect it deserves.

The staff of the University of Massachusetts Amherst Index Yearbook just wanted to fill you in on the tradition and history of the oldest yearbook in New England.

Unfortunately the sect members of the class of 2003, who were able to hear about the book, will be walking away with the 134th and final volume of the Index Yearbook.

Two sides of the story unheard

To the Editor:

Over the winter break, I tuned into CNN, which showed coverage from a Lebanese news channel. This station was full of half-truths, bias, and prejudice towards the western world. These same biases were shown in the article, "Hitchhiking nowhere." In this article, Yousef Munayyer chose to tell only one side, the Palestinian side of the story. He describes that London just handed over Palestine to the Jews. In reality in 1948 there was a Palestinian state and an Israeli state. A day after both states were created, five Arab nations along with Palestinians attacked the Israeli state. Now Yousef Munayyer talked of Israeli ethnic cleansing, but during this war the Arabs tried to cleanse Israel. Israel won this war, so they occupied most of the Palestinian land. If Palestine and its allies won, they would have done the same thing. It is just how war is and if the Palestinians want their land back, they should have accepted the sovereignty they had.

Yousef then went on to explain the Israeli atrocities, killing children, occupying Palestine, and creating settlements, and checkpoints. Most of these measures are for security. Frequent bombings and shootings of Israeli civilians result in necessary measures. Look at after September 11th. We tightened security as well in airports, along the borders, etc. Sometimes innocent civilians get hurt, but unlike Palestine, Israel doesn't target civilians, like exploding a bomb on a bus.

At the same time I'm not going to ignore that the Palestinians have gone through a harsh struggle and that the Israelis are pure. My main argument is that if you are going to write a story, not to use your biases and prejudices. Either state the whole truth or choose a different story.

Promising research for male contraceptives

Question: It doesn't really seem fair that contraceptives seem to be targeted mostly at women. When will men have to worry about taking a pill every day?

Response: Funny you should ask. As it turns out, there are numerous studies currently underway to develop a male oral contraceptive.

Back in 1996, an experimental birth control pill for men was tested in Italy. The pill was made up of both testosterone (primary male hormone) and progesterone (hormone commonly found in female oral contraceptives). This particular pill was tested on eight Italian men, all of which showed lower sperm counts; four of those eight dropped their sperm count to zero.

Sex-iversity

Sara Brumfield& Winnie Chen

This pill appears to be free of side effects, and researchers are also experimenting with an injection method similar to that of Depo-Provera. The injections would only be needed every few months. Just like some women can't remember to take a pill every day, some men may prefer a semi-monthly alternative as well.

A separate study was also focusing on this idea of a male injection birth control method in 1996. This particular injection is projected to be on the market by 2006. The World Health Organization claims this injection to be 99 percent effective, comparable to the female oral contraceptive pill. These injections would be scheduled weekly, as opposed to every few months. However, it isn't specified whether these are self-administered or whether a weekly doctor's visit would be necessary.

Thus far, there have been few side effects reported. Some men have reported mood changes and acne, but no serious side effects have been discovered.

In 1997, Joseph Hall of UNC-Raleigh, working with the National Science Foundation developed a sugar substance that has the possibility of fertility control. Hall describes the sugar substance as "blinding" the sperm so it was unable to recognize the egg. He has found this sugar compound to inhibit 98 percent of the enzymatic activity necessary for sperm maturation and fertility in rats.

This sugar compound has shown no side effects and does not alter the natural hormonal balance of the male rats. Hall claims this is because he has targeted the sperm in the epididymis after it has left the testes. He is continuing his research on both bulls and humans, after his wife challenged him to develop a male counterpart to the female birth control pill.

Organan, a pharmaceutical company based in the Netherlands, plans to introduce a male oral contraceptive pill to the market in 2005. They boast this pill has been found to be 100 percent effective. The main hormone in this male contraceptive pill is Desogestrel, which is commonly found in both the female contraceptive pill and male testosterone. There is no information about possible side effects.

Currently, there is a study being conducted in both the United States and Europe, originally scheduled to have concluded in 2002. Small rods containing progesterone were implanted into 120 men's arms. The progesterone is thought to block sperm production. In conjunction with this, the 120 men must also receive testosterone injections every four to six weeks to maintain "masculine characteristics."

There are concerns about marketing these new products in the United States. While sharing the responsibility of fertility control is spreading, researchers fear some men may still be hesitant to take responsibility. Researchers are trying to develop a variety of methods for men to parallel those options available to women. However, getting U.S. pharmaceutical companies interested in male contraceptives has been a challenge for the researchers developing this new technology.

Hopefully within the next few years, we will see a change in the contraceptive market, making fertility control a shared responsibility.

Stephen Lynch:

One part Jimmy Fallon-like comedic talent: Funny and entertaining

One part music strengths like John Mayer: Creative and successful

Plus some zany antics on a small Northampton stage: Priceless

By Lizzy Nielsen
Collegian Staff

Echoed laughter could be heard all over the Pioneer Valley last Thursday night when Stephen Lynch sent the packed Iron Horse into frequent frenzied hysterics.

Lynch is a singer-songwriter who hails from the Midwest. Instead perching himself on a stage and singing about lost love and loneliness, Lynch focuses on Catholic priests and getting caught masturbating by your father. Lynch has been featured on the nationally syndicated radio program "Opie and Anthony," and had his very own special on Comedy Central. He is currently on tour promoting his new live album, "Superhero."

Lynch is simply a good-looking, conservatively dressed man with a guitar at first glance. However, as soon as he opens his mouth and the hilarious and dirty lyrics about beer and the Special Olympics come out, the boy-next-door image is shattered. Thursday night was no exception. Lynch took the stage just after 10 p.m. and opened up with "Lullaby," an ode to his six-year-old daughter. Lynch's stand-up is almost as hysterical as his music, including to his intro into this particular song. After Lynch told the audience about his recent "painful" divorce, the packed house responded with laughter.

"Thank you for laughing at my pain," Lynch retorted. "Did I mention I also have lupus?"

Lynch played plenty of material off of the new album, including "Best Friends Song," "Priest" and the timely "Mother's Day." When Lynch launched into the crowd favorite, "Superhero," he sang about the traditional "Justice Man" and "Awesome Man," but invited the crowd to yell out names of whatever kinds of superhero they wanted Lynch to sing about. The mostly 18-plus crowd came up with such heroes as "Valtrex man" and "Cunnilingus Man." Much to the amusement of those in attendance, Lynch was able to create hysterical lyrics right on the spot.

As if Lynch's music wasn't funny enough, his segues between songs made the evening absolutely hilarious. In between numbers, Lynch would often poke fun at members of the audience, telling them to "stop singing along because they are ruining his music."

Midway through the show, Lynch brought up friend Mark Teich to sing with him for the remainder of the evening. Teich and Lynch have impeccable chemistry on stage, and their senses of humor complement extraordinarily well. And Teich does a mean impression of a harmonica.

Lynch's comedic timing and ability to spew out hysterical lyrics is reminiscent of an Adam Sandler or a Jimmy Fallon. What sets Lynch apart from other lyrical comedians is his vocal ability and songwriting skills. Lynch could easily have been a singer-songwriter reminiscent of a John Mayer, but his innate ability to make people laugh is something that Lynch shares with the world.

Lynch's ability to interact with his audience is unparalleled, and the intimate setting of the Iron Horse was absolutely perfect. The drunken slurs of the crowd added to the entertainment, and Lynch's quick wit always seemed to be one step ahead. Lynch's obvious musical talent and his eclectic, twisted sense of humor combined for an evening that left this critic with a sore tummy from laughing so hard.

Be mindful while talking on cell phone

There is etiquette for everything. So in order to keep the campus up to speed, the ladies of "Running with Scissors" this week tackle the subject of cell phones and electronic communication. While both the writers of this column love our cell phones and would be lost without them, we do recognize there are specific things one should and should not do with them.

Running with Scissors

Melissa Hammel & Lizzy Nielsen

CALLING AT INAPPROPRIATE TIMES

One of the best parts of owning a cell phone is the freedom to call anyone, anywhere at anytime. This however does not give you license to be a complete idiot and call at inappropriate times and places.

Would you bring your say laptop to the movie theater and use it to communicate with your friends? Obviously not. (If you said yes to that question, then you need more help than this column can provide you). Therefore, you do not need to keep your cell phone on during movies to keep your friends up to date on the important parts. The same goes for concerts. No one likes to get called up mid-show to a bunch of screeching and noise. Congrats if you managed to get the front row seats. However, if you like your friends that much, next time bring them along.

CALLING WHILE DRUNK

People have a tendency to do some fairly interesting things when they are drunk. Add a cell phone to the mix and you could have a recipe for disaster. The next day you wonder what you said on the voicemail of your crush or your worst enemy. All of us have done this at some point, and the ladies of "Running with Scissors" are no exception.

Cell phones should be like your car keys. Friends should not let their friends call drunk. Pick a person you know you can trust and allow them to hold on to your phone for the night. After all, a night cell phone-free is far less hassle than being forced to explain to the guy in your English class why there is a message on his machine describing him as "unbelievably hot."

TALKING IN YOUR CAR

Now before anyone has a panic attack, the ladies are not advocating one should retire their phone all together in the setting of an automo-

Memorable night of indie rock dazzles at Northampton's Pearl Street

By Dan Paladino

At certain points between songs, Pedro the Lion's David Bazan asked the crowd if "anybody had any questions." Rarely does a band sincerely ask its audience what's on their mind. But this is Pedro the Lion after all.

One fan asked when Pedro might be returning to Northampton, while another asked Bazan why he was playing bass guitar tonight (he is known mostly for his acoustic work). Shyly and politely answering each question, Bazan sets himself apart as a performer who actually respects and appreciates his fans. After addressing some of the questions, including bits about Mike Moore and old movies, Bazan asked, "This is a college crowd, right?" After the answer, he paused. Inquisitive bunch!" he amusingly thought aloud. With a personal connection and respect established with the on-lookers, Pedro the Lion capped off what had already been a memorable night of indie rock at Pearl Street.

Fellow Jade Tree Records label-mates, Ester Drang opened the show in spectacular fashion. The Tulsa, Oklahoma indie rock band weaves keyboards, guitar, percussion, synthesizers and computer-generated effects into musically rich atmospheric space rock. The group's somewhat lengthy and well-developed arrangements can put you in a trance, rock you out of it with loud dissonant riffs and then slow the pace once more on its way to resolution.

The sound of shimmering tambourines and acoustic chords only helped add depth to Ester Drang's music. Each song was also enhanced by singer/keyboardist Bryce Chambers' brooding, yet soothing voice. Chambers' voice rolled alongside the often-chaotic music until the tempo subsided and pace slowed to a dream-like state. If the vocals would have been turned up a bit more, the lyrics might have provided even more weight to the songs.

Throughout the set, the band remained fairly motionless, something completely acceptable for their brand of mesmerizing and abstract music. Ester Drang let their music speak for itself. It did more than speak, however. At times, the group's multi-layered songs were more akin to orchestra pieces brought to life by only five members. Their sound is reminiscent of the atmospheric and multi-faceted melodies of post-punk band, Echo and the Bunnymen, Radiohead's "Kid A" and Coldplay. Wrapping up an amazing set with their last song, "I Don't Want to Live (In a World of Infinite Keys)," Ester Drang set the stage for the evening's splendors.

Following up Ester Drang was Jetset Records indie pop quartet, The Stratford 4. From the outset, it was clear The Stratford 4 were far more pop-oriented than their opening act. Nevertheless, the band succeeded in blending a pop sound with extended solos to add texture to their songs. The group played their instruments in an invigorated and lively manner as singer Chris Streng sang with a matter-of-fact tone while jamming on guitar. Stratford's songs, usually relatively upbeat, were not simple pop tunes, however. With the help of their energetic guitarist, Jake Hosek, Stratford 4 was able to extend their normally straightforward songs into more complicated and layered works. Long overlapping guitar solos helped add depth to several songs, even if some might have been extended a bit longer than necessary.

Overall, however, the band's forays into more complicated progressions were a treat to listen to, and the growing crowd at Pearl Street seemed to be in agreement. The originally small crowd had swelled in the last hour, as fans crowded the floor, in high hopes of catching the headlining Pedro the Lion.

Alum Stephen Kellogg hits Bowl Weekend

Stephen Kellogg

For singer-songwriter Stephen Kellogg, his performance at this Saturday's "Fill the Hill" concert was a chance to relive his own college days. A rising star with local roots, Kellogg himself attended the University of Massachusetts and lived in both the Northeast and Central residential areas.

"It was great," Kellogg reflected on his time at UMass. "Not to sound boring or drab, I really felt like it was a sort of parent. You really get out of it what you put in."

It was during college that Kellogg first discovered the music scene in Northampton.

"There are so many great shows in that neck of the woods," he said. "Lots of great acts came through the Iron Horse." The Connecticut native credits the town with introducing him to an entire musical culture he hadn't known before and pointing him down a career path different from what he had previously considered.

Kellogg began to see he could do his own thing. There was no predetermined profile for musicians. "I always wanted to be a musician, and seeing shows there, I realized that I could play by myself," he said. "I didn't have to have a whole band."

In addition to performing as a solo artist and occasionally with a band, Kellogg also performs in All Stripped Down, a duo comprised of himself and Deep Banana Blackout guitarist Fuzz. Playing a mixture of Kellogg's own work, pieces from Fuzz's band and a collection of songs the two "just love to play," All Stripped Down is a more comedic show.

"We both needed an outlet," Kellogg explained. "My shows can be really serious, and Fuzz was looking for something a little pared down. It's a fun time. He's a really good friend and it's definitely me at my goofiest."

Amherst Gallery A3 gets an 'A plus'

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

Abutting the Amherst Cinema Center is Gallery A3 – one of the six art museums in downtown Amherst that participate in the Amherst Gallery Walk. Once a month under the program, galleries display new art and open their doors to the public free of charge.

This month, in the modest space inside Gallery A3, three local abstract artists are displaying and selling their work. Keith Hollingsworth, Cathy Osman and Dorothy Osterman all utilize the media of oil on canvas, but they each have unique way of creating their art.

Mr. Hollingsworth's work consists of seven diamond shaped canvases that all share a cloud-like, red base and a unique pattern on prismatic colored stripes.

"I use the prismatic colors of light as a metaphor to the dichotomy of things," Hollingworth said. "My art deals with the dimension of the here and now. It is not so much for the aesthetic pleasure of the audience – well not entirely."

Dominating the rear of the gallery was a tremendous canvas entitle "New Hope" by Ms. Osterman. Her portion of the display is composed of 14 canvases all vividly colored and textured. Her paintings convey a sense of depth and motion as well as a layered texture.

"A lot of the times, it is just working with the materials that inspires me to create the way I do," Osterman said. "Sometimes the paints will mix and create new unexpected forms. The naming of my work is done more by how the piece feels as opposed to what characters if any appear in it."

The presented work of Ms. Osman was a series of six pieces – some oil on canvas and one drawing. Her work lacked the geometric symmetries present in the other two artists' works, but her vivid use of color and Sumi-style brushwork created images that challenge and delight the eye.

"In my work, I try to achieve a sense of graphical balance," she said. "I was inspired greatly by the Japanese Sumi-style art work – not so much the specific forms, but the process of using marks to represent landscapes and objects."

All of these artists will be on display through the end of May. The other galleries in the Amherst Gallery Walk program will open their doors again to the public with new work on June 5. Until then, Alfredo's Photographic Gallery, the Burnett Gallery, the Fiber Art Center, the Mead Art Museum, the R. Michelson Galleries and Gallery A3 will show their May collections.

Pedro the Lion leads a night of indie rock is essentially singer/songwriter and guitarist David Bazan. The band performed roughly half of their songs with one another; during the other half, Bazan played acoustic guitar and remained alone on stage to sing to the attentive audience.

As a performer, Bazan is unique and memorable. He is charismatic without being showy; shy without being taciturn or anxious; and, best of all, appreciative and personable with the crowd until the last note is played.

As a singer/songwriter, Bazan is just as likeable. He exhibits a certain deliberateness and passion in his vocals. With his eyes almost always closed and his mouth barely open enough to let the words out, Bazan belts out lyrics with conviction and sincerity.

The setlist, which was composed of about 15 songs, spanned the band's discography and included a Flaming Lips cover, though much of the material came from their 2002 album, "Control." Recent songs such as "Indian Summer," "Magazine" and "Second Best" were crowd-pleasers, as were older ones such as "Of Minor Prophets and Their Prostitute Wives."

The loopy guitar work in "When They Really Get to Know You, They Will Run" was one of the band's greatest moments during the set. The best parts of many of Pedro the Lion's songs are definitely brought out with help from Bazan's bandmates. The melodies created by the group as a whole add depth to Pedro's already tightly knit songs.

As the night came to an end, Bazan thanked the audience, saying, "Thank you, I know I've said it like six times already ... but it's 'cause I really mean it."

With a musician as appreciative and talented as Bazan and Pedro the Lion, the Pearl Street crowd was just as thankful for what they had been fortunate enough to experience.

Stephen Kellogg: A booming career

makes for an experience Kellogg likened to Saturday Night Live. "We do skits," he said. "We play music, we have fun."

Over the past few years Kellogg has worked toward etching out his own musical identity. "My chief objective is to have a good time," he said. With his tremendous talent and energetic stage presence, it certainly seems like he is.

Although his comfort on stage is a natural byproduct of doing what he loves, Kellogg admits to anxiety from time to time.

"Everything we do leads up to those few minutes on stage," he said. "I want them to be the best they can possibly be. The energy seizes you when you're up there, but I definitely tell myself, 'You've got these minutes. Don't waste them'."

Another goal Kellogg has set for himself is to write truthful songs.

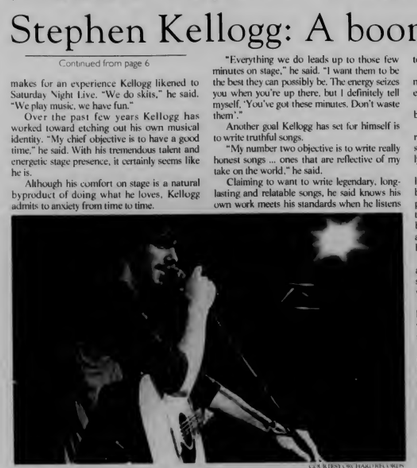
"My number two objective is to write really honest songs ... ones that are reflective of my take on the world," he said.

Claiming to want to write legendary, long-lasting and relatable songs, he said knows his own work meets his standards when he listens to it and knows he had let it all hang out.

"That's the good stuff," he said. "Maybe not legendary in the traditional sense, but legendary to your own personal history."

Though Kellogg sees his work as more lyric based, he has a difficult time categorizing it.

"I would describe [my music] as acoustic-rock centered around lyrics," he said. "It's very song based, but it's not really folk. It's definitely more rock."



His unique sound, paired with perceptive lyrics, makes Stephen Kellogg nearly impossible to categorize, but that hasn't stopped people from trying though. As male solo artists are thriving in the music business, Kellogg has been likened to performers such as John Mayer and Howie Day, though he said he doesn't believe any of them sound like him.

Although he acknowledges the positive aspect of the current popularity trend of male singer/songwriters, Kellogg sees its downfall as well.

"In some ways, it's hurting to my career because record companies are signing any guy with a guitar," Kellogg laments. And what he is doing loses a little integrity in the process.

However, Stephen Kellogg isn't worried too much about the comparisons. "You can't be anything but what you are," he said. "My attitude toward it is this: I haven't changed what I am doing. As far as the popularity of John Mayer, Howie Day, David Gray and Matt [Nathanson] goes, that's great, but I've just been doing what I'm doing. I'll keep doing it. It's great to have success because this is how I am making a living, but as long as I am playing music, I won't be disappointed."

Kellogg hit "Fill the Hill 2003" on May 3 as part of Orchard Hill Bowl Weekend.

Sincere performance helps Matt Nathanson gain a unique image

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON – Pearl Street Nightclub was the scene of a triumphant homecoming of sorts on Sunday night, as two up-and-coming musicians with regional ties reclaimed their stage. Boston-born Matt Nathanson and UMass-alum Stephen Kellogg (both who had previously played at the venue on separate occasions) wasted no time getting into the swing of things. The co-headlining performers played to a packed house, awing the crowd with their charismatic personas and unique musical styles.

April 27

First to take the stage, Kellogg was given a spirited welcome. The Northampton resident was greeted with a roar of applause. Though many in the audience were there to see Nathanson, Kellogg was not without his own faction of fans.

He unleashed a wealth of original tunes such as the clever "Southern State of Mind" and "The America Song," a poignant blend of insightful lyrics and a strong musical composition. Kellogg's sound is difficult to describe. A unique brand of folk-infused rock, his set covered the broad range of his ability as a singer, songwriter and musician.

Kellogg's voice is throaty yet understated. His music is inventive and his presence is powerful. He seemed at home on the Pearl Street stage. It was evident he was having a good time and the audience responded well with cheers.

A little over an hour later, Kellogg made his exit, only to be brought back on stage for an encore. After playing the tranquil "Pain Comes" he requested that Matt Nathanson join him for a cover of Paul Simon's "Diamonds on the Soles of Her Shoes" before clearing the stage for the evening.

Nathanson soon returned, along with cello player Matt Fish, to play his own set. Greeted with wild applause, Nathanson and Fish started out with an improvisational and humorous cover of rapper Eminem's "Lose Yourself." From there Nathanson broke out into his own original material beginning with the ethereal "First Time."

"They told me time would strip it all free, but I'm no better than when I left here the first time; I'm ready to erase this; I am ready to begin," he sang.

With this opener, he drew the crowd into the poetic world of Matt Nathanson, where they remained until the final notes of the last song, "New Coats and New Hats."

Following "First Time" with a Radiohead cover and a brief revival of the Cheap Trick's "I Want You to Want Me," the songwriter made room for some of his more moving tunes, such as the insightful "Lucky Boy." With the somber "Illusions," the crowd fell silent, allowing each note to resonate through the hall.

Standing on stage without a previously selected list of songs to perform, Nathanson shaped his set around audience requests.

"I am trying not to play what we did last night," he said. "But you guys are a really awesome crowd, and I want to play what you want to hear."

Likely Nathanson's greatest strength, this connection with his audience ultimately ensures him a place in the business after the solo-male-artist-with-an-acoustic-guitar craze fades away.

Nathanson has an inexplicable propensity for giving the audience what they want to hear. His off-the-wall sense of humor coupled with an attentiveness to the fans serves to make the show an interactive experience.

Most of Nathanson's original numbers were preceded by comedic anecdotes, providing the audience with a window into the singer/songwriters mind when he first penned them. Before breaking into a newer song, "Bent," he told of its inspiration – a girl that he and his friend both liked who became Nathanson's best friend and his buddy's girlfriend.

"At one point they broke up and she came to me all upset. I comforted her and actually wound up convincing her to take him back ... if I had only had a gun," he joked, making light of a painful experience while mimicking the loading of a revolver. Ultimately, this girl, who he had "Dawson's Creek-like fantasies" about, told Nathanson she had feelings for him just after he started dating the woman who would become he wife.

Nathanson's willingness to let a room full of strangers in on his deepest heartbreak made the crowd feel closer to the performer. Though it was only he and Matt Fish on an otherwise barren stage, this level of interaction helped create a feeling of intimacy in the club. Nathanson played with such vigor and dedication, a listener would have thought there was a full band performing.

However, for those individuals who are less than stellar drivers or for those who find multi-tasking a pain, perhaps it is time to hang up the phone until you get to your destination. In the long run, it may save you money in car insurance bills.

Havalchak holds off offense

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

PISCATAWAY, N.J. – His team was staring a three-game losing streak in the face, knowing finishing the season in that fashion would more than likely see his mates on the outside looking in at the NCAA Tournament. And he knew that his team had lost 11 in a row to the opponent it faced on Saturday.

But Rutgers goalie Greg Havalchak was far from scared. The fact that he was up against one of the nation's best offenses did not phase him. He just went in and played his game against Massachusetts. After all, it had gotten him this far – an impressive .627 save percentage and 7.43 goals against average.

"It's just how I've tried to play all season," Havalchak said. "I tried to be really consistent. We executed our game plan."

"He played well," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "He made some great saves. We shot some in his stick. He played well, he's an excellent goalie, and I thought he was probably the key to their defense today. He's got a lot of poise and composure for a young guy."

The freshman made 15 saves in his team's 12-9 victory many of them leaving the Minuteman offense speechless. But despite the fact that the Minutemen came into the game as one of the top offenses in the nation, Havalchak was none too frightened of the Maroon and White's high octane scoring ability.

"They're not that great of shooters, they just shoot a lot," he said. "We like to play defense on that, because I think those are easy to stop. I didn't expect great offense. I don't know how they're scoring 14 goals a game. I expected them to shoot more often."

UMass senior Kevin Leveille acknowledged that his team may not have been at the top of its game in terms of shooting.

"He played a good game," said Leveille, who is second on his squad in scoring this season. "We should have bore down and finished some of those shots but he played well throughout the game."

On more than one occasion, the Minutemen were left shaking their heads by Havalchak's thefts. He made several point-blank stops – including a key one early in the game on Leveille – and got his stick on a high percentage of outside chances. In the third quarter, left Zywicki took a low shot through a screen from 20 feet out, and somehow Havalchak found the ball and picked it up in his stick, leaving Zwicki only to pump his fist in aggravation.

"Within a game, he may let one or two in that he's not supposed to, but he makes the big saves," Rutgers coach Jim Stignatta said. "He's one of the big differences in the team, you have so much confidence in him when he's in the goal, and he's getting better and better. He's been at his best in big games, too."

It was not a lack of preparation that plagued the Minutemen in Saturday's contest, as according to Cannella, the Maroon and White looked at a significant amount of tape of Havalchak, and formed a game plan. Unfortunately for the Maroon and White, Havalchak was up to the task.

Havalchak came into Piscataway competing with classmate Dan Benson for the starting job. But following a season-opening overtime victory over then-No. 13 Towson, it was clear who would handle the bulk of the load for the Scarlet Knights. He made 20 saves in his first collegiate competition, and from there on in, he has been rock-solid, putting up numbers comparable to the best netminders in the nation.

"Every day he steps on the field it's new for him," Stignatta said. "The first game of the year, he steps up against Towson, one of the toughest shooting programs in the country. He's a gamer, he's better in games than he is in practice. The kid is so poised. There's no reason to think going into the playoffs that he's not going to be the same if not better."

UMass falls in NJ

That was a big part of the story in the first half, our inability to clear the ball."

Rutgers pulled away in the second quarter on five goals, including one each from Powless and Lovejoy. Rutgers was successful on nearly every clearing opportunity, and pestered the UMass defense throughout, allowing the Minutemen to break out just twice.

After going without a save in the first quarter, Schell stopped four of nine in the second, and looked overwhelmed at times with a Scarlet Knight offense that had attackers sitting untouched within 15 feet of the goal on a routine basis.

In the second, the Minutemen mustered just two goals – from left Zywicki, who notched a hat trick on an assist from Leveille, and Chris Doyle, who streaked into the offensive zone and fired a rocket from 30 feet.

The Minutemen nearly had the strangest goal of the year when Jack Reid launched a shot from his own end as time expired in the first quarter. Upon re-entry into the atmosphere, the shot landed at the goal line, and a Rutgers defender backed into the net as the ball hit the ground, nearly knocking it in.

Powless gave the Scarlet Knights a 4-3 lead at the end of the first quarter when he took a pass from Nick Schmidt and slung the ball underhand past Schell.

The teams set a furious pace early, with three goals in the first three minutes. Powless opened up the scoring when he took a feed right in front of the goal. The Toronto native faked twice, and fired past Schell from point blank range.

Zywicki evened things up just 16 seconds later, only to be countered by Schmidt, who gave the Scarlet Knights an early 2-1 lead.

Kevin Leveille and the Minutemen will host Hofstra at Garber Field in the first round of the NCAA Tournament Sunday.

coaches. The melee broke out after a close play at the plate in which Curreri threw out a runner on a disputed call.

As the runner and UMass catcher Tom Ellerbrook exchanged words, Bonnies' coach Larry Sudbrook left his dugout and approached Ellerbrook, stepping between the two players and catching the ire of Stone and his team, which emptied the benches. It was a move by Sudbrook that Stone, among others, thought was uncalled for and unprofessional.

"[Sudbrook] instigated the deal," Stone said. "It was a bang-bang play. Whether he was tagged out or safe, both sides are going to have a reaction ... it doesn't matter what happens on the field between players. However when a coach gets involved then we've got problems.

"He stepped over the line big time and I'm not surprised because he's always doing something like that. He's always instigating situations with umpires and stuff like that, and I'm not going to back down. We're not going to back down from that as a team, and he got a little bit right back in his face."

"There was a close play at home. We got the guy out and Tommy [Ellerbrook] was happy for us," Doherty added. "He was cheering because he was pumped up, and the kid thought it was directed towards him. They started to exchange words, but the worst part about it was that then their coach came out and got involved.

"As a coach you just really shouldn't do that. You let the players handle it, and you take your players and separate them if you need to. That really riled us up, so we got together and started throwing punches. The umpires tried breaking it up, but that just wasn't going to happen.

"It was a huge emotional boost. It fired coach [Stone] up, which fired us up. Sometimes you need something like that to get you going."

"[The incident] was definitely a positive for us," May added. "We lost coach [Stone] and we lost Tommy [Ellerbrook], but we were fired up and we picked up our game across the board."

"Sometimes a little scrap can really help out a ball club," Stone said. "You come together more, not that we really needed to. But that gave us the fuel to finish off the first game, and we really handled them in the second game, so that was great."

Stone and Ellerbrook were both ejected, along with Sudbrook and several unidentified Bonnies.

In the game, the score was tied at three until senior Matt Boulanger's sacrifice fly to center field drove in junior Adam Stojanowski, who had doubled, and moved to third on a ground-ball by freshman Frank Curreri.

Junior Eric Chown went the distance for the Minutemen, giving up just three runs on seven hits. He walked one and struck out four.

"Eric had great stuff," Stone said. "I think he should have trusted his breaking stuff a little more in certain situations, because it would have made things a little easier for him. But he pitched real well.

"We're definitely back on track," Doherty said. "Momentum helps when you win all week and head into the weekend and win more, it's just great. The team is up, confidence is high and our pitchers are doing well and we're swinging the bats."

The Minutemen return to action tomorrow as they will travel to Siena for a 6 p.m. home game. UMass will then be back at Earl Lorden Field when they host the Northeastern Huskies on Wednesday afternoon. First pitch is scheduled for 3 p.m.

Lately, it hasn't been as easy to win the A-10."

Programs like George Washington and Fordham have been improving considerably over the past few years, but the Minutewomen certainly weren't ready to have their winning streak snapped just yet.

"It would really, really suck if we went out there and didn't win," Taluchi said. "We were a little apprehensive going into [the race], but we went out there and did what we had to do."

Both Taluchi and Mastropolo were quick to point out the leadership they've enjoyed under Dietz, both as technician – "Jim is the best coach we could ask for." Mastropolo said. "Technically, he is unbelievable. He can make anybody row well." – and as a person – "I feel honored and privileged that I've been able to have him as a coach for the last four years," said Taluchi, who is interested in going into coaching herself after graduating in May.

Mastropolo, whose varsity eight team finished second to No. 15 Syracuse by 4.2 seconds this weekend, explained how good it feels to impress her coach.

"Seeing him happy after we do well makes it all worth it," she said. "It takes a lot for him to be happy."

After the varsity eight's best ever performance against Syracuse, Mastropolo claimed that Dietz "was so thrilled, he almost fell out of his boat.

"Those things make the early mornings and weekends away worth it."

UMass falls to Rutgers

Down to fourth place in ECAC

By ANDREW MERRITT
Collegian Staff

PISCATAWAY, N.J. – On paper, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team looked poised to win its third straight Eastern College Athletic Conference title Saturday.

On Yurcak Field, however, it looked sluggish, and nothing like the team that has averaged 12.74 goals per game this season. Rutgers, meanwhile, came out firing on all cylinders, and downed the Minutemen 12-2 (3-2 ECAC) 12-9.

Rutgers	12
UMass	9

The Scarlet Knights (10-4, 3-2 ECAC), ranked No. 8 in the latest United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association poll, rode a stellar 15-save performance by freshman goaltender Greg HavalChak, as well as three goals apiece from junior Delby Powless and sophomore Jamie Lovejoy.

"Today, we put together for most of the game, a great effort on both ends of the field," Rutgers coach Jim Stagnitta said. "If UMass has eight, nine guys on offense that can play, and we needed to be able to control tempo a little bit."

Lovejoy scored the winner for the Scarlet Knights, his second goal of the day, with 3:10 remaining in the third quarter. The 5-foot-9 midfielder quick-sticked a pass from sophomore Ted Blomquist, who was stationed behind the net.

Lovejoy added his third goal just before the horn, with a low shot that slipped between the legs of UMass goaltender Biff Schell, who made 14 saves on the day. That made the score 11-6 with one quarter left to play.

The Scarlet Knights held on to the lead throughout the fourth, despite the most inspired offense of the day from the Minutemen. The Maroon and White scored three goals in the period, including an extra-man opportunity tally from senior Kevin Leveille, who ended the day with four points (two goals, two assists).

"Anytime you lose it's no fun," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "It seemed like they wanted it a little bit more than us today. They did a good job. They had really good goalie play. They are well coached. It just wasn't in the cards for us today."

Down 9-5 at halftime, the Minutemen looked like they were on the comeback trail when Chris Fiore took a feed from Gene Tundo, and fired a 20-foot laser to score UMass' sixth goal.

The Maroon and White was shut out for the rest of the quarter though and didn't have enough to dig out of a five-goal deficit in the final stanza.

"We just didn't play our game today," Leveille said. "We never got on our tracks; we just didn't come mentally prepared."

The Minutemen were also plagued by subpar clearing efforts often allowing the Scarlet Knights back into the zone after a number of good defensive stops.

"You play defense, you play good defense, the ball goes down and you don't clear it, then you play defense again," Cannella said. "We played a lot of defense in the first half.

Chris Fiore and the Minutemen couldn't erase a 9-5 halftime deficit and suffered their second loss of the season at Rutgers Saturday.

Will host rival Hofstra in first round of NCAA

By MATT BRADY
Collegian Staff

BOYDEN HALL, ROOM 248 – After sitting through a slew of the day's baseball highlights, NBA playoff analysis and a smattering of commercials, the tension has come to a climax.

The members of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team sit in silence, awaiting the name of their opponent in the first round of the NCAA Tournament. As it is revealed, the room is filled with applause and cheers.

Hofstra.

"We've had a battle against Hofstra every time we've played," junior attackman Jeff Zywicki said. "We've got a big rivalry with them, we've got a lot of Long Island guys, and we're definitely looking forward to playing them."

The team that the Minutemen dropped earlier in the season, in their first road game, was slated for a postseason date in Amherst. The team that they have battled back and forth with season after season was coming to Garber Field.

"I guess [the rivalry] increases [the intensity] a little bit," co-captain Kevin Leveille said. "We need to focus on ourselves, mostly, and just make sure we do our things right and we'll be fine."

UMass coach Greg Cannella, too, was excited about facing the Pride in the first round, but also was aware that the team he will face on Sunday is not the team that he matched up with in March.

"They've played much better," he said. "They beat Syracuse, they beat Duke down the stretch. They lost to Towson [Saturday], but Towson needed the game a lot more than Hofstra. They're much improved. I remember having a discussion with Jon Dinowski after our game and said, 'You've got some young players there. You'll wind up in the tournament.' And he said, 'Well, I hope we both wind up in the tournament.'"

Playing Hofstra twice in a season is nothing new for the Minutemen. The two squads faced off in the regular season and playoffs both in 1993 – both losses – and in 1997, when the Minutemen lost to the then Flying Dutchmen in the regular season, but defeated them in the first round of the Tournament.

"[The tape is] already on the computer, so all we have to do is go back to the file and we'll have all our cuts. But we'll get [footage of Saturday] night's game, maybe a couple games before that."

Having another home game will be an added bonus for the seniors, who thought their careers at Garber Field had ended with an overtime win over Syracuse. Instead, the seven seniors will have a chance at NCAA greatness at their home field.

"That's awesome," Leveille said. "To play another game here at home, it's the best situation we could have I think. We thought our last game here was against 'Cuse and it was pretty emotional, but to have another one, that'll definitely fire us up."

Crew still class of A-10

By JIM PIGNATIELLO
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts crew team didn't shock anyone last week at the Atlantic 10 Championship on the Cooper River in Collingswood, N.J.

After all, all the Minutewomen did was win their eighth straight A-10 title while coach Jim Dietz was named the conference's coach of the year for the fifth time in the last eight seasons.

UMass won gold in the quad (7:55.1), lightweight eight (7:39.0), second varsity eight (7:23.6), and varsity eight (7:08.9) en route to the team title. It was the seventh time in eight championship events that the Minutewomen won the varsity eight title.

"I thought we really gave a good effort," Dietz said. "I was very pleased with our performance. We are again the class of the A-10."

Senior captain Anna Talucki has certainly enjoyed major success at A-10s. The West Chester, Pa. native has won eight gold medals at the event and likes the scoring system, which has a points system that makes the championship more team-oriented than other events.

"Each boat is worth a great deal in winning the overall," Talucki said. "This brings our whole team together."

Talucki, who was one of four seniors in the first-place varsity eight boat, has never lost a race at the A-10s.

"We've spent the past four years rowing at UMass and winning," said Talucki, who, over her career, has won four gold medals for the quad race, three for the varsity eight and one for the junior varsity eight. "It would be an absolute disaster not to win A-10s.

"We take a great deal of pride that we've won consistently in the past four years," Talucki said.

But as classmate Megan Mastopolo claimed, "The competition [within the A-10] is getting harder and harder.

"Going into A-10s two or three years ago was a cakewalk for UMass. We're expected to win A-10s every year.

Fighting for the 'W'

Baseball brawls past Bonnies

By MIKE MARZELLI
Collegian Staff

If Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone learned one thing about his players in a weekend series with Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure, it's that they are a feisty bunch.

And if he learned anything else, it's that they're also a pretty good.

The Minutemen (20-16, 12-6 A-10), fresh off a split with Big East rival Boston College on Thursday, took all three games from the Bonnies (20-18-1, 7-10 A-10) by scores of 4-3, 10-2 and 1-0, with a trio of pitchers all registering complete game efforts.

Freshman Matt Torra continued to shine on the mound as the righthander shut out St. Bonaventure 1-0. He struck out six, surrendering just three hits and walking none. The win was his fifth of the season.

The Minutemen took a 1-0 lead in the bottom of the second inning as freshman Frank Curreri drove in senior Jeff Altieri with an RBI single. Altieri had singled and then reached second as junior third baseman Matt Reynolds grounded into a fielder's choice.

In Saturday's second game, the Maroon and White received a complete game effort from sophomore southpaw Keith Doherty and a home run from senior first basemen Jeff Altieri to help erase an early 2-1 deficit and eventually prevail 10-2.

Doherty surrendered two runs on just four hits. He walked two and struck out one.

"I felt alright all game," he said. "I struggled at times, but I went to my off-speed stuff mostly to get groundballs and outs."

Senior first basemen Jeff Altieri paced the offense, as he hit what proved to be the game-winning two-run homer in the bottom of the third.

The Bonnies had jumped out to an early 2-1 lead before UMass scored 10 unanswered runs, as sophomore rightfielder Matt Boulanger and freshman catcher Frank Curreri both went three for four.

"Doherty struggled at first, but got stronger as the game went along," Stone said.

"Keith (Doherty) went out there and threw strikes and we didn't struggle," assistant coach Ernie May added. "We got over the hump allowing just one run early, we started swinging the bats and settled in real nicely."

The afternoon's first game took a backseat to a bench-clearing brawl that resulted in ejections for both

Police respond to brutality accusations

A badly damaged police cruiser sits on display in front of the Amherst Police Department Monday morning. The cruiser was vandalized during the Hobart Hoedown riot.

By MORRIS SINGER
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Police Department (APD) and the University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMDP) released a statement yesterday regarding their use of force in Saturday's riot on N. Pleasant Street. The riot, which took place in the vicinity of Puffton Village Apartments, confronted police with such dangers as glass bottles and stones flying through the air.

APD Chief Charles Scherpa said that police forces present at the riot did what was necessary to break up destructive behavior. He commended the officers whom he felt were remarkable in their efforts to control crowds.

"I'm really proud of the men and women who showed remarkable restraint in the face of bricks and rocks and glass bottles and cans coming through," he said. "Basically, they did a hell of a job in a hell of a situation and we're very proud of them."

According to Scherpa, the situation that the APD, UMPD and state police officers faced at the riots was extremely dangerous. He said that officers used the force necessary to bring the episode under control and that police faced an intimidating situation.

"You have to put yourself in that situation," he said. "It is very scary. You don't know if you're going to come out of there."

Scherpa said that a large gathering of over 1,000 individuals had gathered at Hobart Lane and was dispersed in the afternoon. By 9 p.m. the APD decided that the situation was under control.

"It was just a normal Saturday night," he said.

According to Scherpa, around 12:30 a.m. a crowd was gathering at the corner of Hobart Lane and N. Pleasant Street. Individuals then began to throw beer bottles and cans at the police, as well as move furniture into the street to build a bonfire. The police attempted to stop this process, because of prior history of a bonfire at the Hobart party, he said. This caused the crowd to erupt.

"That's when everything just kind of went loose," Scherpa said.

Romney revoking capital plan

By STEVE LEBLANC
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Gov. Mitt Romney is revoking approval of a five-year University of Massachusetts capital plan that would have funded a series of projects, including construction of a science building on the main campus in Amherst.

The decision to formally "revoke, rescind and terminate" approval of the plan follows a decision earlier in the year to halt a $371 million bond sale that would have funded the construction plan.

Gov. Jane Swift, Romney's predecessor, had approved the plan last year. But Romney's finance chief, Eric Kriss, opted to end the sale of the bonds just days before it was set to be posted.

The decision to take the additional step of revoking approval of the plan itself comes as the House of Representatives is expected to vote soon on a proposed budget amendment to abolish the office of University of Massachusetts President William Bulger and dedicate the $14 million in savings to student aid.

Romney, who supports the move, has demanded an up-or-down vote by lawmakers. House leaders are opposed to the amendment.

In a letter sent Monday to Bulger, Kriss outlined his reasons for revoking approval of the construction plan, including concerns about the projected source of funds for the five-year plan and the lack of notification by UMass officials of a change in the plan that would have emphasized spending on projects on the Boston campus.

The letter also raises concerns about the priorities of the capital plan, which includes money for dorms at the Boston campus.

"UMass should not expend its scarce resources on speculative projects before fixing existing assets," Kriss wrote. "The raising of approximately $238 million for the construction of new dormitories and a dining hall at a commuter-only campus conflicts with this reinvestment policy."

A spokeswoman for Romney declined further comment.

The decision to kill the bond sale and revoke the capital plan does serious damage to the mission of the university, according to John Hoey, a spokesman for Bulger's office.

"Our mission is to provide our students with the facilities necessary for outstanding teaching, learning and research and any further delay in providing those facilities ends up costing the commonwealth money due to delays in construction and higher interest rates," Hoey said.

The original bond sale took advantage of the lowest interest rates in 40 years he said. Hoey also said the projects were self-financing because the cost of the new dorms would be paid for with room and board fees, while the new integrated sciences building in Amherst would be paid for by university fees and federal research dollars.

Other projects included in the capital plan were: fire alarms at the Amherst campus; elevator repairs at Amherst; parking garage repairs at the Boston campus; and a parking facility in Lowell.

Hoey said failure to begin work on the Amherst sciences building was one of the most disappointing parts of the decision to kill the bond sale.

University officials hoped to make the building the "hub of life sciences in western Massachusetts and the state," he said.

"The sooner we get started on that project, the sooner we can attempt to attract private contributions," he said.

Chicana activist speaks for a coloring of the anti-war movement

By TOM BRENNAN
Collegian Staff

Leading Chicana activist, Elizabeth (Betita) Martinez, spoke last night in Thompson Hall about the lack of participation by people of color in the present day anti-war movement.

Continuing in the tradition of her widely read essay, "Where was the color in Seattle? – which tackled the issue of a lack of presence by people of color in the protests against the World Trade Organization in late 1999 – Martinez discussed the problems people of color are having with not only getting involved in an anti-war movement dominated by whites, but also the importance of understanding the connection between racist American policy abroad and at home.

"A large portion of the people organizing and leading these anti-war movements are middle and upper class whites," Martinez said. "Why aren't there more people of color involved when historically it's been shown they have more at stake?"

Martinez said that the everyday struggle of people of color just to make ends meet in the United States is one reason for lack of participation. This, she says, makes it hard to see that it is just as important to fight against America's racism elsewhere in the world as it is here at home.

According to Martinez, people of color also have more to lose when opposing government policies.

"Immigrants risk being deported," Martinez said. "People of color fear repression by the police. There's the fear of being labeled anti-American."

Basic cultural differences are also to blame, Martinez said.

"Whites may hold a meeting in a much different way than people of color," she said. "A lot of times you'll hear people of color leave a white led meeting and talk about how that meeting had a 'white style.' Among indigenous people, meetings aren't structured like a straight line. They're more of a circle discussion."

Martinez went on to say that, unfortunately, when whites do go out of their way to include people of color in social movements, their efforts are lost in tokenism. When people of color encounter this type of racism within these groups, it causes them to lose faith in their white allies.

"I'm not making a case for favoritism," Martinez said while talking of the importance of making space for people of color in the anti-war movement. "I'm just saying this so we can keep in mind the different ways to build the strongest multi-racial coalition for social justice. We need to understand the racist dynamics still present in the movement and figure out what we're going to do about it."

Martinez used Martin Luther King Jr. as an example of someone who saw the importance of linking civil rights within the United States with opposing its racist policies being imposed elsewhere in the world. Later on in his civil rights career, King was outspoken in his opposition to the Vietnam War.

"Whatever our strategy is in the future," Martinez said, "It

Tornado kills 38 people in four Midwestern states

Missouri Gov. Bob Holden surveys damage to downtown Pierce City, Mo., yesterday, after a tornado struck the town Sunday night. The tornado killed two people in Pierce City and 14 in Missouri with eight more people still missing.

By SCOTT CHARTON
Associated Press

PIERCE CITY, Mo. (AP) – Searchers using dogs and heavy equipment went from one crumbled home to another Monday after tornado-packed storms flattened communities in four Midwestern states and killed at least 38 people. Eight people were missing, all in this southwestern Missouri town.

It was "the most devastating series of tornadoes we've ever had in the state of Missouri," Gov. Bob Holden said after walking the rubble-strewn streets of Pierce City.

The storms were blamed for at least 18 deaths in Missouri, seven in Kansas and 13 in Tennessee, where a single tornado carved a 65-mile path of destruction. The storms also brought hail and heavy rain; three of the victims drowned trying to drive on a flooded road near Nashville, Tenn.

"It's worse than a nightmare," said Stacy Silverwood, whose grandparents were killed by a twister that blew part of their Camden County, Mo., house down a hill and into a pond a half-mile away.

The storms were part of a huge weather system that also spawned twisters Sunday and early Monday in Arkansas, Mississippi, Kentucky, South Dakota and Nebraska. The National Weather Service posted new tornado warnings in Kentucky and Tennessee as the storm system moved eastward.

One of the hardest hit areas was Madison County, Tenn., where 10 people were killed. In Jackson, the county seat, streets were blocked by fallen trees, twisted sheets of metal, power lines and bricks. Officials said at least 70 homes east of downtown Jackson were destroyed and streets were littered with snapped trees and utility poles.

Among the survivors in Jackson was retiree T.E. White, 69, who huddled in a closet with his three young grandchildren while a tornado ripped off the front porch and part of his roof.

"I didn't have time to be scared," White said. "When I came out and saw what happened, then I got scared."

In Pierce City, where Sunday's storms killed two people and struck nearly every home and business in the town of 1,400, Mayor Mark Peters said tornado warning sirens sounded in advance.

A hand-scrawled list on the door of City Hall listed eight townspeople as "possibly missing." Several other names had been marked through, replaced by reassuring entries about those people's whereabouts.

Officials initially feared the missing were dead in the rubble of the National Guard Armory, where several townspeople took shelter as the storm approached. Two bodies were pulled from the nearly leveled building during the night.

But after searchers accompanied by dogs dug through the debris, regional emergency official Glenn Ditmar said he was nearly certain no one else would be found. Many residents checked on their neighbors and hugged when they found each other.

Richard and Darlene Young had been talking about having a tree removed from their front yard in Pierce City when the storm struck. "Me and the wife and the little dog got in the bedroom closet," Richard Young said. When the Youngs emerged, they found that tree was unharmed, but it had been joined in their yard by the bell tower from the neighboring First Congregational Church.

In Jackson, a tornado warning was issued 22 minutes before the twister hit. That gave lawyer Joe Byrd and law clerk Jen Free plenty of time to get from his office to a concrete storage area in the basement.

"It's like downtown Baghdad," Byrd said of the destruction he found when they emerged from the shelter. Free, 24, said she ran to a nearby hotel to help get the elderly out of their apartments.

"I was knocking on doors, yelling to everyone they needed to get out," Free said. "They were walking down the stairs holding hands and being amazingly calm."

In Kansas, 80 homes were damaged or destroyed in Crawford County, at least 20 of them in the Franklin area.

During a press conference yesterday morning, Amherst Police Chief Charles Scherpa reacts to a reporter's claim.

Police respond to accusations

APD police estimate between $17 thousand and $18 thousand in damages to their cruisers, which sustained impact from several rocks and bottles. UMPD is unsure of how much the damage to their vehicles will cost to repair.

One Hobart resident said the disruption from this party is a yearly occurrence. The situation made it impossible for her to move her car off the street, starting at around 2 p.m., she said.

"[Each year] I've been trapped at one end or the other, with all the frustration, the risk and the fear."

Many of those partying felt that the police acted irresponsibly and unprofessionally, even in the face of a crowd of what police estimate to be around 2,000 people.

Jessica Lilly, a sophomore communications major said an officer turned to the side and pushed her into the bushes with his shield, even though she was not in their direct path.

"It was uncalled for," she said.

Christopher P. Meoli, a junior majoring in German and Italian studies, said police tackled him shortly after he politely asked some officers about placing hazard cones or flares in the street. There was a Ford Explorer parked with its lights off beside some rubble, which Meoli guessed was what remained of the Puffton bus stop after it burned down. According to Meoli, shortly after he spoke with the officers, who he said swore at him, he was chased on foot and tackled by four of them. He was then arrested and taken away. Erin McCabe, a girl with whom he was walking during the incident, confirmed the story.

Scherpa said those involved in the riot know they are responsible for what they have done. They are not hardened criminals and know responsibility, he said.

"I'm sure that the vast majority of them are looking back now, and they might be smiling but deep down inside they know that they were wrong."

UMass Police Department hosts glass-etching program today

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

As part of a joint effort with the Governor's Auto Theft Strike Force, the University of Massachusetts Police Department will host a glass-etching program tomorrow from 8 a.m. to 2 p.m. at the Mullins Center loading dock.

The initiative is designed to protect against theft and provide vehicle owners with a discount of up to 15 percent on their comprehensive automotive insurance.

"By permanently etching the Vehicle Identification Number (VIN) into the window glass of your vehicle, it is less likely to be stolen," said Officer Mark Wesoloski. "Thieves are less likely to steal an easily identified vehicle because more time, money and effort would need to be spent in replacing the VIN marked windows."

The chemically stamped numbers may not appear to be much – embedded into your windshield, they'll be invisible to the naked eye – but the sum total, says Wesoloski, could prove to be a substantial savings for vehicle owners in the long run.

"Most insurance companies are so certain that VIN etching will lower the chance of theft and save money, they offer [the] discount," said Wesoloski. "I think [that would be] the big selling point for many students, staff and faculty...also, this could save a lot of money and aggravation that accompanies the theft of your car to a professional thief."

The new initiative is the renewal of a prior on-campus relationship with the Auto Theft Strike Force that "was a great success," according to Wesoloski.

Each VIN is unique to its specific vehicle, and takes approximately 10 minutes to etch into the windshield. Wesoloski said that, as an added protective measure, a warning label is also applied to the inside of the driver's window, alerting potential thieves that it has been marked for identification.

VIN stamping began in the mid-1950's as a means of accurately accounting for individual car pieces when mass production numbers began to rise. In the early 80s, the National highway Traffic Safety Administration (U.S. Dept. of Transport) required that all road vehicles must contain a 17 character VIN, designed to mark their heritage and now commonly used to track recalls, registrations and warranty claims.

The department issued follow-up standards as further preventative measures beginning in 1987, requiring high theft models to have at least 12-14 of their major components tagged. The standard was adjusted in 1994 to include multi-purpose passenger vehicles and light duty trucks, and updated again in 1997 to encompass a wider breadth of component parts.

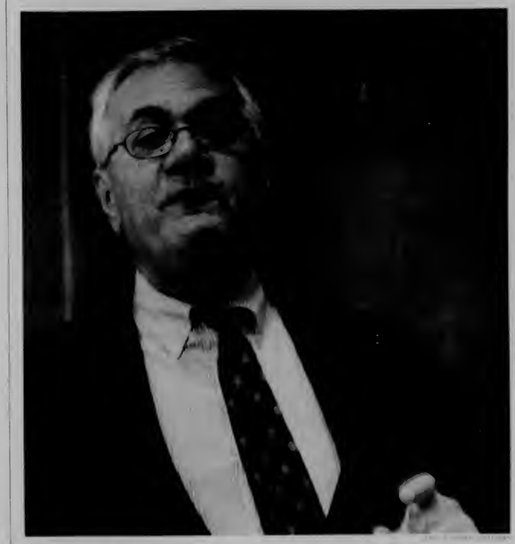
has to include people of color and speak to their needs. It has to incorporate their perspective and bring awareness to the correlation between U.S. foreign and domestic policy."

Martinez discussed the importance of building a grassroots base and remaining consistent in staying united on all relevant issues concerning social justice.

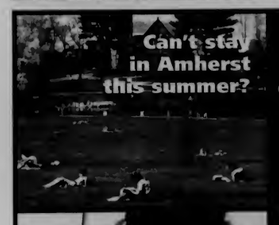


"The enemy is creative and sophisticated," Martinez said. "We need to be more creative and more sophisticated. There are divisions in the enemy that we need to utilize. There are ways to beat them at their own game."

Martinez said the big question facing anti-war organizers was what to do to keep the momentum that was building before the war in Iraq started.

"How can we extend and honor the energy we saw in the anti-war protests?" Martinez said in regard to the global protests that took place en masse in February and March of this year. "We need education, organization and mobilization."

Martinez said that the recent upsurge of conscious activism around the world reminds her of the movements of the 1960's that got her started on this track in the first place. She hopes that what is happening now will reach the same level.



"There was a wave of revulsion in the 60's about what was going on," Martinez said. "I'm hoping we can have another wave of revulsion against the United States' policies now, and this 'permanent war.'

EDITORIAL OPINION

Wild and crazy student behavior: Let's learn and move on

This weekend was a gift for students. With glorious spring weather finally making its presence known throughout the region and the semester reaching its apex, students were presented with the opportunity for some final bashes with friends and the chance for musical merriment at the Mullins Center.

In both instances behavior got out of hand and what should have been celebrations spiraled into debacles of varying degrees.

At the 2003 Spring Concert, students in the seats decided that they wanted to be more in the action. During Rahzel's performance, many students jumped over barricades and rushed the floor. The commotion was noticeable enough that it disrupted the show.

What was the Hobart Hoedown has been the hot topic for students, faculty, town members, and those of us here at The Collegian. It's time to move on.

In a press conference today with both the Amherst and UMass Police Departments, UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor made it known that numerous meetings have been scheduled with student groups "to see what assurances we can get" that riots, like this weekend's, and other such behavior, a la the Spring Concert, will not happen again.

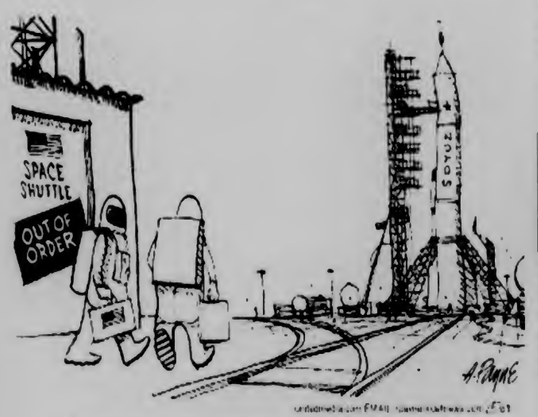
Chancellor John Lombardi echoed similar sentiments about how all involved in the well being of UMass must work together for the future.

Lombardi declared, "I understand that this behavior that produces significant injuries is not new to this part of the off-campus community, and it clearly requires a combined effort by the University, its colleagues in the community, and the private owners of these apartment complexes to ensure that we do not continue to experience this behavior with its damaging consequences to individuals and property and its high risks for everyone involved."

The Collegian agrees whole-heartedly with Chief O'Connor and Chancellor Lombardi. It is time to move on.

We must not forget the events that happened this weekend, but we must take what happened, learn from it and move on.

Large collegiate parties, particularly off-campus away from direct supervision, will continue to occur. We must examine what went wrong on all sides Saturday night and determine solutions so that nobody, neither students nor police, ever have to go through such an ordeal again.



Concerts will continue to take place at the Mullins Center and other area venues, providing an opportunity for students on campus to come together around a common interest. But this weekend proves that security needs to be better planned at such large events, and students need to respect where they are seated.

There are less than three weeks left in the school year. Seniors will be saying goodbye to friends. Others have to finalize plans for summer residences and employment. We all have final exams and projects to worry about. With all that stress, our free time should be spent enjoying the little time we have left together before summer breaks everyone apart. Let's spend that time wisely and not create another black eye for ourselves and our University.

A Saturday of shame

Sarah Ciampa

It is ten o'clock at night and I'm standing by the window in my apartment while a full-scale riot unravels in front of my sober eyes – fire, destruction, violence, riot police, rioting males with a sprinkling of females. As I stand here there are police in full riot gear marching shoulder to shoulder on guard as glass beer bottles, sticks, and furniture smash against their shields.

Stones are hurled at the traffic that is stuck in the middle of the chaos. Fires are set, lawn furniture is looted. I look out and see drunken boys grab rocks the size of grapefruits and hurl them towards the charging police. All the while these shouting, hollering, drunk, belligerent "people" chant "Fuck the cops," "Bring it Back" and "Yankees Suck."

First, I would like to say to all of you UMass students violently participating in the riot that you have no self-control and you are a disgrace. A person that is willing to offensively and unjustly fling sharp, heavy objects with no particular aim in mind to potentially harm any other human being needs to seek professional help immediately. This event has portrayed how socially inept you are. To tear down street signs, to set fire to large trees and even entire bus stops, to cause so much violence and mayhem in the name of drinking and partying is incomprehensible.

How dare you all, while there are troops occupying Iraq, while there were only 600 graduates, undergraduates and faculty members attending a rally to "Save UMass" just days ago, you feel you have the testicular fortitude to literally battle and riot police officers and firemen. All I have to say is while you have yourself a "fun" riot, breaking bottles off police officers and other innocent people, setting fire and vandalizing everything around you, there are Massachusetts politicians sitting in there offices thanking you for providing support for a 20% budget cut for higher education.

There are troops coming home that may be realizing that there are socially and mentally warped young people like you causing such unacceptable rioting, while they were obligated to fight a war that no one wanted to fight. People are fighting for their rights and beliefs, whether it is through war or civil disobedience; they are not maliciously rioting authority for something so absurdly trivial and selfish.

So, now it is 1:45 a.m., the firemen have put out a large pine tree fire and a gathering of bushes set ablaze, and I realize I will not have to evacuate my apartment. I had a full view of all the chaos that is now moving down North Pleasant Street or breaking up. All I have to say is that you are a disgrace and I am ashamed. Most of all, I am more than infuriated that I had to worry that I was unsafe in my own home which I pay a lot of rent for only so you can rip down, vandalize and loot my neighborhood.

"I hope those of you that joined the riot and felt you needed to contribute to the chaos by breaking beer bottles and setting fire, go and seek help because you are in great need of a psychological evaluation"

So one should ever have to feel this anxious and uneasiness in their own home. I hope those of you that joined the riot and felt you needed to contribute to the chaos by breaking beer bottles and setting fire, go and seek help because you are in great need of a psychological evaluation. I hope you think about all the money that your parents and/or your self pay for your tuition and remember all the "great rioting times" while you write out your larger, fatter tuition bill and receive less of an education than you did this year.

Finally, I want to say that this is not typical UMass behavior; I do not want to be among the statistics as a rioting Minuteman. I am very proud to be a student at UMass and I will not let outrageous events like Saturday night ruin that. I want to thank the police and the firemen for controlling and dampening the riot as they did over the many hours. I witnessed so much hatred and violent acts that I am very disturbed that there are so many people willing to take part in this behavior.

To those of you who would like to oppose my position feel free to step up. I would love to hear you support meaningless, deliberate, drunken violent acts in a highly populated area where there are families, and young people living.

To the students – Amherst does not revolve around us. Do not live in such a bubble. Do not conform to such outright stupidity. Do not become mindless sheep in the herd. Be an individual not a drunk, extremely disturbed follower. Think for yourself and smarten the hell up.

Beware of backstabbing girls

Courtney Charles

When I was 16 I had a friend in school who stabbed me in the back. She turned one of my other best friends against me. It really hurt, and just about ruined my sophomore year of high school. Later in the year she turned against the other girl because she thought the girl was trying to get with her boyfriend. This was not true, as her boy was quite the sketchy character indeed. I eventually became friends again with this second girl, but it took a long time for our friendship to heal.

I'm still friends with this girl now. She's gone abroad this semester, and I wish her the very best in everything.

My mom always told me that friends are more important than boys, and she was right. But even now some girls don't always understand that. Girls will sell each other out for attention from guys. I thought this was just a junior high or high school phenomenon, but I guess I was wrong. Even now, my junior year at UMass, I am finding chicks that call themselves my friends who mock me to keep guys' attention on them.

"Twisting things around only works for so long before everyone realizes where the black widow spider is hiding."

It's pathetic, I agree, but what can I do but write about it? People may not realize that things will catch up to them, but they will. If you wrong a girl, or maybe three, especially to each other, they will find out about it. There can be no mistaking that. Twisting things around only works for so long before everyone realizes where the black widow spider is hiding.

It hurts like unexpectedly putting your arm straight on a hot burner when you find out what one of your close friends says about you when you're not around. Especially when you find out how long she's been doing it and realize that she obviously thinks it a fine thing to do. It absolutely sucks when you find out the things that she will tell other people because she obviously doesn't value the friendship you had.

When you find out that someone you've been friendly with, someone whom you've let into your life as a friend has used you for sinister entertainment purposes, it really sucks. I wish I had more eloquent words to describe this juvenile occurrence, but I really don't. It makes me hurt and angry beyond words in the same breath.

I hate girls who call themselves your friends, and then go around distorting everything you say and do, and make you into their own personal royal ass because they obviously don't have anything interesting going on in their lives, or any creativity to think of something.

But you know, it's funny, these guys that they have worked so hard to impress only end up wanting to get to know the girls that they talk about all the time, because these girls are obviously leading very exciting lives.

Some people just don't get it. Dishonesty will not win you the golden trophy. It's time to smarten up.

I hate girls who will sell your secrets on the street corner when no man wants the goods they are trying to give them. I hate chicks who will be prostitutes for guys' attentions at the price of selling out friends.

True friends will stand by you; they will stick up for you in front of your face and when you're not around. They won't play you and your other girls off of each other to make sure they get their way. True friends realize college life is not just a drawn out episode of MTV's "Real World" or "Sorority Life." There is no break for the credits to roll, but like these popular shows, when all the girls get together, they will eventually replay the shady actions of the betrayer.

Girls won't just forgive over a cold beer and baseball game; they'll remember that their trust was misplaced before.

You shouldn't stab a girl friend in the back; she will find out about it, and oh yeah, girls are so much better at holding grudges. And we can make life hell, so watch out whom you're trashing.

The time has come to say farewell

Allison Leshefsky

Looking back on UMass, I am resentfully satisfied. I have watched the seasons come and go from my spot on the Van Meter hill overlooking the campus with the mountains as a backdrop.

I've watched the whiteness of snow invade the Amherst sky, forming a light layer over this concrete jungle.

I've watched the spring roll in, bringing a light to the end of my tunnel. I wake up early to the silence of those still sleeping.

I've watched the fall crawl slowly and confidently over the mountains, as the valley becomes a colorful collage of beauty.

I've listened to the youthful screams outside of the dormitories, for I was a nighttime screamer for years. Although lately I've been the silent one by the window – listening as I recall the belligerence of my youth.

I've been lost time and time again in late night conversations with my friends as we discovered pieces of ourselves before the sun came up.

I've seen friends come and go, in and out of sync, while always following the prevalent melody of fate.

I've lied awake in bed, watching night turn into day as the PVTA systematically rolled by my window on its morning route, singing me to sleep with its lullaby.

I've closed my eyes at night, spinning in my bed, clutching my fists to the sheets, around and around and around, as my youth circled within the ceilings rotation.

I've laughed hard amidst the sound of laughter and felt it with my whole body as if it were a drug. And as usual here at UMass, drugs are easy to attain.

Throughout my journey I have encountered many people whose effect on me cannot be expressed in words. Though as a writer, I will try my best to capture my emotion – a struggle that one day I may overcome.

I dedicate this column to the people that have watched me grow and are with me today, whether in body, spirit, or both. They have brought me to where I am today, although I remain confused as to where exactly that is.

The Doc in Miami, a beautiful woman in all respects, whose wisdom and compassion via Sunday morning phone calls throughout the semesters have enabled me to see an element of beauty in my pain.

Moments shared with Kristin as we both became women over and over again in the course of a year. May the "okay meter" always remain okay.

My mother, who has written over 1,000 loving emails during four years expressing her constant concern for my actions.

Nick McBride, whose many conversations in his office have provided me with an outlet for my emotions and an understanding of my growth.

Missy and Ryan, who have remained loyal friends through it all and have always given me something to smile about, even when happiness felt distant.

Anna, who has been the basis of my recent growth, the foundation of my compassion, the demise of my innocence, and the first person I was ever conscious of loving. May your happiness be true.

Mrs. Dorman, my therapist in Boston who has given me hope, when hope did not exist. May the fish always be plentiful.

The Van Meter maintenance crew, who are forever unaware of the entertainment they provide.

My ladies in the cellar, who always gave me a reason to come home after class, even if it was to sit around and do nothing. I know you know how much I love you.

And all the rest of the people (you know who you are) that have given me the gift of friendship, time, and understanding through the years.

I end this farewell with a quote by Jerry Garcia, who has an understanding of how crazy life can get. "Sometimes the light's all shining on me. Other times I can barely see. Lately it occurs to me, what a long, strange trip its been..."

'X2' debut of $85.6 million sets tough act for 'Matrix' to follow

By DAVID GERMAIN
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) – A PG-13 outing helped propel "X2: X-Men United" to an $85.6 million first week and a possible record week for "The Matrix Reloaded" can have trouble approaching that many more restrictive R ratings.

Two powerful mutants with opposite powers and outrageous costumes battle each other in "X2: X-Men United," which debuted with $85.6 million from 3,663 theaters over the weekend, according to studio estimates Sunday. Exhibitors reported higher ticket prices, with an estimated 18.5 million viewers, 1.2 million more than "X-Men" did in its first weekend.

"X2" has the fourth biggest debut ever, behind the $115.6 million for "Spider-Man," $90.3 million for "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" and $88.4 million for "Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets." Like "X2," those movies all had a PG or PG-13 rating, allowing many younger than 17 to see them unaccompanied by an adult.

The sequel's total – "X2" is expected to break the record for best R-rated opening ever, topping the current champ of "Hannibal" – also bodes well for "The Matrix Reloaded," which will stack up against the PG and PG-13 debuts remaining to be seen, though.

"The Matrix Reloaded" is "maybe the most anticipated movie of the year, yet the R rating is a factor," said Paul Dergarabedian, president of box-office tracker Exhibitor Relations.

"Conventional wisdom would say it would be very difficult for any R-rated movie to match one of the bigger PG-13 openings," Dergarabedian said. "But 'The Matrix' is a different kind of movie that's going to transcend that R rating to some degree."

Distributor Warner Bros. did not try to challenge the R rating assigned to "The Matrix Reloaded" under Motion Picture Association of America guidelines.

The studio felt confident audiences would understand that like 1999's "The Matrix," the sequel would not have the sort of gory violence or overly explicit sex scenes and language that many R-rated movies contain.

"For those who have seen the original 'Matrix' and the millions of people who bought the DVD, they realize it is really a borderline R," said Dan Fellman, Warner Bros. head of distribution. "I think what will happen is there'll be a lot of adults seeing the movie opening weekend, and a lot that let their kids under the age of 17 go along."

Sonic Youth's Thurston Moore talks activism

bolic ribbon and invited the masses in.

"The next day we had close to a million hits, just from that article," says Moore. "The information just got linked to all these sites, and we were just like, 'This is complete, creative activism.' I immediately got thousands of mp3's jamming the mailbox – I just sort of settled back and decided to do as much as I can."

DAYDREAM NATION

With millions knocking down his door for the last month and an active touring schedule set for this summer, you'd be right to wonder when Moore has found the time to settle back and absorb the situation. The truth is there has been precious little, and nearly as overwhelming as the sheer volume, he says, was the realization of and subsequent attention that had to be reciprocated to the broad criticism their brand of creative activism had sparked.

"It's not intellectualized," says Moore, acknowledging the hate mail he and Habib have received. "It's all invective, like 'Fuck you, Sonic Youth and the Beastie Boys are gay,' you know, that kind of language. We answer them with kindness. We don't expect everybody to be on the same page on this; if you disagree you disagree, but at least see what's out there."

Moore is an exception in that he practices the finer points of his own advice and openly recognizes his lack of political finesse. "I'm not going to go out and make too much of a vocal stand on this," he says. "I don't have the historical facts or knowledge to discuss what's going on, although there's quite a few people who do and are very sophisticated." Instead, he acts in the interest of his own abilities by lending the local music scene both a creatively charged presence and a curious ear. With Protest Records, he, Habib and dozens of inspired supporters have upped the ante and further opened the door for free exchange – all the more reason, he says, to drop the bottom at some point and dream it up again.

"Our next idea is to sort of decimate this and all of a sudden have the site change into something else – we're trying to find funding to offer, every high school kind who requested one, a free copy of Howard Zinn's 'A People's History of the United States.'[laughs] So we're trying to figure, 'How can we get 20,000 free copies of that book as a beginning thing from a publisher?'"

In the meantime, says Moore, "the first primary thing you should be doing as far as protesting is to continue to be informed. That's the first step. It's a trickier move than it ever has been before, though, across a social landscape with a more coherent political memory than it has had in the past.

"There's history now, there's documentation, that's the thing," he says. "There's information that's really available, whereas in the 60s it was all very slow and organic. Now there's real data to be exorcised and utilized. It's gonna be a very wild next 20 years; I think there's going to be a real kind of revolutionary divide, culturally, that goes on. A lot of how that plays out will dictate what happens from here."

Apple moves forward

"average" fans into enthusiastic Apple consumers and courting a new audience entirely: the people who haven't sampled the various peer-to-peer services, or simply choose not to agree with the open pool of music free for unsupervised public consumption. Through the iTunes store, he's handing them a pleasant (and legal) way to crack into the world of downloading guilt-free. Anybody could take one look and tell you the same: it looks great; it's seamless to maneuver and as easy to use as the advertising suggests.

And yet, it still has a ways to go.

The "exclusive" content (read: material largely traded in fan circles already) almost certainly has the potential to lose its luster unless Apple can consistently supplement it with artist-approved material available through their service exclusively. And while the major labels have the cash backing and big money names they lack the character and personable business practices the independent imprints are designed to employ. Labels like Matador, Yep Roc and Kill Rock Stars are beloved for emphasizing creativity over commerce, and already, though modestly, make new material available via their own websites.

While Apple's convenience factor is a plus for some and the price, while reasonable, should prove to be the major point of negotiation, there's still no replacing the physical allure of music. Cover art. Liner notes. No piece of software will ever duplicate the waiting in line at midnight presales, or the gentle scratch of a lurching needle across vinyl. Apple may superficially have our hearts now and make this work in the end, but it's a long time coming before their service will adequately immerse itself as fully in our lives as the songs have themselves.

Hartford Symphony Orchestra presents season finale; local musicians showcased at Pioneer Arts Center

The Hartford Symphony Orchestra will present the finale of the 2002-2003 Masterworks Series on May 6 and 7, in Mortensen Hall at the Bushnell Center for the Performing Arts.

Led by Music Director Edward Cumming, the program will feature the work of Gustav Mahler ("Fifth Symphony in C-Sharp Minor"), Aaron Jay Kernis ("Musica Celestis") and Anton Webern ("In Sommerwind").

The performance begins at 7:30 p.m. and will be preceded by a free Concert Preview hosted by Maestro Cumming at 6:30 p.m.

Tickets for the events range from $10 to $55 and are available through the HSO Ticket Services (860) 987-5900, Monday through Friday, between the hours of 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. Student tickets are $5 and are available with a valid ID.

The Pioneer Arts Center of Easthampton will showcase local musicians Anand Nayak and Polly Fiveash, Katie Cajigas along with Carolyn Parry on May 8 at 7:30 p.m. Fiveash and Nayak grew up in neighboring towns near Boston, completely unaware of each other for the first 18 years of their lives. They met in college and have been singing together for almost a decade. Apart from occasional local performances, they have never seriously promoted themselves until now.

Why should this interest you? Because these two young people have an irresistible chemistry, a rare depth of musicianship, mesmerizing original material and superb taste in covers.

Wrestlers' image problems result of demanding audience

sional wrestlers or those who worked in the business in some capacity – from both the WWE and independent or international promotions – have been reported dead. Of those 360, 104 of them were under the age of 50, 66 died of unknown causes, and 134 died of a heart attack, stroke, liver or kidney failure or cancer of an internal organ in the chest cavity. Of those 134 deaths, more than half – around 107 – happened between 1985 and the present. In contrast, between 1975 and 1987, only 80 superstars died.

More than any other sport, professional wrestling is entertainment. It survives because of fan response. In sports like football and baseball, athletes are accepted because of how well they play the game. Wrestlers – and wrestling fans – are from a different ilk, and acceptance comes because of a combination of factors: wrestling ability, personality, and look. In professional wrestling, acceptance is called "getting over," and winning fan approval is a task in itself.

A behemoth like World Wrestling Entertainment (WWE) superstar Big Show is far more likely to be accepted by the crowd than a wrestler the size of WWE talent Christian, who doesn't even hit the six-foot mark. It's all about perception and fans react more to big men. WWE superstars The Undertaker, Brock Lesnar and Kevin Nash are popular mainly because they are huge men. While storyline and wrestling ability may have something to do with it, they are, in reality, factors that barely register with the audience.

We expect wrestlers to be in tremendous physical condition, able to bench-press 350 pounds, with biceps that make people stare in awe. It's a rarity to see a wrestler without a six-pack and because muscle is what impresses us, that is what wrestlers try and deliver.

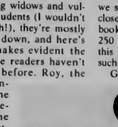
Garcia delivers fresh and hip contribution to grifter genre

By JAKE D. LEWIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Author Eric Garcia developed an acute cult following with his debut novel "Anonymous Rex," a delightful detective tale where the private dick is actually a dinosaur in incognito (you don't know anything about cross-species sex until you've read this). That book has now spawned two sequels, but the reason you might become familiar with this talented, young writer's name is for his latest foray into fiction, "Matchstick Men."

"I've always been a fan of literature and films about con artists, but there was an element to it I've never seen done before," Garcia says, and in a matter of two weeks he had written one of the freshest, hippest contributions to the grifter genre. He points out, though, that he had the idea and direction of the story brewing in his head for a long time before he sat down and put pen to paper (or cursor to Word document more likely), and now his dedication and ability is finally paying off.



In addition to this breakthrough book, "Matchstick Men" is also coming to a movie theatre near you this summer, with Hollywood hotshots Nicolas Cage and Sam Rockwell in the roles of Roy and Frankie, respectively, while Ridley Scott, one of the biggest director's of all time, takes the helm. Robert Zemeckis produces and Ted Griffen ("Ocean's 11") adapts the screenplay. "How can you go wrong???" Garcia, a film fanatic himself, simply points out.

A "matchstick man," we're told, is another name for a con man, such as our protagonists Roy and Frankie. They've worked together for years pulling off scams like "The Jamaican Switch," and "The Twenties," and you wonder if Garcia hasn't run a few grifts himself. He clears up the confusion by saying his knowledge on the games came from "good ol' book-learning research, but then throws in that he's "got a few friends who are slightly outside the law, so to speak." If they're guys like Roy and Frankie, we can forgive them.

Even though they scam cash from unsuspecting widows and vulnerable college students (I wouldn't fall for it, though!), they're mostly good guys deep down, and here's where Garcia makes evident the side of the genre readers haven't gotten a lot of before. Roy, the older and potentially wiser of the two, is Obsessive-Compulsive; he studies his carpeting for any hint of stain, and locks his front door six times, but sensibly looks at things financially in the long run. He says he can spot a bum deal a mile off, and that's what he thinks Frankie is getting them into when a job opportunity arises that could possibly be their biggest payday to date. At the same time, in a somewhat "Analyze This"-ish, "Sopranos"-esque scene, Roy sees a new psychiatrist who holds out on giving him medication for the disorder, yet helps Roy get in touch with the daughter he never knew he had. Father and child are reunited, and it's not long before Angela wants to get to know her old man and some of his tricks. Garcia keeps all these facets of the story clear, never overwhelming the reader with plot twists and turns that would overwhelm like many movies in this style tend to do.

That's not to say that there aren't a few surprises in store for the reader, as well as some laugh-out-loud moments that may draw stares from nearby people if you're reading in a public place. In the aforementioned scene where Roy sees his new therapist, he delivers a monologue about his daily routine with his disorder, and it is truly inspired. There's a perfect equilibrium between moments like this and more touching ones, especially as we see this grumpy old man grow close with his daughter. For a little book, that is, a volume less than 250 pages, there's a lot of depth to this work and that's what makes it such an astonishing read.

Garcia's prose is top shelf, no wonder from a professed fan of Tom Robbins, Kurt Vonnegut, J.R.R. Tolkien and Philip K. Dick. His sturdy literary voice is a mix between the terse narrative of Chuck Pahluniuk ("Fight Club") and the witty repartee of Elmore Leonard ("Get Shorty") at his best, the dialogue is crisp and realistic, the scenes imaginable yet thrilling, and the characters honest and entertaining.

"I know that as far back as I can remember, I've wanted to write," Garcia says, and while he doesn't qualify his earliest writing at age seven a good story, it finally appears that all of the hard work has paid off for him. In addition to the sure-fire success of both the book and film of "Matchstick Men," (and a development with the Sci-Fi Channel for his "Anonymous Rex" series), Garcia shows that his warmth extends beyond the text; days after an appendectomy, he was letting me interview him. It looks like the big-time is nearing for this L.A. resident, but is Garcia ready? He addresses his burgeoning rise to fame with something that both dinosaur detectives, compulsive conmen and readers young-or-old can all understand: "Bring it on, baby."

A portable 'Pep Talk' with some bite

By CAMERON J. WOODS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This month Pierre Bennu released his new book, "Bullsh*t or Fertilizer: A Portable Pep Talk." A filmmaker by trade, Bennu has written the ultimate motivational kick in the pants. Cover to cover this book is filled with witty advice, satirical criticism and amusing and illuminating illustrations. It is a book for anyone who has an aspiration for life that they are not currently fulfilling.

Bennu opens his book with this passage: "I never understood why books don't just get to the damn point. I remember being in college and reading fifteen pages of text to highlight two lines. I'd be like, 'Why didn't they just say that?'" With its short 83 pages filled with just "the point" this is a book that could easily be read cover to cover in one afternoon, but it also has tremendous re-readable potential.

From start to finish this book is a motivational self-help book with the key emphasis on the self. This book is written for procrastinators, dreamers, and everyone in between. In reading this book you are asked to take a look at your habits, and without guilting yourself in further procrastination, eliminate or schedule your nonproductive activities in a way that you can still live your life, just more efficiently.

There are chapters dedicated to getting the reader to rethink how they view accidents and setbacks. "So you messed up? So what! You're probably going to mess up a million times before you become an Old Pro. Just make sure you understand why you messed up." This book is also interactive, it comes complete with a few little homework assignments. The reader is asked to redefine what they think it means to be broke, busy, and most importantly what it means to "make it."

The key points of the book include, trusting your own work enough to hire yourself, learning not to talk in terms of "gonnas, wannas, and going to's," and most of all just doing it and having fun on the way. This book is the written tough love that most of us need in order to produce our first works of art, records, novels or spaceships.

With its fast pace and non-embellished wording this book has the power to hit home with everyone just with its key saying, "You can do anything." Inwould be a great gift for anyone you know who has the creativity and the talent, but lacks needed initial push to get going on their first project.

Bennu is a painter, teacher, deejay, and award-winning filmmaker. He produces two to three films a year, which are shown in various festivals across the country. He and his wife, Jamyla Bennu, form "exitthepipe," a creativity collective focusing on film and digital media, creativity workshops, and keeping the "fun" in profundity. In the words of Bennu, "Okay, that's enough. Now you're actively procrastinating. Go do your work!"

NORTHAMPTON – "Visions of Solace and Peace," paintings by Daniel A. Brown will be shown in the Locust Street Gallery of the Cooley-Dickinson Hospital. The works will be on display through May 31. The event is free and open to the public.

AMHERST – UMass Theater presents Romulus Linney's stage adaptation of Ernest J. Gaines' acclaimed book, "A Lesson Before Dying." Director Greg Allen describes the work, a story that offers perspective on how outside oppression influenced the psyche of the Southern African-American community in the 1940s as "....not a story about anger and violence in the face of oppression, but rather one of letting go of that anger to find something powerful and inspiring. The cast assembled by Allen is a mixture of seasoned actor and new talent that is a convergence of students, faculty, and community.

The show begins May 1 and runs until May 10 (Thursday through Sunday) at 8 p.m. with a 2 p.m. performance on May 3 and 10 at the Curtain Theater at the Fine Arts Center. Tickets are $10 and $5 for students and seniors. To get tickets, call (413) 545-2511 or visit the Fine Arts Center Box Office.

HARTFORD, Conn. – The Hartford Symphony Orchestra will present the finale of the 2002-2003 Masterworks Series on May 6 and 7 in Mortensen Hall at the Bushnell Center for the Performing Arts. Led by Music Director Edward Cumming, the program will feature the work of Gustav Mahler (Fifth Symphony in C-Sharp Minor), Aaron Jay Kernis (Musica Celestis) and Anton Webern (In Sommerwind).

The performance, which begins at 7:30 p.m. will be preceded by a free concert preview hosted by Maestro Cumming at 6:30 p.m. Tickets for the events range from $10 to $55 Dollars. Tickets are available through the HSO Ticket Services (860) 987-5900, Monday through Friday, between the hours of 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. and online at www.hartfordsymphony.org. Student tickets are $5.

SOUTH HADLEY – On May 7, The Odyssey Bookshop will present University of Massachusetts professor of English Arthur Kinney. Kinney, director of the Massachusetts Center for Renaissance Studies will discuss "Shakespeare by Stages: An Historical Perspective." The event is free and open to the public and begins at 7 p.m.

AMHERST – On May 8, Linda Robinson-Hildas will be presenting a class on First Aid using Chinese Medicine. The intention of the class is to educate people and raise awareness of the options there are in regard to first aid.

Linda Robinson-Hildas is a licensed Acupuncturist and Chinese Herbalist. The class will be held at 44 Belchertown Road at 7 p.m. The cost of the class is $5. All proceeds go to benefit the Western Mass Food Bank. For more information and to reserve a place in the class, call (413) 253-2900.

EASTHAMPTON – The Pioneer Arts Center of Easthampton will showcase local musicians, Anand Nayak and Polly Fiveash, Katie Cajigas and Carolyn Parry, May 8 at 7:30 p.m.

Fiveash and Nayak grew up in neighboring towns near Boston, completely unaware of each other for the first 18 years of their lives. They met in college, and have been singing together for almost a decade. Apart from occasional local performances, they have never seriously promoted themselves until now.

Why should this interest you? Because these two young people have an irresistible chemistry, a rare depth of musicianship, mesmerizing original material, and superb taste in covers.

Cajigas is a singer/songwriter from Long Island. New York. She is presently a student at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst where she is studying Anthropology. However, Anthropology aside, singing has always been her main passion in life as she has been singing and writing songs since she was little. Cajigas accompanies herself on acoustic guitar, creating a simple and steady background for her lyrics. Her songs, honest and rich with emotion, combined with her "hauntingly melodic" voice create a unique sound and content full of personal accounts of life, love, spirituality, politics, society and social justice issues. It has been said that the deep and moving nature of Cajigas's songs invoke a sense of familiarity or just plain sincerity that people can relate to. She makes her way to open mics in the Western region of Massachusetts as well as on Long Island, and she can be found playing around Easthampton, Northampton, Amherst, Ware and Greenfield. Ticket prices are $5 and $3 for members. For more information call (413) 527-3700.

AMHERST – On May 8, Food For Thought Books will be hosting a book release party for author Kathy Harrison at 7 p.m. Harrison is the author of "Another Place at the Table: A Story of Shattered Childhoods and the Redemption of Love." Harrison's memoir is about her experience parenting nearly 100 foster children. A foster parent for thirteen years, Harrison and her husband Bruce were named Massachusetts Foster Parents of the Year in 1996 and in 2002 received the prestigious Goldie Foster Award for Foster Parents. The event is free and open to the public.

AMHERST – On May 8 and 9, the Residential Arts will present Wire Monkey Dance in the Bowker Auditorium as part of their OFF Center series. Wire Monkey Dance's new performance entitled "Short Circuits" explores oppression and consequences, male and female archetypes, human relationships and power.

The performance will also include the piece "Blue Hour" a trio-based depiction of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict; as well as "Arctic Triangle" a comical and highly acrobatic piece, and the new original solo entitled "Oblivious." Tickets are $12 and $5 for Five College students. For tickets and information, call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at (413) 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS.

SOUTH HADLEY – On May 9, The Odyssey Bookshop will present "Education and Teachers!" featuring Rafe Esquith and Sonia Nieto. American Teacher award-winner Esquith will present "There Are No Shortcuts: How an Inner-City Teacher – Winner of the American Teacher Award – Inspires His Students and Challenges Us to Rethink the Way We Educate our Children." Sonia Nieto, a professor of education at the University of Massachusetts, will discuss her new book, "What Keeps Teachers Going?" The event is free and open to the public and begins at 7 p.m.

AMHERST – On May 9, UMass Theater and Music and Dance faculty and students collaborate on a shadow puppet version of Shakespeare's "Macbeth" entitled "Drums and Shadows." Classic shadow puppetry is combined with shadows cast by masked performers. The performance comes as the culmination of a semester-long class led by theater professor Miguel Romero. Audience members are encouraged to stay after the performances each night for a talk back. The performance is suitable for children aged ten and up. Performances begin at 6:30 p.m. at the Rand Theater located in the Fine Arts Center. The event is free and open to the public, no reservations required. There will be no late seating.

AMHERST – UMass theater presents Romulus Linney's stage adaptation of Ernest J. Gaines' acclaimed book "A Lesson Before Dying." The work offers a perspective of how outside oppression influences the psyche of a Southern African-American community in the 1940s. Director Greg Allen says, "It's about resistance, personal resistance and the grace in that resistance is so strong." The cast, is a mix of seasoned veterans and new-comers, as well as students, faculty and community members.

The show opened May 1 and runs through May 10 (Thursday through Sunday) at 8 p.m. There will be two performances May 10 at 2 p.m. and 8 p.m. All performances will be at the Curtain Theater located inside the Fine Arts Center. Tickets are $10 and $5 for students and seniors. Tickets can be purchased by calling (413) 545-2511 or by visiting the Fine Arts Center Box Office.

AMHERST – On Sunday, May 11, The University of Massachusetts University Chorale and Women's Choir will present an afternoon of music "On the Lighter Side ..." The ensembles will perform under the direction of E. Wayne Abercrombie, Danica Buckley, Sheila Hefferon and Irina Yakin and will be accompanied by Stephanie A. Parker and Justyna Chesy-Parda.

The Chorale program will feature the world premiere of award-winning Russian composer Roman Yakub's "Winken, Blinken, and Nod." The Women's Choir will perform Margaret Dryburgh's "Captive's Hymn" and her arrangement of Antonin Dvorak's "Largo." The Chorale's performance will begin at 4 p.m. at the First Congregational Church on Main Street in Amherst. The event is open to the public, donations will be accepted at the door.

A Knick fan fires back

Adam Levoy

Dear Reggie Miller,

First, let me say thank you for all the playoff memories you have given me and this generation of basketball fans. You are truly one of the great clutch performers of not only our time, but in the history of the game.

With that said and out of the way, I just want to say to you Miller Time is over forever Reggie! For once in my 23-year old life I would like to thank our hated rivals the Boston Celtics. Thank you Paul Pierce. Thank you Antoine Walker. Thank you Mr. Leprechaun. You did what no Knick ever could – you made Reggie Miller mortal. I knew you weren't a divine being Reggie. You just chose to show the world your true colors, but only after the Knicks did not have any hopes of a championship. For that I say thank you.

You have broken my heart on too many occasions. I grew up learning to accept that the joy of success would only be destroyed by you at least two times every year. It feels just like yesterday that you scored 25 points in the fourth quarter of Game 5 following your choke with your infamous "choke" sign. It feels like yesterday when you scored the final eight points of Game 1 in only 16 seconds to steal the game and eventually the series from my beloved Knicks.

I can go on and on with numbers and statistics, but on this day the only numbers I am going to remember is the past seven against the Celtics.

Reggie, this has been bottled up inside of me for the last nine years. You stink. You're horrible. Going 2-for-8 and scoring only 8 points in an elimination game? I expect more from you Miller. I guess you only saved your best for the Knicks, and I right?

I have a smile on my face that kept expanding with every shot you clanked in the series. I can hear your laughter in my dreams. Clank. Clunk. Clink. These are the keyboard sounds produced by you at this time of year.

I'd be lying if I didn't say I basked in the glory of your last attempt you missed.

You barely even played in some of the games when it counted, Reggie! Are you fatigued? Are you getting older, Reggie? I don't buy it. You're a shooter. You don't use arthritis in your wrists as an excuse. You are not not that good at basketball anymore, and you are a shell of the player you once were.

Mr. Knicks did not always live to you. We had our moments of success and glory, but I blame you along with Michael Jordan for making my childhood incomplete. Because of you Reggie, I do not think I will live to see 80 years old. You made me age a little quicker.

When Jordan told Jer you now Mr. Miller? You don't need me anymore, but I'll you want to continue to watch you play. I understand Mom is looking to hire some PTA drivers. Or maybe you can set up games in Boston are more for you these days. It's the 4th quarter, where is Miller?"

In retrospect Reggie, I never respected you. I was very afraid to disrespect you. You might have given my boss the choke sign, but I have my own sign for you. The sign of the white towel compliments of the Celtics fans around the city and your career.

And I know I'm not finished with you. New York fans don't make the playoffs. Then again Reggie, this team hasn't been eliminated from the first round since you and you have. It is time to follow Jordan and Ewing and Starks and call it quits. The memories are sad and bittersweet during this series when they are not linked to our them.

If you are wondering, I feel better as a result of writing about our failures. I don't. I have scars in my heart that cannot heal. This will never heal thanks to you. Maybe one day this will go away, but for now, the 9th and basketball is a touchy subject for me. I am writing you not to point out that you suck and you lost. Lastly, I expected more from you Reggie Miller.

Many again, congratulations. It is unfair for the Celtics for doing what every New Yorker did not think was possible – making Reggie Miller a mere mortal in the month of April.

Perfect day for Holtz, UM softball seen," Holtz said. "She's smart on the mound, has a great work ethic and aggressive which are traits that all good pitchers have."

It's going to be exciting to see what [sophomore] Kelli [Arnold] and Jenna can do next year."

Another freshman shined as well. Third baseman KJ Kelles went 3-for-4 on the day, collecting four RBIs and scoring twice. The A-10 Rookie of the Week had a slugging percentage of 1.555 last week, with a .500 batting average three homers, seven RBIs and five runs. She is hitting .366 on the year with six homers and 22 RBIs.

The pair of victories sealed the Minutewomen's 13th-straight Atlantic 10 title, and the top seed in the A-10 tourney. UMass coach Elaine Sortino didn't have much to say about the doubleheader, preoccupied with thoughts of her departing players in her mind, and she wasn't alone in reflecting.

"It was a great day for seniors. It was a beautiful day to play and with all the fans here, it was very emotional day," Sortino said. "I love my players and it's really incredible to see them grow up as players and people. They turned out to be such great people. And, for them to give a financial contribution to the program is incredible. I had nothing to do with that, it was their idea. I'm a very lucky coach."

"It's a sad day, and I thought this day would never come, but we were ready for it," senior outfielder Anna Perey explained. "When I came into this program, I said when I was done I wanted to leave it all on the field and I think I have everything I can for four years."

Each game also featured a freshmen recording the first collegiate hits of their careers. In the third inning of game one, Shannon DeMello collected her first hit in the first at-bat of her career. In game two, Shannon Hoole came on to pinch hit and ripped a single into the left-center gap in the fourth inning.

With the regular season A-10 title in their possession, the Minutewomen's focus turns to the A-10 tourney. No. 1 seed UMass hosts the tournament with their first action against Fordham Thursday at noon. The concluding game will be Temple versus St. Joseph's after a half-hour intermission.

After an exciting day, Sortino summarized it all up.

"Today's stress level was zero. I just want to sit back and enjoy today."

Eustachy out at Iowa State

By Todd Dvorak
Associated Press

AMES, Iowa (AP) – Iowa State basketball coach Larry Eustachy resigned Monday, one week after the publication of embarrassing photos of him drinking and partying with students.

Eustachy acknowledged that he was an alcoholic seeking treatment last Wednesday, the same day the school suspended him with pay and athletic director Bruce Van De Velde recommended he be fired.

The deal between Eustachy and Iowa State gives the coach $1,110,000 for the remainder of 2003 and a lump sum of $850,000 on Jan. 1, 2004.

"By resolving this situation today, we will continue to move forward in our important mission of providing students with the best education possible," said Dr. Greg Geoffroy, university president.

Eustachy, who had said last week he would not resign, spoke briefly outside his home Monday evening, saying it was "extremely important to resolve this issue immediately for the benefit of everyone involved."

Eustachy said he concluded over the weekend that it would be best to accept the settlement, resign and move on.

"I'm not done coaching. I will coach again," he said.

The monetary settlement "resolves all matters," said Steve Zumbach, the university's attorney.

"This matter needed to be brought to a close. If allowed to continue, that damage would have been irreparable," Zumbach said.

Zumbach said it has been one of the most divisive issues that has confronted the university during his 35-year tenure.

As part of the settlement, Eustachy will receive the university's health benefits over the next year. Those benefits include coverage for treatment of alcoholism, Zumbach said.

"This decision now allows our basketball program to move forward and supports Mr. Eustachy and his family in his struggle with alcohol," Geoffroy said.

Geoffroy said he supported Van De Velde throughout the week.

A handful of basketball players rallied on the campus in support of Eustachy, while some boosters said they were upset with Van De Velde's recommendation.

Stuck with the tab for losing

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Somebody always pays.

The latest somebody turned out to be Paul Silas, who was fired Sunday, less than 48 hours after the New Orleans Hornets failed to reach the second round of the NBA playoffs.

He wasn't the first or last man in the league to get stuck with the tab for a collective flop – remember, there's several rounds and more than a few disappointments left – and Silas was even further from being the most famous.

Despite some of the other big names rumored to be on the chopping or auction blocks already, that distinction still belongs to Michael Jordan. He voluntarily turned in his uniform for good after Washington failed to make the playoffs in a weak Eastern Conference. Now it appears he might be asked to clean out the office the Wizards had been saving for his return.

Jordan defined winning by bringing six championships to Chicago as a player, but he's had more than his share of losing since, not to mention trouble hanging onto to a job. The greatest player the game has ever seen was just beginning to show promise as Washington's president of basketball operations when an ill-timed itch two years ago convinced him to return to the court.

Not only was the third coming a disaster measured strictly by wins and losses, it cost Jordan some of the credibility he'll need if he plans to return to the front office as an executive.

The Associated Press reported that Jordan has begun exploring a possible role with the expansion team in Charlotte and talked recently with owner Robert Johnson about buying in as a partner. And after the way this latest experiment went, the owners' box may be the only place in an NBA organization where Jordan won't get in the way.

There was no generation gap when he played with the Bulls and his impatience was almost a virtue. Jordan badgered and bullied teammates, but back then he could still lead by example – or put the whole lot on his back and carry them as far as he needed to. There was a core of veterans and Phil Jackson as coach besides, a rough system of checks and balances.

A far different picture emerges, though, from Jordan's tenure as a player with the Wizards. His younger teammates soon came to feel his constant criticism wasn't so much designed to challenge them as to provide him with an alibi. Like the veterans, they considered his hand-picked coach, Doug Collins, almost a flunky, and never quite shook the feeling Jordan continued calling the shots even higher up the food chain.

A hint of the near-mutiny that bubbled at the end was apparent in a New York Times report that when many of Jordan's teammates were asked if they wanted to contribute to a goodbye gift, they wanted little time saying no.

"Without Michael, we could be just as good of a team," Jerry Stackhouse, one of the few players willing to speak on the record, told The Washington Post. "I look forward to that challenge and I know other guys in this locker room, even though they may not say it, are looking forward to that challenge, too."

Jordan's legacy as a player is safe. The same can't be said for his reputation as a judge of talent, nor as an executive chasing free agents looking to relocate. Washington owners Abe Pollin and Ted Leonsis were already unhappy with the way Jordan ran the team's basketball operations from his home in Chicago. With his authority assailed as never before, there is speculation the two could sever ties with Jordan as early as this week.

Jordan has already started exploring the possibility of moving on, which means he'd miss a chance to cash in on the spike in value his presence brought the ballclub.

The good news is that Jordan won't miss the money. The same, though, can hardly be said about every one of the coaches, assistants or ballplayers who will take the fall for the failures in the coming weeks.

Already there's talk Isiah Thomas might not get a chance to coach a fourth season at Indiana, and that Gary Payton, who arrived in Milwaukee in just enough time to play three dozen games, won't be back next season. The stakes are raised for every series from here on out until a champion is crowned.

Portland owner Paul Allen practically guaranteed offseason changes, if only to clean up the off-court problems his team – nicknamed the "Jail Blazers" – encountered earlier. Though the Blazers lost Game 7 to Dallas, by fighting back from an 0-3 deficit, they might have bought themselves a little more time.

"Hopefully, we can keep this thing together," said guard Bonzi Wells.

Only for so long.

Sooner or later, somebody has to pay for the losing.

Because somebody always does.

Comeback kids shine at A-10s

possession, Kurtz stormed down the field. Less than eight seconds after her first goal she scored again, tying the game and capping off the Maroon and White's comeback in dramatic fashion.

"Kelli kind of wrapped up the unfinished business for us, it was petty amazing to watch," Bolduc said.

Overtime was a battle on both sides of the ball. Both teams swapped possessions for most of the extra period, and it appeared the game was going into another overtime.

With 28 seconds left in the period Maura McGarrity netted the game winner, sending the fans and the sidelines into an uproar.

"I would have never thought someone could come back from seven goals… we were all in awe after the game," Bolduc said.

The championship game against Temple brought another challenge to the Maroon and White, the No. 1-ranked offense in the A-10. In the Owls, the squad was to match up against the top defensive unit in the conference.

The first half was even as Temple and UMass swapped goals until the end of the period. The Owls scored five unanswered goals after being down 5-3. The Minutewomen were able to stop the bleeding before the break with a quick goal from McGarrity with 45 seconds left.

Temple broke the game open in the beginning of the second half. Led by Tiffany Pulaski and tournament MVP Patty Glavin, the Owls scored five unanswered leaving the score at 13-5.

The Maroon and White were forced to comeback again. Despite scoring three goals in a row, the Owl attack kept piling on with two more goals and the 15-9 victory.

"We almost came back, they were coming up with come key possessions," Bolduc said.

Temple head coach Kim Ciarroca, who coached Bolduc in college, was impressed with the Minutewomen's effort.

"She said we had a great bunch of girls and that she would have preferred to play Richmond," Bolduc said.

With the win against Richmond, UMass recorded its first 11-victory season since 1983, something that gave Bolduc something to be proud of in her first year at the helm of the Maroon and White.

"I think the girls should be happy with this season, I think they learned so much," Bolduc said.

A perfect slam

Holtz is perfect at plate and on the mound in sweep

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

Kaila Holtz saved her best performance for last, pacing the Massachusetts softball team to an easy doubleheader sweep of George Washington, winning 18-0 and 13-0.

In her final home game of the regular season, Holtz was perfect in every aspect of the game Sunday. From the mound, the senior ace hurled her first perfect game on the perfect day, Senior Day. Holtz's perfect game was the eighth perfect game in the history of the UMass program. She now boasts an 18-7 record with a conference-best 0.93 earned run average.

The Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week cruised through the game throwing just 58 pitches in five innings, striking out three Colonials. Only one hitter saw more than three pitches all day. Holtz's pinpoint control accounted for only one two-ball count.

Holtz wasn't just perfect with her arm, but also with her bat. She went 5-for-5 including a grand slam and six runs batted in. Four of Holtz's hits came in the first game, the same game she pitched. Holtz went 1-for-1 with a run and an RBI before being pulled from the second game. Still, Holtz was humble when asked about her once-in-a-lifetime performance.

"Today is the day that all the seniors have been waiting for, yet dreading," Holtz said. "When you come to the ballpark and it's your last time to be introduced, you want to make the best of it. I'm glad we could jump on the opportunity and it just worked out it being a perfect game for us."

The Maroon and White blew the game wide open with an 11 run first inning effort on seven hits including Holtz's slam. It was the most runs UMass has scored in a single inning all season.

A trio of seniors followed Holtz's dominance. Emily Robustelli (2-for-4 with three RBIs and two runs) Jessica Bartlett (2-for-4 with two RBIs and two runs) and Anna Perez (2-for-3 with two RBI and a run) all had solid at-bats in the opening game.

After her mentor was finished for the day, freshman Jenna Busa prepared to hurl. Busa wasn't perfect, but was close enough, giving up only one hit in five innings in the night-cap. Her no-no was broken up by pinch hitter Monica Foote who hit a single to left-center in the top of the fourth. Foote was one of only two Colonials on the day to reach safely.

Busa took shaky at first, walking the leadoff hitter, but was impressive the rest of the way. Busa recorded three strikeouts and one walk in her first career shutout to improve to 3-0.

"She is going to be one of the best the program has ever

Kaila Holtz went 5-for-5 with a grand slam, driving in six runs during the Minutewomen's sweep over George Washington Sunday. It was on the mound, however, that Holtz really shined, pitching a perfect game in the opener of the doubleheader. It was Holtz's last regular season game at the UMass Softball Complex.

Women's lax shines

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team enjoyed an athletic dream last weekend. The Atlantic 10 tournament exhibited excitement, disappointment, and a lot of good lacrosse.

The Minutewomen began the four-team tournament against a very talented Richmond squad. This game ended up being the highlight of the tournament and the most exciting game all the season for the Maroon and White.

UMass was able to pull out the 12-11 victory in overtime...with a last minute goal from Maura McGarrity.

UMass	12
Richmond	11

The decisive goal was a part of the biggest comeback in the A-10 this year, a comeback that had everyone present speechless – except for UMass coach Carrie Bolduc.

"It was something I've never seen before...it was pretty amazing," Bolduc said.

The Minutewomen spent most of the game trying to figure out the thrilling Richmond defense. After only allowing three goals in the first half to the Maroon and White, the Lady Spiders jumped out to an 11-4 lead with only 13 minutes left in the game.

That's when things started to turn around. For the rest of regulation the Minutewomen put together a seven-goal run that would force the deciding overtime period.

Jada Emery got the Maroon and White started with a goal at the 8:57 mark. The offense would continue to attack with the support of their nationally ranked defense, which held the Lady Spiders scoreless for the rest of the game.

"Our defensive end was coming up with balls left and right, they were really playing well," Bolduc said.

McGarrity put one in the net two minutes after Emery. This was to be the last goal scored in regulation by anyone besides Kelli Kurtz and Hope Zelinger.

"I told them not to let down, they knew in the end it would have to come from themselves," Bolduc said.

With two minutes left in the game, Kurtz put together the most amazing display of offensive production that the Minutewomen have seen this year.

Kurtz came down the field with 1:59 left in the game and scored, leaving the Minutewomen behind by only one goal. With time left for one more

Nets survive in game one

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) – Beating the Boston Celtics may not be as easy for the New Jersey Nets as everyone thought.

Kenyon Martin overcame foul problems to score 21 points, and Paul Pierce spoiled a 34-point effort by missing the only shot that really mattered for Boston in a 97-93 New Jersey victory in Game 1 of the Eastern Conference semifinal Monday night.

Nets	97
Celtics	93	Game 1 of the Eastern Conference semifinal Monday night.

Pierce had a chance to tie the game at 96 with 7.4 seconds to play. But his wide-open 3-pointer from the top of the key bounced off the rim, and Martin was fouled getting the rebound.

The Nets' power forward iced the game with 5.9 seconds to play, making his fourth free throw in the final 45 seconds.

If the rest of the best-of-seven series is as good this one, it will be a great matchup between teams that met in last year's East finals.

Game 2 is Wednesday night at the Meadowlands.

Jason Kidd added 15 points, nine assists and six rebounds and Kerry Kittles had 17 points for New Jersey, which had five players in double figures.

Eric Williams had 15 points for Boston, while Walter McCarty and Antoine Walker each added 14 points for the Celtics, who only got 16 points from everyone else.

Neither team led by more than five points in the fourth quarter, with the Nets taking the lead for good at 87-85 on two free throws by Jason Collins with 3:16 to play.

After Walker forced a shot in the lane, Kidd drove the length of the court for a layup with 2:49 to go.

The Celtics, who lost three of four games to New Jersey by an average margin of 21 points in the regular season, wouldn't go away. Pierce got a long rebound of a missed 3 by Tony Delk and hit a 3-pointer to close to 89-88. Walker, who was 6-of-20 from the field, missed a 3-pointer that would have given Boston the lead.

Richard Jefferson scored on a fast break off that missed shot with 1:39 to play.

Boston closed the gap to 91-90 when Williams made two free throws. Martin, who picked up three quick fouls in the first half, hit one of two free throws with 45 seconds to go.

With the crowd chanting defense, the Nets left Delk wide open for a go-ahead 3, but again the shot missed badly. Martin hit two free throws after being fouled on the ensuing rebound to give New Jersey a 94-90 lead with 24 seconds to play.

J.R. Bremer closed the gap to one with another 3-pointer from the corner with 15 seconds to play. Kidd pushed the lead back to three with two free throws two seconds later, then Pierce had his chance to tie the game and missed.

Notes: Kidd averaged a triple double in last year's East Conference finals against the Celtics....Pierce was 15-for-20 from the free throw line....Jefferson and Aaron Williams led the Nets with nine rebounds each.

Wings drop Lucky Luc

By Larry Lage
Associated Press

DETROIT (AP) – The Detroit Red Wings made an expected move Monday by parting ways with left wing Luc Robitaille.

Detroit decided not to exercise its option on Robitaille's contract for next season, saving the team $3 million – perhaps to spend on players such as Sergei Fedorov.

The 37-year-old Robitaille has 631 career goals, ranking first in NHL history among left wings. But he scored just 11 times this season, his 17th, as Detroit finished second in the Western Conference before losing in the first round of the playoffs to Anaheim. Robitaille managed an assist in four games against the Mighty Ducks.

The Red Wings will pay Robitaille $1 million for next season, instead of the $4 million they would have paid if they picked up his option.

"Luc had a great year two years ago scoring 30 goals to help us win the Stanley Cup, but he just didn't have quite the same season this year," general manager Ken Holland said. "We talked to Luc about that a few days ago and let him know that we're going with some younger players. He understood that.

"We're going to find time for Boyd Devereaux on the left wing and Jason Williams will probably make our team up front next season. We may also have Igor Grigorenko and Jiri Hudler as forwards on our roster next season, so there may not be a lot of available spots."

Robitaille also has played for the Kings, Penguins and Rangers.

Cutting Robitaille and bringing back Steve Yzerman for another season have been easy decisions to make over the past week, but Holland's other moves will not be.

Fedorov is an unrestricted free agent and he may command at least $10 million annually in a long-term contract. Darren McCarty, Jason Woolley and Igor Larionov are also unrestricted free agents.

"It is our intention to bring Sergei and Darren back and we're going to make a reasonable effort to do that," Holland said. "But we're running a business and we have to do things that fit into the financial structure of what we're trying to do.

"We've had discussions about bringing Woolley back and I would be comfortable having Igor back for another year."

Agent Pat Brisson, who represents Robitaille, Fedorov and Woolley, did not return phone messages left by The Associated Press.

Holland arrived in Finland on Monday to attend hockey's world championships, primarily to evaluate his second round picks from the past two years: Hudler and Grigorenko.

Hudler is playing for the Czech Republic while Grigorenko is competing for Russia.

Trust Fund budget up for final review

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The $1 Student Activities Trust Fund budget will be up for its final approval by the Student Government Association Senate tonight.

The budget drew some controversy prior to its presentation when groups received unexpected cuts, particularly the SGA. Members questioned the Ways and Means committee when they received a 30 percent cut in their payroll budget for the following fiscal year.

However, Ways and Means Chair Brian Thompson explained to the Senate that if cuts need to happen, they should begin with the SGA. Thompson further explained that due to miscommunication between the SGA and the Ways and Means Committee, a budget was not turned in.

Members of the SGA expressed their own problems with the budget and the cuts given to the Executive Cabinet, as well as the lack of funding allocated for the secretary of diversity position. The secretary of diversity, which was recently instated, was not included for funding under the $1 budget.

President David Carr explained last week that he felt disappointed, but he supports the committee anyway.

Today, members will decide on the final fate of the budget and will vote whether or not to keep it in its entirety. If the Senate chooses to fail it, it will decide the budget for each Registered Student Organization and Agency line by line.

Carr explained that he feels tonight will be interesting due to the fact that many groups were not satisfied with their overall budget.

"It's really hard to tell," Carr said. "A lot of groups were unhappy with the budget, but in the same, we've never had such a large budget overflow in the SGA in a very long time."

SGA President David Carr

Changes also occurred in next year's budget revenues savings because a $5 fee increase was approved, adding an extra $90,000 to the $150,000 already put aside. Carr explained that he felt groups may be frustrated when they know how much money is saved in the revenue account for next year.

"A fee increase was approved for next year, so $5 times 17,000 plus students equals an extra $90,000 for next year," Carr said. "The Ways and Means committee did not know if the increases were going to happen when planning the budget, but it's going to be hard for groups to swallow if they got cut and that money wasn't spent."

Other issues on tonight's agenda are a continuing investigation by the SGA leadership into the instances of last weekend's Hubart Hoedown. Members expressed extreme concerns with students' overall well being, and questions were further raised regarding students' rights.

Speaker Dan Saunders explained that from looking at students' perspectives, many individuals' rights were violated. Saunders further explained that many questions have been left unanswered and that they will be meeting with administrators to further investigate the details of the night.

"It seems people's rights were violated left and right, and we're not going to let this go," Saunders said. "It's so serious that we can't just take people's word for it."

Saunders farther explained that he questions not only the police officers' behavior, but what sparked the violent acts to occur.

"I want to know why people's apartments were pepper sprayed, why people were told they couldn't leave their homes and what happened to trigger this much violence," Saunders said. "I've been told the student perspective, but I want to know who triggered this and it seems like it could have been handled a thousand times better."

Discussion around a motion to put a question on next year's election ballot regarding the proposed change of the Minuteman mascot will also be on tonight's agenda. The motion was tabled at the last Senate meeting due to a lack of information. However, the University of Massachusetts has been under discussion to change the Minuteman mascot to the "Gray Wolves."

The motion further proposes that students vote on the mascot change by means of a referendum question due to the lack of student involvement in the decision process. The motion is being presented by the Public Policy Relations committee.

Tonight's SGA Senate meeting will take place at 7 p.m. in room 163C of the Campus Center. All meetings are open to the public.

Senator predicts borrowing may occur to bridge budget deficit

By Jennifer Peter
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – The state Senate may resort to short-term borrowing as part of its solution to bridge an estimated $3 billion budget deficit next year, according to the leader of its long-term debt committee.

"My opinion is we probably will," said Sen. Mark Montigny, D-New Bedford, who previously headed the Senate budget committee for four years.

"I fear that in the end some of the alternatives are much more hurtful to the people we represent. It may ultimately come down to the lesser of evils."

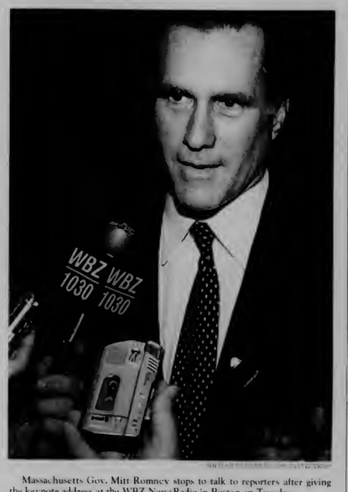
But Gov. Mitt Romney's finance chief argued that borrowing money to help cover the deficit – a proposal the House rejected last week – would lead to an immediate reduction in the state's bond rating.

"If you want to move one step closer to financial disaster, then go right ahead," finance secretary Eric Kriss told Montigny's long-term debt committee Tuesday. "This would put at risk everything that's been done in the past. We're on the precipice."

A spokeswoman for Senate President Robert Travaglini, D-Boston, said short-term borrowing is "just one of many ideas" that Senate leaders have been investigating.

Senate Ways and Means Chairman Therese Murray, D-Plymouth, did not immediately return calls for comment.

The House last week rejected a proposal to borrow $300 million to help soften the impact of budget cuts on the poor and elderly. The House budget, however, reduces the amount of debt the governor's office can issue from $1.2 billion to $800 million – a move Kriss and Montigny said might leave room for future short-term borrowing.



A spokesman for House Speaker Thomas Finneran, D-Boston, disagreed, arguing it was the first step toward limiting the state's high debt load.

Montigny, who called for Tuesday's hearing, said that it would be irresponsible for lawmakers not to fully explore the possibility of borrowing to cover the shortfall, given the deep cuts Romney and the House have proposed in social services.

Kriss predicted it could lead to a downgrading of the state's rating to junk-bond status – a claim Montigny called "super hyperbolic."

The president of the Massachusetts Taxpayer Foundation, who was called to testify at the hearing, also disputed Kriss' claim, arguing that a short-term, limited amount of borrowing might be acceptable if approved as part of a budget solution that also included significant reform.

"Given the dire nature of the fiscal crisis, it's at least worth considering limited borrowing as part of a larger strategy," said foundation president Michael Widmer.

Sniper confession admittable evidence

By Matthew Barakat
Associated Press

FAIRFAX, Va. (AP) – Sniper suspect Lee Boyd Malvo's laughing confession to two of the deadly attacks can be used against him at trial this fall, a judge ruled Tuesday in a decision experts say gives prosecutors a key weapon in their push for a death sentence.

Virtually the entire statement Malvo gave to police Nov. 7 can be admitted as evidence, Circuit Judge Jane Marum Roush ruled over defense objections that Malvo was denied access to a lawyer.

The judge said Malvo's questions about his lawyer were "at best a request for a clarification of his Miranda rights."

Roush did toss out the first two hours of the six-hour interrogation that occurred before Malvo signed a form with an "X" waiving his right to a lawyer and his right to remain silent. Police characterized that portion of the interview as chitchat, though it did include discussion of Malvo's relationship with fellow suspect John Allen Muhammad.

The most damning parts of the interrogation, though, will be admitted as evidence. Some of the interrogation was taped by police, but prosecutors have not specified which parts could end up being played for a jury.

Defense attorneys said the ruling sets a dangerous precedent regarding the rights of juveniles during police questioning. Malvo was 17 at the time of his interrogation.

Malvo, 18, and Muhammad, 42, are accused in at least 20 shootings, including 13 deaths, in Virginia, Maryland, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and Washington, D.C., last year. Both could face the death penalty if convicted.

Prosecutors say the shootings were part of a scheme to extort $10 million from the government. The two were captured at a Maryland rest stop Oct. 24, and Malvo arrived in Fairfax County on Nov. 7.

During questioning that day, Malvo recounted two deadly attacks, including the Oct. 14 shooting of FBI analyst Linda Franklin outside a Home Depot store in front of her husband.

"I asked where he shot her. He laughed and pointed at his head," Fairfax County homicide detective June Boyle testified during a hearing last week.

Malvo also "was laughing about" the fatal Oct. 3 shooting of a man mowing grass in Maryland, Boyle said. "After he shot the man the lawn mower just kept going down the street," she recalled him saying.

Malvo's defense lawyers had asked a judge to suppress the statement, arguing that Malvo had effectively been denied his Miranda rights. But Roush sided with prosecutors, who argued that police reviewed Malvo's rights with him at length.

"Having considered the totality of the circumstances surrounding the police interrogation ... I conclude that his statement was made voluntarily," Roush wrote.

Because prosecutors already have circumstantial evidence linking Malvo to the attacks, legal experts say Tuesday's ruling may prove most significant during the sentencing phase if Malvo is convicted. Prosecutors have vowed to seek the death penalty.

"The fact that he was so callous about (the killings) is definitely going to weigh heavily on a jury," said Joe Bowman, a defense lawyer who has handled death-penalty cases in Virginia.

Malvo's lawyers called the ruling "unfortunate."

"From our perspective, the actions taken by law enforcement with regard to Mr. Malvo's detention, transport to Virginia and interrogation were deliberate and designed to circumvent his constitutional rights," the defense said in a statement.

The defense cannot appeal Roush's ruling until after the trial.

Malvo's lawyers had argued that police and prosecutors conspired to keep Malvo away from his lawyers when federal charges were dropped and he was transferred to Virginia from Maryland.

However, the judge said there was no evidence Virginia authorities "colluded with federal authorities to spirit Malvo away to Virginia without the knowledge of his Maryland attorneys."

Roush also said Malvo had no right to counsel Nov. 7 because federal charges had been dropped and Virginia charges were not formalized until the next day. And even if he had the right to a lawyer, the judge said, he knowingly waived it during questioning by police.

Boyle acknowledged that at the beginning of the interview, Malvo asked, "Do I get to see my attorneys?" Boyle said she answered yes, and Malvo responded, "Because my lawyer said not to talk to the cops until they get here."

Boyle answered that Malvo was facing new charges in Virginia and they needed to get information about him. She also said she told Malvo numerous times he had the right to remain silent and have an attorney present during questioning.

She said Malvo responded, "If I don't want to answer, I won't."

A week of remembrance of those who died in the Holocaust came to the University of Massachusetts last week. In a Five-College effort, Hillel's Holocaust Memorial Week brought music, theater, film and other events to campus.

Participants marked the beginning of the week by placing 2,061 flags in the ground by the Campus Pond on April 27. The flags represented the different minorities who were the victims of the Nazis: Jews, Soviet prisoners of war, Polish citizens, Gypsies, disabled persons, Jehovah's Witnesses and homosexuals were included in the display.

Rachel Pinsker, the Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow of the UMass Hillel, said the event was something that everyone could relate to on their own time.

"It was just a display that was there all week long," she said. "It could be a very individual, personal thing."

Later that evening, the film "Paragraph 175" was shown. The movie is about the persecution of homosexuals in Nazi Germany.

On April 28, the play "Dear Esther" was performed in the Campus Center Auditorium. The play was based on the true story of Holocaust survivor Esther Tener Raab, grandmother of UMass freshman Stefanie Raab. About 45 people attended the performance.

The play tells of the story of Raab's escape from Sobibore, a Nazi death camp in Poland, and her continued survival throughout the war. The performance featured the struggle between Esther Raab as a survivor reluctantly talking to students about her experience, and a young Esther during the war, who desires to be heard. It also showed photographs and had audio clips of the children who wrote to Esther after she spoke to them, asking her more about her survival.

"It took more than luck to survive," Esther answered one of them. "It took hope, determination and instinct, but without some luck, there was no hope for survival."

After the play, Esther Raab came to the front of the auditorium to speak. She reminded the audience that there are fewer survivors who remain alive with each year that passes. There are only six survivors alive today who escaped with her from Sobibore, she said.

A memorial service was held April 29 in the Massachusetts Room at the Mullins Center and was attended by 25 people. The service started with the reading of the names of victims of the Holocaust, which had been taking place all week. Adina Adler, a senior sociology major who spoke at the service, stressed the importance of remembering those who fought back against the Nazis.

"We carry their flames of resistance as flames of remembrance," she said as she lit a candle.

After the service, a woman named Laura Wexler sang songs of the communities that were lost as a result of the Holocaust. She interspersed her family history of survivors into her performance.

On April 30, Max Michelson, a Holocaust survivor, spoke in Campus Center room 101. Michelson is a survivor who lived in Latvia prior to World War II. He is the author of the book, "City of Life, City of Death: Memories of Riga."

Every day of the week, from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m., those who were interested read the names of victims of the Holocaust in an event called the Litany of Martyrs. Pinsker said that this was one of the most effective events of the week.

"The number of people who came up to me while I was...doing the litany, who just said, 'Thank you for doing this,' was amazing," Pinsker said.

The week was sponsored by a variety of organizations in the five-college area, including the UMass Hillel, the UMass Stonewall Center, the UMass Theater Department, the Five College Lecture Fund and the UMass Arts Council Mini Grant.

Sociology major Rachel Rabinovich read the names of those lost at last week's Holocaust Memorial.

'Male Partners of Survivors' support group being offered

By Tom Brennan
Collegian Staff

There's a support group on campus now for men with wives, girlfriends or friends who have been the victims of sexualized violence. The "Male Partners of Survivors" group, which was started by Ben Ostiguy, Educator Advocate for the Everywoman's Center, is a resource for men who are having trouble dealing with the issue.

"Men who support people need support," Ostiguy said, "And we have resources for everybody."

The group, started earlier this semester, hopes to create a community in which men can give and receive the support that is needed when dealing with something as traumatic as the sexual assault of a friend or loved one.

Ostiguy says that the group is there to suggest strategies for better communication with those who the men are close with and to offer accurate and helpful information about the effects of sexualized violence. The group also provides additional referrals to other resources that can be of help to men in this type of situation.

According to Ostiguy, the pillars of the group are confidentiality, openness and respect, which allow for the safety needed for the men involved to share the difficulties they are going through.

According to the Population Information Program's "Population Reports: Ending Violence Against Women," at least one in three women around the world has been beaten, coerced into sex or otherwise abused in her lifetime. And according to the Department of Justice Statistics, the highest rate of abuse is taking place among women ages 16-24.

For this reason, Ostiguy says, it's important for men here at the University and on campuses across the country to be aware of the prevalence of sexual assault and other forms of dating violence. And while it may seem that only women are in a position to help women victims of abuse, that is not the case.

"It's arbitrary to say that women are best prepared to help women," Ostiguy said. "It makes the assumption that men are incapable of being nurturing and helpful."

Ostiguy says that if a man really wants to help when he encounters a situation where a friend or loved one has been attacked, there are a few things he should know.

"You really have to listen to a victim and believe what they're saying," he said. "Each woman has a unique experience, so hear her story out until the end. Let her know that no matter how tense a situation gets, violence is never her fault. Believe that they hurt. Believe they need help."

Ostiguy warns against trying to do too much. Too often, he says, men try to save the day and only end up causing more problems.

"When men take over after a rape or an incidence of relationship violence, it replicates the situation," Ostiguy said. "At this point the victim has already lost her sense of choice. Trying to take over still leaves them powerless.

"A lot of guys say, 'I'll beat the tar out of this guy,' as if that will show that violence is wrong. What you don't know is that in a case of dating violence, you're talking about hurting someone that your friend probably really cares about."

Ostiguy says that instead of playing the hero, it's better to just be a resource for the victim.

"You want to provide options," he said. "You want to give them as many choices as possible. Know what places like the Everywoman's Center have to offer. Know where the organizations like Safe Passage are just in case something like this happens."

It's not about teaching, it's about support, Ostiguy says, which means that the point is to give the victim back as much power as possible.

The Male Partners of Survivors group normally meets every other Wednesday, but will be meeting two weeks in a row this month to make support available to those who need it before the semester ends.

The last two meetings will be today and May 14 at 6 p.m. in Campus Center room 901.

If men are looking for even more support, Ostiguy suggests the drop-in meetings held at the Men's Resource Center in Amherst on Sunday's from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m.

Also, there is the Everywoman's Center hotline, 545-0800, which is not only for victims dealing with sexual assault and other relationship violence issues, but for those supporting a survivor as well.

Bush names special envoy to oversee Iraq

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Bush named L. Paul Bremer, a former ambassador and head of the State Department's counterterrorism office, to be his special envoy to Iraq and oversee its transition to democratic rule.

The appointment resolved a debate between the State Department and the Pentagon over the administration of Iraq, with Secretary of State Colin Powell pushing for greater civilian control and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld seeking a strong hand for the military.

Bremer will become the civilian administrator, heading the transition team that includes retired Army Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, currently the top-ranking U.S. civilian in Iraq. Bremer will oversee all political and reconstruction efforts.

Bush announced the appointment Tuesday during a White House meeting with Rumsfeld. He said he was "sending one of our best citizens" and called Bremer "a man with enormous experience – a can-do type of person."

The president said he has "full confidence" in Bremer, who was present when Bush made the announcement in the Oval Office.

Bremer, 61, was a former assistant to former Secretaries of State William P. Rogers and Henry Kissinger. He was ambassador-at-large for counterterrorism from 1986 to 1989. He also served as U.S. ambassador to the Netherlands.

He later worked for a consulting firm headed by Kissinger and currently serves as chairman and chief executive of the Marsh Crisis Consulting company.

In his new assignment, he will be senior to Garner, a retired Army general, representing a military-to-civilian handoff.

A White House statement on the appointment said that Bremer, as the "senior coalition official in Iraq," would report directly to Rumsfeld. Gen. Tommy Franks, commander of all U.S.-led forces in the region, "will maintain command over coalition military personnel in the theater," the statement said.

Bremer will oversee the transition from rule by Saddam Hussein to a yet-to-be-determined interim Iraqi government. The Bush administration has said it expects this government to include a wide diversity of Iraqi groups.

Bush said Bremer "shares the same values as most Americans share, and that is our deep desire to have an orderly country in Iraq that is free and at peace, where the average citizen has a chance to achieve his or her dreams."

In a question-and-answer session with reporters, Bush reiterated his conviction that the United States would uncover weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

Pentagon officials said Tuesday that experts are examining an Iraqi trailer suspected of being used as a mobile laboratory for chemical weapons.

"I'm not surprised if we begin to uncover the weapons program of Saddam Hussein because he had a weapons program," Bush said. "I will leave the details ... to the experts."

EDITORIAL OPINION

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fiscal responsibility needs to be taken by president's office

Last Thursday, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney demanded an up-or-down vote on the elimination of the University of Massachusetts President's office.

The decision is now in the hands of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, as Romney is standing firm behind his creed to eliminate the position of President William Bulger and his office altogether.

It is still unclear how eliminating the president's office will benefit the UMass system, so at this time we, at The Collegian are not advocating its elimination.

Clearly, the Commonwealth is at a financial crossroads. Budget cuts are going on across the state, not only in our university system but in other areas such as statewide local aid.

Our campus has been looking for ways to cut corners. Last year UMass was forced to offer early retirement to a host of professors, and seven sports were cut from the Athletic Department. This year has seen many of the same. The foreign language requirement was threatened, and there are rumors that the Physical Education department will be cancelled and that more sports will be cut.

The pulse of the campus suggests that Bulger is to blame. Many students and faculty believe that Bulger doesn't are enough about UMass to properly defend it in Boston.

Other deterrents point out that Bulger has yet to take a pay cut from his $304,000 annual salary, while academic departments are in danger. Bulger's staff has yet to take a cut as well.

His three spokespeople including Robert Connolly, make over $100,000 each year. This, while professors are being forced to retire.

Bulger supporters will argue the point by bringing up the amount of money the office raises for the campus each year. We must admit that Bulger's office has done an admirable job raising money for the UMass system.

In this time of crisis The Collegian suggests a reshaping of the University president's office. While the rest of the university system has faced tough cuts, with possibly more to come, Bulger's office has yet to take a blow. Possibly, restructuring and cutting back costs in the president's office will save it from Romney's cutting block.

In addition to this, all the money that is raised has to go through Bulger's office before it is dispersed through the university system. We are not about to make any accusations about the destination of this money. However, it seems that the money isn't being distributed correctly to the campuses. As the flagship campus, it would seem logical that the Amherst campus would be seeing a good portion of it, but it doesn't seem to be the case. The other campuses, which are also suffering under the weight of internal cuts, don't seem to be seeing much of this money either.

A financial restructuring of the president's office is a short-term solution to some of the budgets woes faced by the system. In a time of budget cuts across the Commonwealth, reshaping President Bulger's office without eliminating it may be a more viable option than giving up and eliminating the office completely.

When reality calls, answer

Matt Elder

A few months ago, I was forced with a very difficult decision. It was about what I was going to do this summer. It was summer I was alive.

I've been at a camp of some sort either as a camper, counselor in training and ultimately a counselor and one summer I was an assistant teacher (it's a long story). However, I was aware of the fact I wouldn't be returning to the camp I worked at last year, so this was the chance to move on.

I had to make a resume for my IDEAS class, so I sent it out to a few different places. Hell, I had it, so why not? Anyway, I got a lot of the usual "We're already full, we have no openings," etc. It didn't really bother me because I was unaware of the fact I was actually about to enter the real world. I was probably in denial at that because I always had camp to fall back on.

However, I actually got a bite. I got a great bite. A team in the Cape Cod Baseball League, the best amateur baseball league in the world, offered me the opportunity to follow it around and write about it in the local newspaper. But now I had to decide between the usual safety of day camp, running around with kids all day, or actual real work. I had to decide if I wanted to spend my first summer in 12 years away from a camp. Of course, the pay wasn't what I was expecting. By that I mean the pay was nothing. So obviously, it wasn't the money I was after, but the opportunity. After doing research on interning, I found out that people who interned get about 10 percent more than people who don't. So, that could equal big bucks in the long run. But it always came back to not wanting to leave camp.

A bunch of my friends don't go to college. They already have full time jobs, get up at 7 a.m. to drive an hour to work, get home at 5 p.m. and they're shot for the rest of the night. Anytime I come home for vacation, the weeks get very boring because no one can do anything because they have a "real" job. I know this internship isn't exactly a real job, but it's close enough to make me nervous.

> "I know this internship isn't exactly a real job, but it's close enough to make me nervous."

I am actually taking a step in the real world. No more bringing a turkey sandwich and M&Ms to "work," as I sit on a picnic bench with eight kids who are five. I'm substituting kickball for writing, swimming for reporting and the nurse's office for deadlines. Not exactly my idea of a good time, but it could be worse.

I know people who are trying to get internships in an office building sorting papers. So I guess I can't complain all that much because my internship is watching baseball, my favorite sport, and writing about it in a local paper. It isn't exactly painstaking labor, but it also isn't camp.

Also, a huge difference is that I will be seeing results. The next day I can buy the paper and say to my friends, "Look, I wrote that!" I always thought seeing your work in a paper shows accomplishment, no matter where it's published.

So as you can tell, I made the choice. I decided that the opportunity was worth more than the money. I would make as a camp counselor. My mother will help me out a little financially and I'll try to get a side job, but I can't complain because I'm taking steps toward a real job. I now have this wonderful paper and an internship before I start my junior year. I know people finishing their junior year without this type of experience.

My advice to anyone is to try to get into your field in any way possible. I got a good job, but I would've taken peanut vendor if I had to. These years are when you make the networking that could determine how hard or easy it is finding a job in two years. Sometimes the jobs will suck, but they're jobs that you have to do eventually. Might as well do them while you're 20 and not when you're 24.

Columbus' sad legacy

Columbus Day is only five months away, and Americans will once again celebrate the life of one of the most despicable men ever to walk on the face of the planet.

Jesse Greenspan

As a young man, Christopher Columbus obsessed about finding an ocean route to Asia, and he looked for someone to finance a voyage west across the Atlantic Ocean.

When Columbus approached King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of Spain and told them of his idea, he argued that he would convert the Asian "heathens" to Catholicism, and would find enough gold to help them continue their holy war against the Muslims and Jews. Under the Inquisition at that time, the penalty for not being Christian was death, forced conversion or expulsion.

Ferdinand and Isabella apparently thought this argument was noble and just, so they financed Columbus' first voyage to the New World. In September 1492, Columbus set sail with three ships and around 90 men. At the end of the 15th century, every educated man in Europe knew the world was round, but Columbus seriously underestimated the distance from the west coast of Europe to the east coast of Asia. By October, his crew almost mutinied on him, but they decided to give it a few more days before turning back.

Columbus had promised a reward of 10,000 maravedis (about a year's pay for sailors) to the first person who spotted land. On October 12, a few days after the near mutiny, Rodrigo de Triana did just that. However, instead of giving him the money, Columbus said that he had seen land a few days before, and he pocketed the cash for himself. This kind of greed summed up the majority of his life.

When Columbus and his men arrived in San Salvador, the friendly natives swam out to meet them. Immediately, Columbus began to prepare his conquest.

"They do not bear arms, and do not know them, for I showed them a sword, they took it by the edge and cut themselves out of ignorance," he wrote in his log. "They have no iron. Their spears are made of cane... They would make fine servants... With fifty men we could subjugate them all and make them do whatever we want."

By making a number of false promises to Ferdinand and Isabella, Columbus was given another voyage the next year with 17 ships and almost 1,500 men. This time the Spaniards were out for blood, and they went from island to island taking slaves, raping women, killing children and looking for gold that was never really there.

All natives over the age of 14 had a gold quota they needed to collect every three months, and they were killed if that quota was not met. Since there was virtually no gold in the Caribbean islands, the natives were hunted down and exterminated or taken back to Europe as slaves. In two years, Columbus and his men were responsible for 125,000 deaths on the island of Haiti alone – a full-scale genocide. By 1550, all but 500 of the original 250,000 Indians on Haiti were dead, and by 1650 they were completely extinct.

Bartolome de las Casas, who was one of the only Spaniards to speak out against Columbus, described the atrocities being committed.

"Our work was to exasperate, ravage, kill, mangle and destroy;" he said. "Small wonder, then, if they tried to kill one of us now and then... [Columbus], it is true, was blind as those who came after him, and he was so anxious to please the King that he committed irreparable crimes against the Indians..."

By Columbus' death in 1506, de las Casas estimated the Spaniards had already killed close to three million Indians. Columbus' legacy would live on for generations to come, however, as the Europeans did not stop their policy of genocide or near-genocide toward the Native Americans until the beginning of the 20th century. By that time, they had killed millions and millions of people and had virtually extinguished two entire continents of their native populations.

Despite all of this, the majority of Americans (and Europeans) treat Columbus as a hero, and elementary school kids learn about his heroic voyage for God and glory. There is even a day named in his honor for "discovering" America, though the Indians had already lived there for thousands of years, and Viking and probably African sailors had also already seen the New World. This is not to mention the fact he landed in America completely by luck, and was convinced it was Asia until the day he died.

Proponents of Columbus Day say it should be a celebration of Western civilization, but Columbus' racism, greed, theft, deceit, intolerance and Christian evangelism are a combination of the worst things Western culture has to offer. If people still want to get a Monday off from work in October, let's pick someone else to honor instead.

Younger sibling syndrome

Dan Yagudin

My confession is as follows: my name is Dan, and I am Natty's little brother.

This column is dedicated to all you little brothers and sisters out there. You know who you are, but people rarely seem to care and see you as the individuals that you are. Oh no, they always see you as X's little brother or Y's little sister.

I feel your pain. My entire life I've lived in the shadow of my older sister Natty, and quite a shadow it has been. Take academics, for instance, a subject that parents seem to always turn into a race, pitting one sibling against another. Well, me going against Natty is like David going against Goliath, only Goliath is driving a Sherman Tank (see how far a slingshot gets you here, David)! Natty was so good at academics that the year we moved from Israel, despite having very little exposure to the English language, Natty won an award for English excellence in her honors ninth grade English class. Very few people can match or beat that, and I certainly am not among them, despite my parents' pleas to "be more like Natty."

Younger Sibling Syndrome, as I like to call it, didn't stop at high school. My little brother complex wasn't helped when Natty and I decided to attend the same college. Up until my last semester at UMass (two full years after Natty graduated), I still would be stopped, on occasion, in the middle of campus by a stranger who remembered me only as "Natty's little brother" (and to those people, I have this to say: my name is Dan, I-O-A-N).

> "Natty, take your time, because as soon as you get married, I will be the one facing our parents' 'where are the grandchildren' question every Passover."

Knowing the history of Younger Sibling Syndrome in my family, it took a lot of convincing to get my younger sister Talia to come to UMass. Natty and I labored for a long time to convince Talia that UMass is a big university, and that there is room for three Yagudins to go to the same college. Also, with 24,000 students, she is bound to meet someone who (can you imagine?) has met neither myself nor Natty.

Convinced that this was the place where she could finally rid herself from the burden of being our younger sister, Talia arrived at summer orientation a few years ago. The guy manning the registration table looked her up, and then popped the question: "Wait a minute, aren't you Natty's sister?" Talia rolled her eyes and responded: "Yes, and Dan's sister..." Registration guy looked up in amazement: "You mean Natty Yagudin and Dan Yagudin are brother and sister???" To her credit, Talia didn't run away screaming. She waited a year and then went to South America, where, she was happy to report, no one has heard of Natty or Dan Yagudin.

Younger Sibling Syndrome also has its advantages. On those rare moments when aggression builds up, you always have someone to fight with. You also always have someone to introduce you to people and to show you around. Older siblings are a great source of advice, since they generally deal with the stuff you deal with (college applications, relationships, etc.) before you. As Natty and I are into our young adult years now, I am beginning to find the advantages at this stage of life. For one thing, if you have an older sibling, it means that the pressure is on them to get married first (Natty, take your time, because as soon as you get married, I will be the one facing our parents' "where are the grandchildren" question every Passover). Although sometimes it feels like all you're doing in life is following your older brother or sister's footsteps, it does give you someone to confide in when times get rough.

With this being my last Collegian column, (oh, and did I mention that Natty was a Collegian columnist before me?) I can't think of a better dedication than to my siblings. I do not need to describe on these pages what you have meant to me (and it would probably be more appropriate to say in our native Hebrew), but I will only say that despite the many times when you drove me crazy, and despite Younger Sibling Syndrome, you are the greatest gift that G-d has given me.

Despite living in Natty's shadow and being influenced immensely by her, I eventually found my own friends, accomplished my own achievements, made my own mistakes – and maybe even developed my own personality along the way. To Talia, my younger sister, I want to say that this is the way things will work out for you, too. And whenever you feel bad being a younger sibling, Talia, also remember that you are a part of the problem.

You see, dear readers, there is this guy Rafi, and he is Natty's, Dan's and yes – Talia's – younger brother.

Dan Yagudin is a Collegian Columnist. He is on exchange this semester in Israel.

Growing up and seizing the day

Elizabeth Carter

"Carpe Diem, seize the day!" That is easily one of my favorite lines from "Dead Poet's Society." It's simple, it's trite and it's probably one of the best pieces of advice I have ever heard. Yet despite all the simplicity within this quote, seizing the day seems to be one thing that so many of us simply bypass. We forget that life is meant to be lived, not crawled through face down on our bellies. So we fight, we squabble, we waste our time, we complain, we mope, we act like tomorrow never comes when it's today we should be revering. Truly, what is the point of all this dreariness, what is the point of fighting with anyone at all when they could be gone the next moment? I think that people don't like to think like that. It's too morbid, quite possibly too real, but if we have learned anything from adolescence it should be that what really matters is appreciating what you have, and not being jealous because you don't have enough.

We all remember middle school. Those painful awkward days, many of us had braces, were pretty goofy and were really self-conscious (and if you weren't, well kudos to you). One of the things I really remember from middle school, aside from "Dawson's Creek," was just how cruel and petty myself and my friends could be to each other. We were constantly fighting, gossiping and playing silly childish games. It seemed that during those times each and every one of us was constantly on the docket being judged. Were we cool, were we attractive and most importantly, were we popular? All those questions were of such enormous importance. Before all that could quite end, up came high school. Here people could still be pretty small-minded, but the situation was starting to look up. Although still judged by all, most of us were learning that the judgment we received was about as credible as the source, and I for one didn't go to high school with a bunch of Rhodes Scholars. There was still the fair share of gossip and other types of silliness going down, but it was a little easier to deal with because each of us was slowly growing up, maturing and realizing that there are more important things than those that lie on the surface.

In high school, one of the most important lessons I learned was that we all aren't guaranteed a tomorrow. I watched a number of classmates, some I knew and others, who were just names, pass away from car crashes, drug overdoses and freak accidents. After experiencing the very unnatural deaths of so many teenagers I knew, I began to learn that there's really no point in wasting time with the foolishness of the past or preoccupying ourselves with the idiocy of the day. There's no point in fighting with people for no reason at all, there's no point in holding needless grudges for reasons that no one can even define and quite simply, there's just not enough time to do all that and still reap all the joy out of life that we can. If middle school and high school taught me anything, it was how to grow up. It taught me how to stop being a child, how to stop acting trivial and how to start appreciating the bigger more important intangible things in life. I think the real sorrow in life lies in those who don't quite receive that message clear.

We are adults now, yet still so many of us are playing the games of middle schoolers and high schoolers. It is almost as if at this point in our lives we faction off into two groups. Some of us will rise above the trees to see the forest, realizing just how insignificant and small so many things can be, while the others are stuck down on the ground with their noses to the bark, believing that the bark is what really matters. A poor analogy, maybe, yet in spite of the badly executed attempt, I think we all understand clearly enough the point I am trying to make. And overall, my point is this; life keeps going, we aren't infinite, we aren't eternal and most of us aren't children anymore. It's time to stop the immaturity of the past. There is nothing to gain from it, what you have is probably more than most and it's time to embrace today. For realistically, tomorrow never does come, all we have is the now.

Father and son reunion

Regan McKendry

Unlike some seniors who are planning on skipping graduation festivities, I'll be there with several thousand others all donning caps and gowns. Though I know I'll enjoy the event, another major reason I'm making the appearance is for my family. Graduation ceremonies are more for one's parents than anything else. It's their chance to see what we have achieved. And for the first time in a while, I'll have my whole family there.

My father is making the trip up from Raleigh, N.C. to be here Memorial Day weekend. It'll be the first time I've seen him in nearly three years. Are my emotions mixed? Absolutely. I'm awaiting that weekend with concurrent nervous anticipation and apprehension on so many levels.

Like any kid nowadays, I'd grown up with divorce all around me. I had an aunt and an uncle who had each been divorced (one of them twice), as well as numerous friends at school whose parents had split. Even though mine fought incessantly, the fact that they were still together when I started my five-year journey through UMass made me feel that I was in the clear.

Two months later, my parents decided to call it quits, just after their 18th anniversary. Needless to say, Halloween, which fell on that weekend, will never truly be the same. Massachusetts has had the lowest divorce rate in America for more than a decade, yet my parents had to go back the trend.

I don't know if it was more difficult on my three younger siblings, 15, 13, and 11 at the time, or on myself, being older and having just moved out of the house. While my brothers and sister didn't have a dorm room to flee to, I had gotten pretty complacent in my mindset that I had made it through the worst of the storm. I'd turned 18, become an adult, started college – divorce doesn't happen to the parents of college students. Or so I wanted to think.

A year after my father moved out, he and his girlfriend moved down to North Carolina. He's come up before once or twice to visit, but I always was occupied with something on those days (or at least I made sure I was busy). I didn't want to see him, nor did I really want to talk with him.

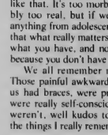
When my parents split up I was equally mad at both of them due to the fact that they let the marriage die. There were no counseling sessions, no attempts at reconciliation; it just ended. I know money troubles were a partial cause of fighting, but that should not be used as a scapegoat for allowing 19 years of wedded bliss to disintegrate.

It was easier by necessity to get back on good terms with my mother first. I still had to live at home with her, and I found the silent treatment lasted only the first weekend I was home. She also was still taking care of us, as she is much better off financially than my father. An added bonus was her boyfriend cares very much about my siblings and I, and is always there to help out. My father's new wife (I guess our stepmom, but she'll never be called that) really could care less about the four of us.

Even when my father only lived a half hour away, it was still very easy to just avoid him. Since I was 18 at the time, my mother never forced me to go on visits that my siblings had to; I just made sure I'd be at work those times. When he moved down south, I basically took the attitude of, "Do what you want, as long as it doesn't include me."

Somewhere along the way I lost the anger. Time doesn't heal all wounds, but just maybe it scars them over. I did miss talking with my Dad, letting him know what was going on in my life. I started to make the occasional phone call to him this senior year. I'd speak with him every month or two and let him know what was up, especially as school was coming to a close. I was finally concluding the chapter in my life that began with him in it, but is closing with him off in the nosebleed seats.

There's a song by Mike and the Mechanics entitled "The Living Years." The singer laments his father having passed away before they could make amends over disagreements. When I withdrew from contact with my father, I couldn't listen to that song anymore, it hurt just too much. Only in these past few months have I allowed it to play without changing the radio station when it comes on.



I'm excited for his visit. I can't wait to show him the pictures from my trip to Notre Dame in the fall (as that holds a special meaning for us both), and finally try to catch up a little on this past half decade.

The anger is still there, and it will never go away. Yet life is too short to let the anger consume me. You see, I didn't start talking with him again to make him feel better. I did it for me. I needed to have some semblance of a relationship back. It may not be perfect, but as I prepare to finally get that diploma, it is a relationship that I am OK with. We all grow up when we graduate, finally advancing into the world of adults. However, at least for one final time, this kid gets to see his dad.

Write what you know

Stephanie O'Shea

Yellow tassels do not come for free, and one charge on the Commonwealth College installment plan is to take Deans Book three times. This course requires students in groups of 20 to read a mandated book and discuss it for seven weeks. The reading choice was so heinously boring my first time through, that the only things I learned were how to stave off that anxious feeling in my legs long enough not to freak out and to fully appreciate the exact moment that class ended, because it signified the longest possible time before I had to go back.

After a boycott that lasted a year and a half, I got on the Deans Book train again this semester. Someone must have swallowed their pride in Goodell, because their most recent choice was not just tolerable, but spectacular. The Massachusetts Department of Education has been making me read since 1987, and "A Heartbreaking Work of Staggering Genius" by Dave Eggers is the only book to have entertained and inspired me despite being read aloud by that token kid across the room that needs to speak up. Being only a few years older than myself, Dave Eggers wrote something that could contend with my television lineup and win. On top of that, he was a Pulitzer Prize finalist for a piece of writing that I could match given enough development and time in front of the computer.

> "It is easy and challenging at the same time to transfer the thoughts I have while showering or driving into something worthy of public display."

Eggers retells the story of his life, and I am going to rip him off in the short space of six hundred words that I have left in this column by doing the same about myself, movie trailer style.

I burst onto the scene on June 25, 1982.

I like to tell people that I was scarred for life at a young age when my family went to McDonald's. I told my mom that I was getting a Happy Meal, asked her what she was getting, and she said a Sad Meal. My mom says that I should be happy if that is the worst thing to ever happen to me. I am.

When I was 10-years-old, "Wayne's World" was in theatres. There is one scene when Wayne and Garth are driving on a highway, and the road signs are visible. I told my mom that they must be driving in Massachusetts, but she informed me that they were driving in Illinois. I thought for years that the hat on Mass Pike signs was a leprechaun hat, and that the signs were green because Massachusetts has a large Irish population.

My family subscribed to America Online when I was in eighth grade, back in the day when the service was sold by the hour and chat rooms were considered to be cool. So began my serious computer habit, marked by a chubby midsection and the descent from perfect vision to the need to wear glasses. AIM unleashed a beast upon this world, because profiles and away messages were my original platforms to get attention through words.

I was out of my element in high school, simply because I never understood the logic of unity based on the fact that everyone's parents purchased homes in the same zip code sometime during the '80s. That time period, however, introduced me to such niceties as the all T-shirt and sneaker wardrobe, the sweet nectar of coffee and getting better grades than other people.

As a freshman in college, I thought that I came up with the idea to rig up sheet walls around my top bunk. My invention was called the Upstairs Batcave. I later found out that every frat guy on Earth has the same setup. My friend Julez and I also devised plans to run plastic tubing from our Britas to our pillows through holes cut into our refrigerators and to make the world's largest rum and Coke in a giant orange Gatorade container. Neither scheme made it off the ground.

This past January, a doctor told me that I have Seasonal Affective Disorder. This means that when the days get shorter and there is less light, my melatonin, a hormone that has to do with sleep, goes into overdrive, causing depression and the mindset that anyone who goes against me is an insolent waste of life. This tears of a clown story is marked by excessively long sleep sessions, new and creative insults and the consumption of Nacho Cheesier Doritos. I am the college stereotype gone too far.

Some people print out guitar tabs or hit the pavement with New Balance sneakers, but this semester I found out that what I love and want to get better at is writing. It is easy and challenging at the same time to transfer the thoughts I have while showering or driving into something worthy of public display. I put my ideas through long and grueling tests of worthiness; a process proliferated by the kick I get out of myself when I figure out just what to say.

50 Cent a good choice for Spring Concert

Nick Ames

I think it's only fair that my last article of the semester concentrate on someone other than myself. This is certainly not the first article written about 50 Cent, nor will it be the last, and while some might say that I am capitalizing on his name to get people to read this article, I assure you that these next few paragraphs are here to glorify 50 and not myself.

Like most of you, I was absolutely thrilled to hear that 50 would be performing at our Spring Concert. Anyway, it just goes to show that however many times our school shafts us; they always find some way to win our hearts back. I think what makes 50 so appealing to our age group is his sheer energy. He's one of the only musician/entertainers out there today who can match the intensity of thousands of lewd college students. He can bring it nice with "21 Questions," he can bring it mean with "Patiently Waiting" and he can tear the place down with whatever the hell he wants to. We love him like we love Eminem because he's unpredictable; you don't know whether he'll dap you or cap you.

Before his show on Sunday, I was somewhat worried that with his meteoric rise to fame there might not be anywhere for him to go but down. As of 11 p.m. that night I realized that I was gravely mistaken. He deserves every good word said about him and then some. This guy did what Ludacris couldn't accomplish in an hour and half, in 45 freakin minutes. He got the crowd behind him, he got the crowd involved, he didn't stand back and let his friends do the show, he stood on speakers, he ran down the front row, he was so pumped to be here he took off from his bodyguards and ran a lap around the whole floor. Guys, this man took off his trademark Teflon bulletproof vest five minutes into the show because he knew he was among friends. Even his sense of humor is top notch, pretending the show was over and walking halfway off stage before turning around and busting into a new song.

> "I mean for Pete's sake, I know some of you who can't even wake up in the mornings, give this man some credit."

Already, only a few shows into his touring career, and this guy knows how to work the crowd. He must have thrown away four or five of his hats to the crowd by the time the show was over, not to mention giving away a hotel's worth of what appeared to be white washcloths and towels. I'll admit it; I would throw down for one of this guy's washcloths. Ohhh man, I can still feel the excitement 48 hours later, that's how much of a good time I know we all had. It is so nice to finally see a musician who enjoys what he does. Even in my shwag seat way up in the balcony, I could see this man's smile. He doesn't take any audience for granted and he translates the excitement we give him by showing up 10,000 strong into giving us the show of a lifetime. Even if I am unlucky enough to never see 50 perform again, I will go to my grave knowing I saw someone who is destined to be one of the great legends of our generation.

Oh yeah, and for those of you who are complaining that he didn't play long enough, he performed on "Saturday Night Live" the night before, at SUNY-Oswego on Sunday afternoon and then hoofed his ass all the way to western Massachusetts to show us his love on Sunday night. I mean for Pete's sake, I know some of you who can't even wake up in the mornings, give this man some credit. I would like to thank 50 Cent for his performance, the University for paying for him to come, my fellow students for bringing the ruckus and the Collegian for putting up with my offbeat articles... Oh yeah, and I apologize to the Mullins Center. Somehow when all was said and done on Sunday night, I ended up with a few of your very comfortable padded chairs in my apartment. Hollllllllla!

Letters to the Editor:

Unjustly demonizing conservatism

To the Editor:

I am writing in regards to Robert Carey's column entitled, "The Republican Proletariat." I, being someone of the conservative persuasion, was much less insulted by Mr. Carey's comments and much more happy to see a liberal making such ridiculous and hypocritical claims. His particular characterization of conservatie as "cruel...corrupt...and flawed" was exceptionally laughable. The idea that every conservative on this campus or in this nation has an agenda of hate and contempt is purely made up. The conservative agenda is one of virtue and equality. While the left looks to policies to ensure equal outcome, the right looks to policies for equal opportunity. Programs like school vouchers that have the potential to take the poor and disadvantaged and give them a better shot at life, are universally rejected by the Democrats in this country. Even while the constituents of the Democratic Party support these programs, their representatives almost unanimously shoot it down. This is indicative of a much larger problem, mainly the disconnect between the democratic representation and the represented. Liberals in America are just as much corporate insiders and old money as any conservative candidate.

As far as the issue with France is concerned, Mr. Carey is totally correct. France owes the United States nothing and vice versa. However, France owes the world quite a bit. Many years ago, France aided a fledgling republic in its struggle against an oppressive regime. Why now, do they refuse to do the same for the Iraqis? The answer is that this time their wallets are in question. The French have maintained lucrative and illegal oil contracts with the Iraqis and are the third largest consumer of Iraqi oil after Russia and Germany. Where have I heard those countries before?

While Mr. Carey casts Republicans in a whole-heartedly xenophobic light, this is actually not the case. Republicans are not opposed to immigration if the immigrants have something to offer to the country, and are willing to pursue the proper and legal means of entrance. There should be no tolerance for people who enter illegally or who look to live off of my tax dollars. In regards to language within our great nation, while English may not be the official language, it is the most successful. If we are to ensure an equality of starting points then all people wishing to one day succeed need to get real and learn the language of success. It is naive to think that any language other than English is going to give anyone as good a chance at prosperity within our borders. Learning English is not a destruction of their native culture, it is a positive step in the right direction for those who seek equality.

While other nations may ensure free health care, it is no coincidence that those countries also have hospitals of much lower quality than ours, and that their tax rates are often astronomical. Our capitalist, free market system ensures that the leaders in medicine, science and industry come to the United States. If the health care system was so bad in the United States, then all of our illegal immigrants would surely go to Canada and take advantage of their socialized health care.

In a last note, conservatives are not children struggling to grasp anything. They are just as much adults as any liberal. Conservatives and liberals have fundamentally different ways of looking at the world, nation, community, culture, family and most importantly, citizen. These differences do not make either group inherently wrong or evil, just different.

Lastly, I hope Mr. Carey doesn't consider himself an informed voter with Howard Zinn and Nietzsche on his reading list. Perhaps a more diversified thought scheme is in order. I hope that liberals on this campus would take the time to consider the sources of conservative policy and not be so quick to demonize everyone that thinks equality and freedom are good things.

NUANCE and SIRPS hold no one back

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to Sanam Hakim's article on April 30. I take offense at that article because I find it uninformed and ignorant. First of all, NUANCE is not a minority dorm, it is a multicultural one. Multi, meaning many. Many cultures. How having a dorm that tries to attract many different cultures "gives minorities a chance to be separated from the rest of campus" is beyond me. Does the wellness SIRP separate non-drinkers from the rest of campus? I think not. I doubt there is anyone that goes, "Oh, look at the group of wellness kids." How is being in an environment that had many different cultures "being with only one group of people?"

As a resident of Gorman and a member of NUANCE, I have experienced first hand the positive influence NUANCE has on my building. I have never lived or visited a friendlier or more family-like building in all my years here. NUANCE programs stress diversity and routinely teach and educate people about different cultures. It helps because the likelihood that at least one person in the building has a firsthand perspective on whatever issue is being discussed is high. Saying that this program is "holding back the individual from individual growth" is frankly, to me, quite perplexing. It's like saying the residents of Lewis, the international dorm, are being held back from growth. If learning about different ways of life, learning to at least tolerate if not embrace different opinions, living in a friendly and nurturing environment and actually getting to know the people you five with is being held back from individual growth, I'm not sure I want to grow.

Mullins madness

Dave dazzles, while 50 Cent falls short of expectations

At Spring Concert

By DANIEL BOURGEOIS

THIS YEAR'S SPRING CONCERT played rather similarly to last year's. Once again, the main event was outshined by the act that played before.

The band befor- that served to entertain a niche audience, while the first act completely amazed. The host was entertaining and hilar ious, but someone needed to take the mic away from the DJ.

The show began with an astonishing six-song performance by local talent Cold Duck Complex. If Talib Kweli replaced Black Thought as the lyricist for The Roots, you would have these guys. The Cold Duck Trio and Platypus Complex played off each other perfectly – pe fally when they performed "Man Hate Man." As

An Acoustic Evening

By LIZZY NIELSEN

FEW FORCES ON THIS PLANET possess the power to silence over a thousand intoxicated college students. Dave Matthews, Tim Reynolds and two acoustic guitars possessed that authority on Monday night at the Mullins Center.

Matthews and Reynolds played a three-hour acoustic show as a benefit for the Tiger Kloof School in South Africa. Matthews' uncle is heavily involved in the rejuvenation of this Christian educational facility and Matthews and Reynolds decided to use their talent to assist financially.

It was an extraordinarily intimate setting as only half the Mullins

Student musician gets ready for future career

Jared Fiske is just an ordinary UMass student, but with a little twist; he's a talented musician who just produced his own CD with his band, The Jared Fiske Trio.

I met Fiske a couple of weeks ago when my roommate met him for lunch at the Blue Wall. After learning about his rocker abilities (singing, playing guitar, composing music and writing lyrics), I decided to share them with you guys. Lucky you. (I'm not being sarcastic.)

Rockin' Out

Samara Marblestone

Fiske is musically inspired by his father, Rob Adams, who sings and plays guitar professionally at weddings, restaurants, etc.

"He's very successful," Fiske said.

He's also inspired by Smashing Pumpkins lead vocalist Billy Corgan, Nine Inch Nails lead vocalist, Trent Reznor and Tori Amos. Some of his lyrics are based on real experiences, while others are just created for the song's mood.

Fiske has been performing solo since his freshman year. He has played gigs at Van Meter dormitory, and for over a year, he gets paid to play every Friday night from 7 to 10 p.m. at Salem Cross, a restaurant in Brookfield.

From the first second I met him, I could tell how serious Fiske was about his music. Fiske, a sophomore English education major from Sturbridge, leads his band at guitar and lead vocals, as well as writing the lyrics and music. His fellow bandmates consist of bassist Stephen Frost, a sophomore English major from Richmond, VA, and drummer Matt Rosenberg, a junior Russian and Eastern European studies major from Medway. Fiske has been singing since he was six and playing guitar since he was 12. Frost has been playing bass for three years and Rosenberg has been playing drums for 12 years.

The Jared Fiske Trio has only been around for a month. Fiske met Frost at orientation, and met Rosenberg briefly five years ago and again about a month and a half ago at a jazz concert. Although the band has played some covers of Radiohead, Smashing Pumpkins and The Beatles, it mainly plays original music.

"I try to stay away from comparing us to other bands," Fiske said. "We're like a big melting pot of rock music, with a real emphasis on song writing with an acoustic flavor."

Fiske's description was quite mysterious and vague, so I'll add in my opinion to help you out. His music is absolutely amazing; I've never heard rock music so technical and detailed. You know how Dave Matthews is considered to have technical music? Well, that's how Fiske is, but much better. You can tell how much effort was put into composing the music and writing the lyrics.

The Jared Fiske Trio's debut album, "Flood the Foundation," was put together, recorded and produced all by Fiske. It is composed of 10 tracks, all original tunes. Frost and Rosenberg were not recorded on the album, since Fiske was working on it before they formed a band. Ray Kingston (Fiske's friend) played drums for the album. His older brother, Seth Adams (a junior UMass music education major), played some bass, as did his father, Rob Adams. Amy Herrera, a friend, sang some background vocals for the album as well. Fiske hopes to release it by early this summer.

After that, he'll be sending it to record labels, local stores and radio stations. Frost will be permanently going back home to Virginia at the end of the semester, so Fiske and Rosenberg will be looking for a new bassist.

The Jared Fiske Trio plays weekly at Van Meter, has performed at the recent Van Meter Shindig and has played at Union Billiards in the Student Union. As of now, they are making some calls to expand their performance resume. Fiske would ideally like to make a living off of playing music.

"For all three of us, music is our desired career," he said. "It's our passion."

Fiske's music is for rock lovers with a real appreciation for song writing and acoustics. It's really relaxing to listen to, and I can really see Fiske making a great career out of it. He's going to be big – really big. There's no way that a man so musically talented will not be extremely successful.

One blossoming new rock band

By LAUREN DEFILIPPO

"An eight-year-old girl who loves video games dancing in her sleep" is how Steve Detrachet describes the sound of his band, Paris. Bandmates Joe Boardy and Dave Hadden agree with a smile.

It is this combination of honesty and irreverence that makes "eight-bit art rockers from space" Paris unique. Paris' all-ages show goes more of an experience than a didactic concert event. Citing diverse influences such as Stereolab, Yo La Tengo and Pig Flaming Lips, the University of Massachusetts seniors insist that with them, "there is no ego with music."

Formed in April 2001, Paris began playing basements and other out of the ordinary venues like greenhouses in the Amherst/Northampton area. In a little under a year, the trio managed to cross the Atlantic, playing a series of shows in London while on academic exchange.

The band's live presentation takes on more of the feel of a performance art piece. Paris members create mission statements for each performance that outline how they feel the audience should fashion their demeanor during that set. The statements usually encourage the audience to sit or lay down and to let go of all thought. The statements are simply half-sheets of paper with not-so-precise typewritten text. All this adds to the indie vibe surrounding the band. A typical evening with Paris might also include film strips and random family slides projected behind them as they play. Their physical presence is what they referred to as "sedate."

Paris' self-described "instrumental arsenal" is comprised mostly of thrifty yard-sale finds, as well as your typical strung and percussion components. Remember that Casio keyboard you got for Christmas when you were eight? It might be in their hands now. The quirky nature of the instruments and the frequent ability of the musicians to switch instruments mid-set eludes not only to their musicianship, but also reflects the idiosyncratic nature of the band members' own personalities.

When asked to describe what makes their sound different, drummer Steve Detrachet noted that the music is spacey in contrast to the "shins relined idea" of what spaces actually intones.

"[The sound is] spacey and

It was just a month ago that Amanda Bynes, the charming, chipmunk-cheeked Nickelodeon teen starlet was shipped off to London for the dreadful little girl fantasy "What A Girl Wants." Now Hilary Duff, the charming, chipmunk-cheeked teen starlet from that other kid's network, has been shipped off to Rome to star in a dreadful little girl fantasy, this one called "The Lizzie McGuire Movie."

As far as bubblegum middle-school girl fairy tales go, "The Lizzie McGuire Movie" is barely an improvement over the soggy banality of "What A Girl Wants." This movie is based on a popular TV series about the misadventures of a middle school girl coming of age, but not one moment in this film feels authentic or original. Every second of every scene in "The Lizzie McGuire Movie" seems to have been lifted from another source altogether. If you need a measure of how tired the movie is, remember that the Olsen twins already did this movie first.

The Lizzie McGuire TV show appealed to kids because of its realistic (or as realistic as the Disney Channel will allow) look at a young woman making her way through the maze of adolescence. It was a favorite because its target audience could empathize with Lizzie's trials and tribulations as she grew up. The movie betrays that audience by turning Lizzie into Britney Spears.

"The Lizzie McGuire Movie" sends Lizzie and her classmates on a field trip to Rome following middle school graduation. Lizzie McGuire and her family live in the kind of suburban neighborhood with a public school that could never, ever afford a trip to Rome, let alone a week-long stay in the kind of plush hotel that probably costs $500 a night. Yet here they are, the graduating class traveling to one sightseeing spot after another while dealing with the drill-sergeant barking of their future high school principal, Ms. Ungermeyer (Alex Borstein. Of "Mad TV.")

Lizzie meets a popular Italian pop star named Paolo (Yani Gellman), who seduces the young woman with his sweet smile, David Cassidy hair and cheesy Italian accent. Lizzie is a dead ringer for his ex-partner Isabella, a raven-haired diva who stormed off to a tropical isle when he broke up the group to pursue more mature musical interests. He needs the smitten Lizzie to impersonate Isabella at an awards show appearance so they aren't sued for breaking contract.

COURTESY BUENA VISTA MEDIA

"The Lizzie McGuire Movie" lacks the realistic aspect fans have come to love in the hit Disney television series, stripping it of all originality.

"The Lizzie McGuire Movie" builds to one of those fake confront-your-fears/follow-your-dreams climaxes where everyone gathers to watch the heroine glow and the bad guys get their rightful comeuppance. Lizzie has the usual loyal male friend who secretly likes her (Adam Lamberg, the only one to give an actual performance). Plus,

Matthews and Reynolds shine

Center was utilized for seating. The small stage was set on the west side of the arena, and two guitars and stools rested upon the stage with transparent white veils encompassing the backdrop. Chaos resided in the Mullins Center until Matthews and Reynolds took the stage at about 7:15 p.m. There was some initial hollering from the crowd, including exclaims of "I paid $150 for tickets," but when Matthews commanded attention, he got it.

Matthews and Reynolds opened with the sedate and dismal song "Bartender," from Matthews' latest release, "Busted Stuff." Matthews paused after the first number to thank everyone for coming, and to explain a little bit about the Tiger Kloof School and its importance to the community of South Africa.

Some of the more comical aspects of the evening could be attributed to Matthews, who launched into several random tangents involving Floridian attack mosquitoes and fixations with the words "boob" and "lug," and the fact that he is a self-proclaimed "boot man."

"There are some aspects of our culture that I was glad to see go," Matthews said. "But I really think we should go back to saying 'you big boob.' And what about lug? 'You big lug.'"

Musical highlights on the evening were the delicate and sensitive ode to drinking your heartbreak away, "Grace is Gone," the hardcore fan favorite "#41," "Satellite," the emotion-packed female torment song, "Grey Street" and the beautiful acoustic version of radio hit "Crash Into Me."

"Some of you like this song," Matthews said in regards to the 1996 radio friendly number. "Some of you don't. I think it's OK."

The hands down absolute shining moment of the night was the phenomenal guitar playing of Tim Reynolds. At two separate points in the evening, Matthews left the stage to allow Reynolds to serenade the audience with his inhuman guitar-playing skills. During these two five-minute guitar solos, Reynolds had the entire 4,000-person crowd eating out of the palm of his hand. The crowd was in complete awe of his skill, and Reynolds was rewarded with a full standing ovation after the second number for his efforts.

Matthews rejoined Reynolds, and the two closed out the evening with "Dancing Nancies," off "Under the Table and Dreaming." After leaving the stage, the audience remained on its feet cheering for a solid five minutes before Reynolds and Matthews returned to the stage for their encore. Little flickers of lighter shone all over the Mullins Center, desperately seeking just a few more minutes of music from the acoustic masters.

Upon returning to the stage, Matthews and Reynolds closed out the evening with a beautiful rendition of the poppy radio hit, "Ants Marching." They were rewarded with yet another standing ovation, and quietly left the stage, waving their appreciation to the sold-out audience.

The musicality of the show was amazing, and the stage show was fabulous. Matthews is far more entertaining and interactive with the audience in an acoustic setting, as opposed to traveling with the rest of his band. Matthews is a talker, and Reynolds remained quiet for the majority of the evening, almost making Reynolds the Silent Bob to Matthews' Jay. Matthews seemed to enjoy amusing the audience with his random antics, but did pause to apologize for it at one point in the evening.

"I'm sorry for all my rambling," Matthews said. "It's kind of like an affliction when you put a microphone in front of me."

For those who haven't seen Matthews in an acoustic setting, it's like seeing a completely different performer than the one you'll catch while the Dave Matthews Band rocks Gillette Stadium. He's far more open and talkative, and seemingly much more relaxed. Reynolds and Matthews have impeccable chemistry together, both musically and personality-wise, and they created an unbelievably enjoyable and intimate musical atmosphere for those 4,000 individuals lucky enough to be in attendance.

Quality In Everything We Do

Rahzel conquers Mullins Center at this year's Spring Concert

Platypus increased his vocal intensity, the band was right there to match it with their instruments, and the crowd ate it up.

In between sets, the crowd was treated to the comedic stylings of Eric Nieves, who was extremely funny and was one of the better bouts that the Spring Concert has seen in recent memory. When Nieves wasn't there, DJ Menace successfully spun the hits to keep the crowd's attention.

Next up were Reel Big Fish, which performed a decent hour-long set. People who weren't completely turned off by ska back when pop radio played it to hell in 1997 got a solid performance by one of the best bands still around in that genre. The first half of the performance was heavily ska and started to wear thin on non-RBF fans, but the second half of the performance is where they really picked up momentum and ran with it. They started to rock out a little more and had the crowd completely enthralled by their superb cover of a-Ha's "Take On Me." They closed it out with their biggest hit, "Sell Out," and received a good response from the crowd throughout the set.

Then came the show's highlight in the form of the beat box champion of the world, Rahzel. It was his first time in the area in a while, and he has clearly improved as both a beat boxer and a performer. Rahzel is clearly perfecting the "beat and the rhyme at the same time" style, doing so with "If Your Mother Only Knew," Mos Def's "Ms. Fat Booty" and Shai's "If I Ever Fall In Love Again," amongst several others. His DJ, JS-1, is one of the best out there, and when he went back and forth with Rahzel during the "Man vs. Machine" act, the crowd witnessed one of hip-hop's finest moments.

But after that, the show went downhill. Someone decided not to let DJ Menace spin. Instead, he was expected to kill time with just a mic before 50 Cent was ready to perform. However, the crowd simply didn't want to hear it. After about 20 minutes of being assured that 50 was on his way, it eventually happened.

But before 50 actually approached the stage, a good 13 members of his crew went out before him. Most of them had microphones, which is never a good thing. It took a good two songs to finally pinpoint which one was actually 50, which was even harder since he sounded a lot raspier than he does on his albums.

Though it had its moments, namely "Many Men," the shortened "Heat" and "Patiently Waitin" and the hit "In Da Club," the performance was lacking. With the exception of Lloyd Banks and 50 himself, no one should have had a mic, especially the one guy who screamed over 50's rhymes more than a DJ Clue bootleg. It didn't help that every other person on stage took away from 50's stage presence. 50 seemed like a high-energy performer, but when you have some no-name posse member throwing towels and flailing his arms all over the place, you can't help but pay attention to that nonsense.

FINAL INSTRUCTION

For Seniors About The Commencement Ceremony

133rd Commencement Ceremony Sunday, May 25, 2003

PRE-COMMENCEMENT GENERAL INFORMATION:

- There is no Commencement rehearsal.
- Tickets are not required and there is no limit on the number of guests you may invite. There is no reserved seating. The stadium is uncovered. The ceremony will be held at the stadium, rain or shine. Tell your guests your entry and exit gate numbers.
- UNIVERSITY REGULATIONS PROHIBIT THE POSSESSION OR USE OF ALCOHOL AT THE STADIUM. NO GLASS OR METAL CONTAINERS WILL BE ALLOWED IN THE ASSEMBLY AREA OR ON THE FIELD. THIS POLICY WILL BE ENFORCED FOR BOTH GRADUATES AND GUESTS.
- Photographs of graduates will be taken in the assembly area by Chappell Images. Proofs will be mailed to your permanent address. You decide to purchase or not – no obligation.
- The Index (the yearbook) may be ordered by calling 545-0848.
- Commencement Videotapes and DVDs may be ordered by calling 545-1283. Also, there will be a booth at the stadium where they may be ordered.
- The University Club on campus will be open to the public and will serve gourmet meals from 12 noon to 4 p.m. It accepts MasterCard, Visa, Diner's Club, and Carte Blanche. Please call 545-2551 to make reservations as soon as possible.
- Disability Services: For mobility or hearing impaired guests, please call 545-0892. For guests who are unable to walk long distances, please park in Lot 25 near the Mullins Center. Shuttle buses will provide transit to and from the stadium. Wheel chairs are also accommodated.
- Diplomas will be mailed after the grades have been received, recorded and processed by the Registrar's Office, and the diplomas have been engrossed, which is usually in early September. Inquiries may be made to the Registrar's Office, 545-6296.

COMMENCEMENT MORNING TIME SCHEDULE:

- 9:00-9:15 a.m.: Students should arrive at the assembly area, Yellow Lot #11, no later than 9:15 a.m., carrying their cap and gown.
- 9:15 a.m.: George Parks, Director of the Minuteman Marching Band, and Commencement Marshals will help graduates line up by school/college and escort the Processional onto the field.
- 9:40-10:00 a.m.: Chappell Images photographs individual graduates.
- 10:00 a.m.: Faculty Processional begins. Faculty greet Degree Candidates.
- 10:05 a.m.: Processional of Degree Candidates (See entrance gates).
- 10:25 a.m.: Platform Party Processional.
- 11:45 a.m.: Recessional begins. Graduates exit through north gates #1 and #2.
- 12:00 noon: Ceremony ends - Alumni status begins!

WHAT TO DO AND WHERE TO GO WHEN YOU GET TO THE STADIUM:

- Go directly to the Graduate Assembly Area in Yellow Lot #11 north of the football stadium. Do not enter through the main gates of the stadium. Marshals will greet you and Professor George Parks will organize the Student Processional.
- Look for the signs for your college/school. If you are unsure of the school or college of your major, see "Gate Entrances by Major."
- Commencement Photographs will be taken as the procession of degree candidates gets underway. Graduates will be photographed in their regalia. Proofs of these photographs will be mailed to graduates along with order forms and information for those wishing to purchase prints.

COMMENCEMENT DAY GENERAL INFORMATION:

- Routes to campus/travel assistance: Please advise your guests to plan ahead to allow extra travel time to campus. Traffic is usually very heavy on major routes and in the greater Amherst area as early as 8:00 a.m., and delays are frequently encountered. (Commencements at Amherst College and Mount Holyoke are the same day at 10:00 a.m.) Encourage your guests to arrive by 9:00 a.m., park in the upper campus lots, and take the shuttle buses to the stadium. Seating at the stadium is "first-come-first-served."
- Parking and shuttle services: Police officers will direct you to designated parking lots. Beginning at 8:00 a.m., free shuttle buses will circle campus every 5-10 minutes, taking you and your guests to the stadium, and returning you to the lot after the ceremony.
- Snacks and souvenirs: Coffee, soft drinks, bottled water, donuts, bagels, and pastries are available at the refreshment stands on both sides of the stadium. Fresh-cut roses, bouquets of flowers, and balloons will be for sale inside and outside the stadium. Sweatshirts, T-shirts, baseball caps, seat cushions, diploma frames, teddy bears, banners, disposable cameras, and film are available at the tent on the east side. In addition, the University Store in the Campus Center will be open from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. with a complete supply of UMass clothing, gifts, and other merchandise.
- Food Services: Following Commencement, a food court adjacent to the stadium will offer a variety of food for sale, including sandwiches, sushi rolls, burgers, salads, and hot and cold beverages. Reservations are not required.
- Meeting arrangements: Arrange a meeting place for after the ceremony with family members prior to the start of the ceremony, such as at one of the four food kiosks. You will exit through the north gates #1 and #2.
- Post-Commencement Reception: After the ceremony, graduates and guests are invited to the Chancellor's Reception. It will be held under the large white tent in the southeast corner of the stadium near the entry gates. Punch and cookies will be served. This will be an opportunity to meet, greet, and take a family photograph with the Chancellor. Faculty are also invited to attend.

CONGRATULATIONS FROM THE ENTIRE UNIVERSITY COMMUNITY

REMEMBER

University regulations prohibit the possession or use of alcohol at the stadium.

No glass or metal containers will be allowed in the assembly area on the field.

This policy will be enforced.

From experimental musicians of the 70s to revolutionary artists of today, Adult. peaks interest

By TIMOTHY GABRIELE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When experimental musicians of the late 70s began to tinker with electronic instruments in minimalist repetition, they invited both a number of detractors to denounce their art pose and a number of disillusioned former punk rockers to adopt their theories in a more accessible format. The naysayers consistently threw around a word that has also been used to negatively describe the current crop of electro artists – cold.

No, those young, naive synthpoppers are not cold. Adult. is cold.

Adult., a husband and wife duo who would like to make it abundantly clear that the period at the end of their name is entirely intentional, craft work that could be handed to the world's top 10 DJs, who would subsequently send it back under the pretense that it was not finished or that it was just a blueprint. Their brand of dark buzzing synth bubblegum (if one could even call bubblegum "dark") draws a striking resemblance to a few key figures from the past. Their overall sound is a sequel to the early singles of fellow Detroit Yaz fans Le Car, who Adult. member Adam Lee Miller used to compose with.

Le Car had both the advantage and disadvantage of growing up in the Motor City, perhaps the only American strata to ever fully embrace house music with the same enthusiasm that Europe has, having planted the seeds in the basement recordings of Derrick May and Juan Atkins. Over the years, they witnessed the transformation of the artful and experimental form into an avalanche of derivative, formulaic and melodramatics sweeps more about white kids popping pills than artistic integrity. With this scenario growing all the more prevalent in the late 90s, along came Le Car, and eventually Adult.'s Ersatz audio label, with their emphasis on analogue technology and the sweet simplicity of catchy melodies.

Adult.'s lead vocalist Nicola Kuperus also draws comparisons to the ever-elusive electroclash goddess Miss Kitten, whose arty monotone has lended vocal aid to Golden Boy, Felix Da Housecat and The Hacker. The problem is that where Miss Kitten sings absurd broken English lyrics in a faux-euro accent to sound like a poor translation from an obscure object of desire, Kuperus' monotone has no need to be sexy in her approach. It is cold music to the core with songs about nosebleeds, forgetting, shin-kicking signs of affection and gluing one's eyelids together (as she does in the album's liner photography). A more adequate reference point would be the Flying Lizard's Patti Paladin, who popularized the form of bored-sounding female-fronted synthesizer groups with the bizzarro cover of "Money (That's What I Want)," but was otherwise more profoundly bloodless and passionately cuckoo for dada just like Kuperus.

These influences aside, Adult.'s "Anxiety Always" is a step above their singles collection "Resuscitation." Here, they are working toward a more fluid catchiness and sterile groove as promised on last year's incredible singles, "Run Run Crying" and especially "Don't You Stop." The problem with "Resuscitation" was that Adult.'s formula often runs dry real quick. It is not music for all occasions. Very often drum-machine rhythms and synth melodies repeat themselves with little or no variation for the entire song, which yes, I understand, is the definition of minimalism. Luckily though, Adult. offer a few new surprises on their new excursions into the alienating cold.

"Turn Your Back" boasts some harsh distorted electroguitar riffs and a bassline straight out of the early Factory Records hacienda. The squaresaw jibes and bleak arpeggiator loops come in hypnotizing patterns on "Nervous (Wreck)," like a soundtrack to a simulated maze in Tron or what Vangelis might put on when he's figuring out math equations. The lyrics are icy and often allude to their own desired place between pop and avant-garde electronic music.

"All these words, they sound the same," Kuperus "sings" on "Turn Your Back," slyly pointing the finger at herself as she continues on with a remote cry in a parking lot full of cars with sirens echoing around her. "Shake your head," she chants on the song of the same name, a calling that is both a dance floor movement call and a set of instructions toward denying reality, refusing memory and general negation. Shake that head, but do not bob it.

"Kick in the shin, Kick in the shin / is that how you say I love you," one of the last lines states on Adult.'s slick, difficult and detached first full-length. Keep in my mind that this is a wife singing atop her husband's programmed beats with a smirking knowingness. It is a dark, blistery track that cuts to the very heart of what Adult. are all about. They inhabit a world represented by music so very aloof that it makes me shiver just listening.

50 Cent's performance lacks enthusiasm

50 also would have been more impressive if he could finish his own bar without needing seven other people do it for him. He rushed through almost every song on his album, cutting some, like "21 Questions" and "Back Down," to a mere chorus and verse, which made it seem like he had performance ADHD. Though it is difficult to go on after someone from the Roots crew and give a better performance, 50 seemed more concerned about the paycheck he received afterward than the actual live set. There were promising moments, but overall, it's safe to say that Eminem and Dr. Dre obviously didn't have a section for live performance in their Artist Development lab.

But there's always next year.

Nothing original in Lizzie McGuire's first big flick

there's also a snotty popular rival and a mischievous, scheming younger brother (Jake Thomas). These characters have existed for eons in films aimed at younger audiences, but apparently this was never a concern for the filmmakers.

In the end, Lizzie learns lessons on confidence and friendship, but the hollow materialism of "The Lizzie McGuire Movie" renders them moot. As a celebration of the joys of perfect hair, perfect clothes and perfect lip-gloss, the movie may be enjoyed, especially by the 12-year-olds in the audience whose collective worldview doesn't spread beyond that narrow universe.

Compared to a more substantial family entertainment ("Holes," for example), "The Lizzie McGuire Movie" looks even more plastic. Duff is all pearly white smile, but little else here; the rest of the cast is nothing more than pawns in the expansion of the Lizzie McGuire empire. In the end, what "The Lizzie McGuire Movie" really celebrates isn't finding your true self, but the lost art of looking perfect. It's sad, really – two years ago we were given the warmth, wit and vivacity of "The Princess Diaries." Now, we are given Lizzie McGuire.

'Spacey, earthbound' feel to Paris

Steve Derocher describes his band, Paris, as "an eight-year-old girl who loves video games dancing in her sleep."

earthbound at the same time," Derocher said.

Guitarist/bassist Briante added, "[Our] sound is supposed to be a deconstruction of everything as opposed to other music, which is more rigid."

"We don't write songs. We write vibes that go on and on" singer Hadden said.

With this in mind, it is easy to see the band hopes the audience will walk away from their set with the idea that, as Hadden said, "art isn't deed," and hopefully "inspire them to discover new acts they haven't heard before."

As for the song writing process, Paris holds true that its writing process is democratic and a "collaborative effort."

"(We) just play and see how we can work that into a song," Briante said. "(We) make noise and glean cool things out of it."

The end result of the process is an electronic combination of sounds lasting anywhere from three minutes to over 12. On occasion, these sounds have a vocal track buried slightly lower in the mix. Think of it as good music to sleep to.

When asked what his favorite part of being in Paris was, Derocher noted that the "best part is our loose and free-form nature. (We're) not pinned to ideas or instruments or (even) a goal."

"We all know we want something different," Briante said.

As for the future, with graduation on the horizon, Paris hopes to begin playing more frequently "in New York and Boston and wherever else will have us," Hadden said. Lee even entertained the idea of holding up in a barn somewhere. Wherever they end up, Paris, a band that according to Hadden, makes a "conscious effort to stand outside of rock 'n roll norms," has a long life ahead of them, for precisely that reason.

The Robert and Pamela Jacobs Distinguished Lecture in Jewish Life & Culture:

Ambassador Dennis Ross

MISSING PEACE in the Middle East

For more than 12 years, Ambassador Dennis B. Ross played a leading role in shaping U.S. involvement in the Middle East peace process. In this inaugural lecture Ambassador Ross will discuss the inside story of efforts to negotiate peace between Israel and the Palestinians over the last decade and the key lessons he has drawn from these experiences.

Father-son tale on Tour

and technique, traits that are not easily inherited. Making it even more difficult for sons to follow their fathers is an exclusive PGA Tour roster, with about 200 players every year.

"The percentages are against you," Jay Haas said. "The odds of any player making it big is pretty slim, so two from the same family is rare."

Other theories abound.

Topping the list is pressure to live up to a father's reputation. No son had a bigger burden than Gary Nicklaus, who made the cover of Sports Illustrated at age 16 as the heir to the Golden Bear.

Some kids who spent their childhood hanging around the PGA Tour get tired of it. Others simply don't have the talent or the hunger.

"All kids of golfers are good athletes," said Strange, whose 21-year-old son Thomas occasionally qualifies for matches at North Carolina State. "Do you inherit the same drive to play golf? Do you inherit a perfect golf swing? They might love the game, but they're not in love with the game. That's a huge difference."

Bill Haas' first love was basketball, but the passion turned to golf during high school when he grew to 6-foot-2 and adopted a swing so natural and powerful that he rarely asked his father for help.

He still remembers the first time he beat the old man. It was three years ago at the Cliffs Keowee Vineyards course at home in Greenville, S.C. The next summer, Bill shot under par every week he played, highlighted by a 62 at the Porter Cup.

"My dad never pushed me to play golf at all," he said. "He never came out to give me lessons. I had to ask him for a tip or ask him to watch me hit balls."

It helps that he comes from a golfing family. Jay Haas' uncle is former Masters champion Bob Goalby. His brother, Jerry, is the golf coach at Wake Forest. His brother-in-law is Dillard Pruitt, a PGA Tour rules official and former player.

Still, Haas said he only wanted his sons – 21-year-old Jay Jr. plays at Augusta State – to have a chance to learn. At best, he thought it would help them in the business world.

"There was always a club laying around, but they've done this on their own," Haas said. "I showed them the swing, the setup, the grip. But I never said, 'You have to go play.'"

Bill figured it out for himself. His father is curious where it will lead.

JAMES M. HATTER/COLLEGIAN

Tough as Nils

Six-foot-four Neil "Nils" Lundberg (12 goals) has been a physical presence on offense for the UMass men's lacrosse team. The Minutemen will host Holstra in a first round NCAA tournament game on Sunday.

Brady confesses sins

will have on the rules for next season. Twice in the series – once going against the Ducks, in game one, and once going against the Stars, in game six – goals were called back because the net was slightly altered when a goal was scored. In neither case did this jarring have anything to do with the actual scoring of the goal.

Rule 57a in the NHL rulebook reads this way:

"A goal shall be scored when the puck shall have been put between the goal posts by the stick of a player of the attacking side, from in front and below the crossbar, and entirely across a red line the width of the diameter of the goal posts drawn on the ice from one goal post to the other with the goal frame in its proper position."

Therefore, because of this last phrase, if one of the posts is slightly altered as the goal is being scored, the goal will not count. In neither case did the rule affect the outcome of the game (Anaheim won game one anyway and Dallas scored shortly after their goal was disallowed) but the rule is still ludicrous, and had it cost a team a game and/or a series, it would be tremendously unjust and echoes of Lindy Ruff's "No goal!" proclamation would be ringing throughout the hockey world. Obviously, if a net is knocked off the posts entirely it can affect a goal, but if it is slightly raised and the pegs remain in the holes, why should the goal be taken back?

Kubina allegations absurd

By now, nearly everyone has seen John Tortorella's outburst at a reporter for asking whether Pavel Kubina intentionally shot a puck into Scott Stevens' face in game three of the Devils-Lightning series. And Tortorella is completely in the right about this matter.

There is no way that the action was intentional, for many reasons. One, the puck was wobbling significantly, and thus the shot did not have a very high probability of hitting its desired target. Two, Kubina has one of the least accurate shots on the Tampa Bay roster, and there is no way he could hit Stevens in the face with a slap shot from that range on purpose. And three, if someone really wanted to hurt Stevens, there are far more effective ways of doing it.

Much is being made of the action because of the way many Devils reacted to it, but that reaction is completely understandable. They have no idea why he actually did it, and their captain missed the rest of the game, one that New Jersey lost. And all the Devils players said was either that they didn't know or that they hoped he didn't perform the action intentionally.

So leave the guy alone.

Wild things out West

In addition to Anaheim's triumph over the top two teams in the Western Conference, the third-year Minnesota Wild trumped longtime playoff stalwart Colorado in the first round with a bunch of blue-collar players that many teams didn't want.

Martan Gaborik is the real deal up front, but look at the rest of the roster and it looks like a Who's Who of rejects from terrible teams. Wes Walz (known mostly for his time in Calgary) is second on the team in scoring behind Gaborik. Sergei Zholtok, who had many unceremonious years in Boston, Ottawa, Montreal and Edmonton, is third on the team with 10 points in the playoffs. Andrew Brunette, who showed promise in previous stops in Nashville and Atlanta, has blossomed into a big-time role player who has scored the biggest goal of the playoffs thus far (game seven, overtime against Colorado in the first round).

Jacques Lemaire is the brains behind this team, and this squad shows a lot of similarity to the Devils' teams of the mid-90s. He is a brilliant coach who has done a tremendous amount with very little talent. (Memo to Glen Sather: get a coach, you moron!)

While it looks like the Wild will likely fall to the Vancouver Canucks, who quietly put together one of the better seasons in the league this year, the Wild give hope to all those journeymen who once played for also-rans. Who knows, soon we could see Paul Ranheim, Dmitri Kvartolnov and Pat Falloon reporting for work.

A father-son tale in PGA

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP) – Bill Haas followed his father into the locker room at Quail Hollow Club and sat down for breakfast, a routine he knows well from a dozen or so trips on the PGA Tour.

Tuesday morning was different.

The kid isn't at the Wachovia Championship to watch. He's here to play.

Haas not only has a locker next to his father, Jay, but a tee time Thursday morning against a field that includes Masters champion Mike Weir and Davis Love III.

The younger Haas also has plenty of game.

"There are a lot of 'can't-miss' kids that do miss," said Curtis Strange, whose friendship with the father dates to their NCAA titles at Wake Forest in 1975-76. "But from what I know of Bill, he can't miss. He's full of potential. He has a natural swing and he seems to want it."

The 20-year-old Haas was an All-American at Wake Forest last year as a sophomore and the medalist at the U.S. Amateur, where he lost 1-up in the semifinals to eventual champion Ricky Barnes.

The Wachovia Championship is his second PGA Tour event. He played in the Greater Greensboro Classic last year and missed the cut by one shot. He wants to play in the Walker Cup this summer, graduate next year and then turn pro.

Where that leads is anyone's guess, although Haas doesn't have history on his side.

Not many sons of successful golfers make it to the big leagues.

Even fewer of them win.

Al and Brent Geiberger, Julius and Guy Boros, Joe and Joe Jr. Kirkwood.

The best father-son combination ever? Young Tom Morris won the first of four consecutive British Opens the year after Old Tom Morris won his fourth Open.

That was 133 years ago.

The Haas family outing at Quail Hollow comes one week after Jack Nicklaus played in a Nationwide Tour event with his four sons.

Only the 63-year-old father made the cut.

"I came here to play with them, and all of a sudden I'm the only one left," Nicklaus said. He wound up in a tie for 45th.

Three of the Nicklaus sons played as professionals. Only one of them – Gary – ever earned his PGA Tour card. He lost in a playoff to Phil Mickelson in the 2000 BellSouth Classic, but all that did was buy him an extra year on tour.

Dave Stockton Jr., whose father won two PGA Championships, has been on and off the PGA Tour the last several years. Andy Miller, Johnny's son, made a hole-in-one at the U.S. Open last year and earned his PGA Tour card at Q-school.

You could call Nicklaus the most disappointing sire since Secretariat, only it's not that simple.

Torra! Torra! Torra!

Freshman Matt Torra earned National Pitcher of the Week for two complete game victories this past week. Torra and the Minutemen return home today to face Northeastern at 3 p.m. on Earl Lorden Field.

Frosh goes national

By Mike Marzelli

The good news keeps on coming for the Massachusetts baseball team. The Minutemen traveled to Loudonville, N.Y. yesterday to face Siena, riding high on the news that freshman hurler Matt Torra was named the Pitcher of the Week by the National Collegiate Baseball Writers Association.

Then they defeated the Saints in come-from-behind fashion, downing their final road opponents of the regular season, 3-2. Senior Tom Ellerbrook scored on a sacrifice bunt by junior Sean Sarno in the 12th inning to give the Maroon and White its fourth straight victory.

Sophomore Jason Twomley hit a two-out single in the top of the ninth to bring home Kristian Molloy, tying the game at two.

Sophomore Scott Ratliff earned the victory, though Mike Crane did much of the dirty work. The sophomore battled for 10 innings, striking out 10 and allowing just one earned run.

Torra's award comes off a split with Big East rival Boston College and a weekend sweep of Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure, the Minutemen (20-16, 12-6 Atlantic 10) received national recognition for the first time this season.

Torra also earned the A-10 Pitcher of the Week award last week.

The Pittsfield, Mass. native picked up a pair of victories with two complete game efforts, beginning the week by striking out a career-high nine batters in a 7-2 victory over Temple. He allowed only two unearned runs and two walks against the Owls while scattering 10 hits.

He then hurled another complete game in a 1-0 win over St. Bonaventure on Sunday. Torra yielded only three hits to the Bonnies while striking out six and not allowing any runs or walks.

In combining his two complete game efforts with the 1/3 inning of scoreless relief he threw against Boston College on Thursday, Torra has now tossed 18-1/3 consecutive innings without allowing an earned run. He is 5-3 on the season with a 3.57 ERA and 39 punchouts.

The Huskies (15-18, 8-8 America East) are coming off a pair of wins over conference foe Stony Brook, and downed UMass 6-1 in the Beanpot consolation game on April 24.

Globe suspends Ryan for month

By Robert O'Neill
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Boston Globe sports columnist Bob Ryan was suspended for one month without pay after saying on television that the wife of New Jersey Nets guard Jason Kidd – who was allegedly the victim of domestic abuse – needed someone to "smack her."

"Bob Ryan's comments were a clear and egregious violation of the standards of The Boston Globe," editor Martin Baron said in a statement. "Bob has been told in no uncertain terms that his remarks were offensive and unacceptable."

The columnist was also barred from appearing on radio or television for one month.

Ryan, who has since expressed regret, made the comments Sunday night during a segment on WBZ-TV's Sports Final show.

Kidd said Boston fans insulted his wife and 3-year-old son during Game 4 of the 2002 Eastern Conference finals at the FleetCenter. Fans taunted Kidd with chants of "wife beater," referring to 2001 charges, later dropped, that he had struck his wife, Joumana.

The Celtics and Nets began another playoff series on Monday prompting Ryan and host Bob Lobel to discuss whether Kidd and his family will receive similar treatment when the teams come to Boston for Game 3 on Friday.

During the show, Ryan said Kidd should expect taunts from the crowd, then criticized the Kidds for using their son "as a prop" and called Joumana Kidd an "exhibitionist."

Then, in a comment that was not picked up clearly on tape, he said: "Oh great. I mean she needs (inaudible) to smack her."

Lobel immediately interrupted Ryan, asking him to retract the statement.

"You just don't want to smack her, you don't mean to say that. No, do you, really? Tell me you don't?" Lobel said.

"Why should I say anything different then I said all last playoffs last year," Ryan said.

In a statement Tuesday, Ryan apologized to Joumana Kidd for the "inappropriate and offensive remark."

"It was, of course, atrocious judgment on my part," he said. "I wish to state clearly that I am aware of the very real problem of violence against women in our society, and that in no way is it a joking matter."

Nets players and coaches called for Ryan's dismissal. Speaking during practice Tuesday, New Jersey coach Byron Scott said Ryan "should be out of a job."

"Just tell him to come right in here and he can say that in front of me and Jason and some of our players," he told reporters. "He'll see how well he'll be received."

Kidd called the comments "unfortunate" and said his wife "felt sorry if she offended [Ryan] in any way."

Brady confesses his playoff sins

Matt Brady

It's time for me to say those three words that every sports columnist hates to say – I was wrong.

Let's look back at what I said about the Mighty Ducks of Anaheim three weeks ago.

"This is evidenced by the Ducks' ... who are the weakest seven seed from the West in quite some time."

Turns out I was slightly mistaken. Jean-Sebastien Giguere is to the Ducks what Patrick Roy has been for so many Avalanche and Canadiens teams over the past two decades. He is the last defense, the guy who makes every save even when you think he has no shot in the world, the goalie who leaves opposing players dumbfounded. (See Mike Modano.)

But he has not been the only player for the Ducks in this postseason. Paul Kariya, Adam Oates and Petr Sykora have all been very solid, as I guessed they would be. But there has been a slew of other players who have stepped into enormous roles for Disney's hockey adventure.

Mike Leclerc has been unbelievably consistent throughout the postseason after a regular season where he put up just 28 points. While Steve Ruechin, Steve Thomas and Rob Niedermayer are all playing up front like they were around three years ago.

Keith Carney has emerged as the Scott Stevens of the West, going one-on-one with Mike Modano on nearly every shift. Modano had four goals and 10 points in six games against the Oilers, then scored just one goal and five points in his six contests against Emilio Estevez's bunch.

Ozolinsh is looking like the player he was several years ago, and could very much be an asset to the Duck power play. Oh, and Giguere has posted a .949 save percentage and a 1.60 goals against average in this year's playoffs. And don't expect that to change anytime soon.

The biggest travesty of this series has to be the effect it

Celts missing chances

By Tom Canavan
Associated Press

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) – There was frustration and anger in Jim O'Brien's voice as the Boston coach spoke Tuesday about the Celtics' loss in Game 1 of the Eastern Conference semifinals.

The New Jersey Nets, the team that beat the Celtics in the conference finals a year ago and the one most experts picked to dispatch Boston again, were there for the taking Monday night.

Turnovers. Missed shots. Foul problems. All the things the Celtics needed New Jersey to do wrong in the opener of the best-of-seven series happened, and Boston couldn't take advantage in a 97-93 loss.

"I feel the same as last night," O'Brien said before the Celtics practiced at Seton Hall University in South Orange. "We're all angry we lost the game."

While he tried not to say much about the game, O'Brien's frustration showed when asked about the Nets' fastbreak, the one thing that makes Jason Kidd and New Jersey tick.

"They didn't play well and we didn't play well," O'Brien said. "It came down to us stopping them in transition. That was our No. 1 goal and we did not get the job done. You don't deserve to win when you do that."

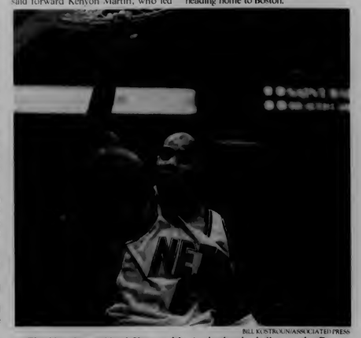
New Jersey outscored the Celtics 23-5 on the fastbreak and outrebounded them 44-30.

Still, Boston had chances in the final minutes.

Antoine Walker, Tony Delk and Paul Pierce missed 3-pointers that could have tied the game or put Boston ahead.

"We felt like we let that game slip away," Pierce said a little more than 12 hours after scoring 34 points but missing a game-tying shot with fewer than 10 seconds to play. "We're all disappointed in the loss, that's natural.

"If you're not disappointed then you shouldn't be here. Everybody should be [angry] and ready to do something in Game 2."



The Celtics will get that chance Wednesday night at Continental Airlines Arena.

It's a game the Nets also are eager to play.

"We didn't play well. We know that," said forward Kenyon Martin, who led the Nets with 21 points despite picking up three early fouls. "We know that we're going to play better.

"The Nets limited Pierce to five points in the final quarter, throwing a number of defenders at him. Kidd played him for a couple of possessions. Martin tried his hand once or twice and the Nets dropped their traditional man-to-man and switched to a zone.

The bottom line was the Celtics came up short and now they need to win Game 2 to avoid a two-game deficit heading home to Boston.

Ross addresses conflict

Ambassador speaks on solutions for Middle East

By Morris Singer
Collegian Staff

Ambassador Dennis B. Ross, director and Ziegler distinguished fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, spoke yesterday to a packed Bowker Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts, outlining a road map to a peaceful solution to conflict in the Middle East.

Ross began his talk by addressing why he feels the situation between Israelis and Palestinians right now is grim. He said that both sides are pessimistic about resolving the conflict for different yet equally valid reasons.

He described the Israeli situation during the mid-1990s as one of willingness to make peace. Israel was willing to offer 97 percent of the territory in question to the Palestinians for a two-state solution, he said.

"From the Israeli perspective, they had the most forthcoming government in their history," he said. "[It was] a government prepared to contemplate unprecedented concessions."

According to Ross, instead of welcoming an offer that included Gaza in its entirety, 97 percent of the West Bank, independent borders and the right of return, Yasser Arafat turned it down.

"The response was violence," he said.

However, the situation did not seem so welcoming to the Palestinians, he said. He sees the situation as one where the Palestinians felt that the Israelis didn't want peace because of checkpoints and military incursions.

Ross said Arafat was uncomfortable with turning down the deal.

According to Ross, Arafat lied about what he was offered at the negotiating table, saying that it was only 90 percent of what he wanted, did not provide full sovereignty and had Israeli-controlled borders.

"What his people heard from him was a complete distortion," he said. "His inability to portray it the way it was, was his fear of how they might respond."

Because of the different struggles that have occurred over the years of negotiation, neither side feels as if it has a partner for peace, he said. In his opinion, the different obstacles in the path of peace have only lead to more troubles.

"Both [sides] in the last two and a half years have suffered, and they've suffered terribly," he said.

Ross said he thinks the peace process will be easier now that Saddam Hussein is no longer in control of Iraq. Because Hussein used to pay the families of suicide bombers up to $25,000, and now those families no longer receive that funding, Ross thinks the motivation for some of the terror attacks is no longer an issue and thus the situation will no longer escalate as much.

"The requirements for the security arrangements are going to be less," he said.

Lombardi to address Faculty Senate on University budget

By S.J. Port
Collegian Staff

Chancellor John V. Lombardi will address the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate concerning the Commonwealth's proposed budget and the University's response today.

When the House of Representatives announced the proposed budget on April 24, Lombardi responded by issuing a hiring and spending freeze on campus.

The freezes, according to Lombardi, are immediate steps taken by the campus to "preserve our ability to adjust to next year's budget once we have more definitive and reasonable projections."

The first freeze is a hiring freeze on all positions paid for by state funds. Critical positions will be filled only with the approval of the appropriate vice chancellor and chancellor until the freeze is lifted. The Chancellor has also frozen the use of a portion of funds in each of the vice chancellor's respective areas until the end of this fiscal year. Finally, Lombardi announced a spending freeze for all non-payroll expenditures until the end of the fiscal year.

Supporting the friends of higher education, Lombardi called the proposed cuts "an unacceptable reduction for our university and our campus." He stated that he believes the University has dealt with last year's significant budget cuts through higher productivity of faculty and staff.

"We did this while maintaining this campus' exceptional record in undergraduate, graduate and professional education," said Lombardi.

Additionally he said that it would be "particularly effective for individuals to reach the legislators that represent them and speak to them personally and directly to express our shock and disbelief at this proposed reduction."

The possibility of reductions to the campus, of the proposed magnitude, will require the campus to consider significant restructuring alternatives, announced Lombardi.

"Once their [the budget] process has reached a stage where we know what level of action we must take," said Lombardi. "We can then, in consultation with our constituencies, take the appropriate actions that will almost surely require major changes in the structure of our institution to ensure our continued quality."

The House of Representatives has proposed a budget reduction to the University system of $78.9 million, resulting in a budget cut of approximately $40 million to the Amherst campus. The legislature was set to vote on the budget on May 1, however the vote has been postponed with no new date yet set.

Following the Chancellor's address concerning budget reductions there will be a question and answer period before the Faculty Senate resumes with their regular agenda.

The Senate will hold elections for Presiding Officer of the Faculty Senate and Faculty Delegate to the Board of Trustees. Jerome Miluer, a professor of political science has been re-nominated for presiding officer, and W. Brian O'Connor, professor of biology has been re-nominated to the Board of Trustees. The Senate will take further nominations from the floor.

New business for the Senate includes a special report by the Academic Matters Council concerning a proposed reduction in residential credits required to graduate with Latin Honors (cum laude, magna cum laude, summa cum laude) from 48 credits to 45.

The Senate will vote on a special report by the Academic Matters Council and Program and Budget Council concerning a proposal for the creation of an education minor.

The School of Education has proposed the minor in education as a school-wide program that would be consistent with the School's gradual movement of its professional preparation and licensure sequences to the graduate level. The minor would allow students' transcripts to reflect the work they have done in education preparation at the undergraduate level. The minor will require 18 credits with one course of at least three credits required in the foundation areas of education: social justice in education, human development, and pedagogy.

The Faculty Senate will meet today at 3:30 p.m. in 227 Herter.

Pentagon says it might have Iraqi biological weapons lab

By Pauline Jelinek
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – The Pentagon said yesterday it may have recovered an Iraqi mobile biological weapons lab, the first such announcement since the start of the war to disarm the government of President Saddam Hussein.

American forces in Iraq are doing tests on a trailer that matches the description of such laboratories, given by various sources including a defector who says he helped operate one, Defense Department officials said.

"On the smoking gun, I don't know," Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence Stephen Cambone said when asked whether this was a breakthrough in the coalition search for weapons of mass destruction.

Cambone also announced that some 2,100 people will be sent to Iraq to augment the weapons hunt as well as the search for information on government leaders, terrorists, war crimes, atrocities and Iraqi prisoners of war. The effort will be headed by Maj. Gen. Keith Dayton of the Defense Intelligence Agency, Cambone said.

He said initial tests have been done on a trailer truck taken into custody April 19 at a Kurdish checkpoint in northern Iraq. It is painted in a military color scheme, was found on a transporter normally used for tanks and – as an Iraqi defector has described Iraq's mobile labs – contains a fermenter and a system to capture exhaust gases, he said.

"While some of the equipment on the trailer could have been used for purposes other than biological weapons agent production, U.S. and U.K. technical experts have concluded that the unit does not appear to perform any function beyond what the defector said it was for, which is the production of biological agents," Cambone said.

Cambone said that what the U.S. military has in its possession is the kind of mobile laboratory that Secretary of State Colin Powell described in a speech to the U.N. Security Council early this year in an unsuccessful attempt to get U.N. approval for the war.

"They have not found another plausible use for it," Cambone said of the trailer.

Cambone said part of the trailer was washed with a caustic material and it likely will have to be dismantled before testing can be done on hard-to-reach surfaces.

The Bush administration alleged that Iraq had chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programs and said the main reason for the war was to destroy them. Despite weeks of searches of suspected sites, nothing conclusive has been reported found so far.

And although Pentagon officials suggested before the war that some Iraqi units were armed with chemical weapons, none were found when those units were overrun.

If proven to be a biological weapons lab, the trailer would be the first discovered in the military campaign started March 20. On several occasions, troops have found substances they said tested initially positive as nerve agents or other chemical weapons materials, only to learn from more sophisticated testing that they were crop pesticides or explosives.

A defense official said before Cambone's press conference that he and others "feel good" about the prospect that this time they have found evidence of an unconventional weapons program.

Earlier Wednesday, Lt. Gen. William Wallace said that American forces have collected "plenty of documentary evidence" suggesting that Saddam had an active program for weapons of mass destruction.

"We've collected evidence, much of it documentary," Wallace, commander of the Army's V Corps, said from Baghdad in a videoconference with Pentagon reporters.

"A lot of the information that we're getting is coming from lower-tier Iraqis who had some knowledge of the program but not full knowledge of the program," he told Pentagon reporters in a videoconference from the Iraqi capital. "And it's just taking us a while to sort through all of that."

He did not elaborate.

Cambone said a search team of 600 in Iraq will be expanded later this month with the dispatch of what he called the Iraq Survey Group to oversee the hunt for weapons and other things the administration is looking for in Iraq.

The group headed by DIA's two-star general Dayton includes 1,300 experts and 800 support workers who will look for and analyze information on people from the regime, weapons and terrorist ties in Iraq. It also will gather information on Iraq's old intelligence services and those accused of war crimes and atrocities committed by a regime that used executions and torture to control the population.

"This is piecing together a major jigsaw puzzle, and we are only just beginning ... to work the puzzle," Vice Adm. Lowell Jacoby, Director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said at the press conference with Cambone.

SGA passes trust fund budget unanimously

AMELIA TAYLOR/COLLEGIAN

Senator Dan Pozmanter, E2M Representitive Dave Bisson, and Senator John O'Neill address the Senate at the SGA meeting last night.

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The S-1 Student Activities Trust Fund budget passed unanimously at last night's Senate meeting, with few questions leading up to the final decision.

With numerous questions and concerns prior to the final vote, members of the Student Government Association (SGA) Senate were calm and collected last night. Members addressed their final concerns with the budget, specifically about whether members with frozen accounts will still have access to their given budget, as well as remaining questions surrounding the budgets cuts given to the SGA.

Members of the Ways and Means Committee explained that even if a budget was allocated, funds and accounts will be frozen due to prior debts, the SGA has until July 1. Ways and Means also said that members of different committees are entitled to a budget as long as they took the time and energy to apply for one in the first place.

Concerns were addressed surrounding the SGA's budget cuts. Committee Deputy Chair Jared Nokes told the Senate that despite positions such as the Secretary of Diversity not being funded, it is not the final decision.

"The SGA has been cut, but they can still fund the position through fee accounts and revenue accounts and payroll can be dealt with at their disposal," Nokes said.

Final questions surrounding a $5 student fee increase recently granted by the UMass administration were also raised, with senators asking why the additional source of revenue for the SGA was not taken into account when budget cuts were made. Committee members said that the increase was unknown at the time of the initial budget allocations. Members of the Ways and Means Committee said that the funding goes directly into next year's budget.

"It doesn't get any better than passing it unanimously, that shows that the Senate has a lot of faith in the work that we did, the work that I did," Chair Brian Thompson said. "I do feel bad; I wish more RSO's [Registered Student Organizations] could have got more funding because we did end up having more money than we initially thought, but I think that it was a fair budget and it's going to help the student body."

Other motions that drew much debate surrounded a motion to allocate $11,050 from the SGA's Long Term Reserves to fund a USA Today Readership program. Students from the Amherst campus made a presentation to the Senate about the benefits of having the program.

The program initially was a pilot program during the 2001-2002 year, with newspapers delivered to six different residence halls. However, Housing Services later cut the program due to budget cuts

Tornadoes strike in Midwest, killing two

By Betsy Taylor
Associated Press

DE SOTO, Mo. (AP) – Tornadoes swept across the Midwest and South overnight and early yesterday, killing two people in Illinois and battering a region still trying to recover from deadly twisters that struck over the weekend.

A junior high gymnasium in this community 35 miles southwest of St. Louis was destroyed in Tuesday night's twister but 25 young track athletes and their coaches were spared because they had fled the gym just in time.

"Chairs started flying. Everything started shaking. It was scary," Travis Shores, 14, said as he visited the ruins Wednesday.

Said Grant Gannon, also 14, "I kept hearing the wind, then there was a loud boom like a bomb went off."

At least four tornadoes hit southern Illinois overnight, killing two people, injuring at least 20 and destroying or damaging scores of homes. In Mermet, the trailer of Mariam Houchins, 65, was wrapped around tree trunks; her body was found in a ravine. Steve Kohn, 53, was killed in nearbs Grand Chain.

Brenda Crockett of Mermet had climbed out of her basement after the first tornado struck and was surveying the rubble of her house when she saw a second twister bearing down on her.

"There was nothing for me to do except lie down and grab the grass," said Crockett, who spent Wednesday looking for family photographs and other treasures to save.

Tornadoes also damaged more than a dozen trailer homes northeast Mississippi and Downsville, La., but no serious injuries were reported. High wind and heavy rain also hit parts of Arkansas and Alabama, where officials closed schools and some churches canceled midweek services.

In eastern Tennessee, which has been drenched by rain since Sunday, flooding forced Chattanooga residents to take emergency shelter as the Tennessee River rose toward its highest level in nearly 30 years. The Tennessee Valley Authority said some 300 homes and other structures could be flooded and damages could reach $7 million.

"We've been through this before," said Liz Foster, manager of a complex that emptied 64 downstairs apartments because of the high water. "Can I cry?"

The heavy rain and wind had many in Pierce City, Mo., hit hard by Sunday's tornadoes, fearing damaged historic buildings would simply collapse.

"This we didn't need," Lawrence County Sheriff Doug Sencker said of the latest stormy weather. "With all of the damaged buildings, the wind can easily knock some of them down."

The last people listed as missing in Pierce City turned up safe Wednesday. The death toll from the weekend's storms stood at 40 – 18 in Missouri, 15 in Tennessee and seven in Kansas. In Franklin, Kan., friends and family buried 87-year-old Josephine Maghe, one of those killed Sunday.

Across from the rubble of what had been the Stockton, Mo., post office, 87-year-old T.M. Montgomery looked at the shambles of the auto dealership he has owned for about three decades. Windows were shattered on more than two dozen new Chevrolet and Oldsmobile cars and pickup trucks.

Montgomery estimated his losses at $800,000 to $1 million. When offered good luck by a reporter, he replied: "We're going to need it."

Sanctions on Iraq ended

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Bush suspended U.S. sanctions against the old government of Iraq on yesterday and prodded the U.N. Security Council to do the same.

"No country in good conscience can support using sanctions to hold back the hopes of the Iraqi people," Bush said.

At a news conference with Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, Bush said that the United States, Britain and Spain would introduce a U.N. resolution "soon" that would lift sanctions imposed in 1990 when Iraq invaded Kuwait.

"The regime that the sanctions were directed against no longer rules Iraq," Bush said.

Such a resolution could be introduced before the 15-member council as early as Friday or Monday, a senior State Department official told The Associated Press.

Other developments concerning Iraq:

– The Pentagon said U.S. forces in Iraq are conducting tests on a trailer to see if it is a mobile biological weapons lab. It was the first time the Defense Department had announced it might have evidence of an unconventional weapons program that the Bush administration used to justify the overthrow of Saddam Hussein.

– An Iraqi military officer who fought the United States during the Gulf War was appointed by the Americans as governor of Saddam's heartland. Brig. Gen. Hosin Jasem Mohamed al-Bouri, a native of Tikrit, Saddam's hometown, inherits the reins of Salah ad-Din province as an interim chief executive.

– Two hospitals in southern Iraq have reported 17 confirmed cases of cholera in Basra, and the World Health Organization said it fears far more have gone unreported.

– In a new audiotape – the first allegedly made by Saddam since U.S.-led forces ousted him – the deposed Iraqi leader urged his countrymen to fight foreign occupation. The Sydney Morning Herald said it received the 14-minute tape from two men in Baghdad on Monday. The United States said it was studying the tape to see if it was authentic.

U.S. efforts to lift the sanctions have met resistance from veto-wielding Russia and France.

But after meeting with Aznar, Bush said he senses there is now "a mood to work together" on a sanctions resolution despite earlier objections that divided the Security Council over whether to go war in Iraq.

Bob Jordan/Associated Press

About 250 members of the 82nd Airborne Division march off the runway yesterday at Pope Air Force Base, N.C., after they returned from duty in Iraq.

Aznar agreed. "Absolutely. I hope it's true," he said. "Everyone needs to contribute to it within the Security Council."

Bush also announced that he was suspending a 1990 U.S. law imposing sanctions on Iraq. He said he was doing so to allow certain equipment needed for Iraq's reconstruction to be sent to the country.

This was in addition to a lifting of most U.S. economic sanctions on Iraq, also ordered by Bush and announced earlier in the day by Treasury Secretary John Snow. Snow said the move would "bring much-needed aid and humanitarian relief" to Iraqis.

France and Russia have voiced objections to abandoning the sanctions until the United Nations certifies that Iraq is free of weapons of mass destruction.

There were indications on Wednesday, however, that France was softening its position, and so was Germany, a Security Council member without veto power and a strong critic of the war.

French Ambassador Jean-David Levitte said in an interview, "We want to find the best possible solutions in the interest of the Iraqi people."

Russia, meanwhile, is agreeable only to a suspension of the embargoes on food and medicine.

Now that the regime of Saddam Hussein has been ended, Bush said, "the atmosphere that existed prior to the war has changed. People now want to work together for the good of the Iraqi people."

BOSTON (AP) – Eight district courthouses would be spared from the chopping block under an amendment approved by House lawmakers that dealt a blow to a key part of Gov. Mitt Romney's government restructuring plan.

The House plan would shift the burden from some district courts with high numbers of cases to those with far fewer cases by expanding the geographic coverage area some of the districts with lower caseloads.

Romney had proposed closing up to eight of the state's 69 district courts as part of his plan to restructure the judiciary and help close a $3 billion state spending gap.

House lawmakers have resisted that part of Romney's plan, saying district courts are an important community resource. All eight of the district courts targeted by Romney would be saved under the House budget.

"Rather than closing down courthouses that often serve as economic and community centers, we thought it was important to enhance the delivery of justice by keeping those courts open," said Charles Rasmussen, a spokesman for House Speaker Thomas Finneran, D-Boston.

Rasmussen pointed to the Winchendon court, one of those targeted by Romney. Under the House plan, Rasmussen said, communities from neighboring court districts would begin reporting to the Winchendon court. The move would boost the caseload in Winchendon and ease the burden in the neighboring district courts, he said.

In addition to Winchendon, Romney's plan would shutter courthouses in Ipswich, Boston's Charlestown section, Natick, Orange, Clinton, Ware and Uxbridge for a savings of $3.5 million annually.

Some lawmakers objected to another portion of the House plan that created a $40 million fund that could be used by top state judges – including Supreme Judicial Court Chief Justice Margaret Marshall and Chief Justice for Administration of the Trial Court Barbara Dortch-Okara – to help cut waste and promote court efficiency.

Supporters said it is important to give court administrators more authority. But critics were leery about giving up control of that amount of money without more oversight.

"It is a tremendous leap of faith," said Rep. Christopher Fallon, D-Malden.

The budget amendment would also require the courts to study ways to improve and streamline their electronic equipment.

Approval of the amendments came as House lawmakers continued debate on their proposed $22.5 billion state budget plan.

Trustees reauthorize bonds; tell Bulger to make pitch

DARTMOUTH, Mass. (AP) – University of Massachusetts officials aren't giving up on the building projects that Gov. Mitt Romney put the kibosh on this week.

Romney halted a $371 million bond sale that would have paid for a new science building at the university's flagship campus in Amherst, dormitories and parking garage repairs at the Boston campus and a parking facility in Lowell.

At a meeting yesterday at the Dartmouth campus, trustees reauthorized everything on the bond list, and told President William Bulger he can prioritize the projects in a new pitch to Romney.

"If there are some projects that are problematic or if they need to be removed, then the university's position is that we can work with the governor," said Bulger spokesman Robert Connolly. "Let's not stay totally in neutral. Let's at least get moving in some areas."

Romney revoked approval of the five-year capital plan – which was authorized by his predecessor, Jane Swift – because he was concerned about the projected source of funds and the lack of notification by UMass officials of a change that would have emphasized spending on projects on the Boston campus.

and faculty layoffs.

The new pilot program proposed would offer a total of 750 editions of USA Today, The Boston Globe and New York Times per week. Under the new program that would be tested, newspapers would be placed in selected resident halls, as well as in the Campus Center, and would be accessible free of charge to students with a swipe of their U-Card.

The motion also recommended that a referendum question be placed on the 2004-2005 Presidential and Student Trustee elections ballot to see if students would be willing to pay an optional $5 fee increase to have the program installed permanently on campus.

"We're comfortable in paying for a service that will educate and benefit students everyday," Public Policy and Relations Chair Adrienne Girard said.

The Senate passed the motion.

Other motions included a proposed change of the UMass mascot from the Minutemen to the Gray Wolves. A motion was presented requesting that students be incorporated into the initial discussion of any mascot changes, and that any change should be on the fall 2003 Senate elections ballot for student consideration.

The motion also requested that any decision regarding a mascot change be withheld until a student vote has been taken.

The motion was also passed by the Senate.

The Senate also failed to pass a motion presented that would decrease the body's size. Currently, there is one senator for every 250 undergraduates. Under the proposed plan, there would have been one senator for each 550.

Senator Matthew Progen was ejected near the end of last night's meeting after he stood on a table and danced and ran around the room waving the American flag. Progen performed the display after Associate Senate Speaker Matthew Pelnar refused to hear his call for quorum.

Ways and Means Chair Brian Thompson, left, speaks to the SGA Senate last night.

Ambassador speaks on Middle East

Another issue Ross mentioned is that the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) is in eight out of nine major cities in the West Bank. Because of these military incursions, 70 percent of the Palestinian population is living below the poverty line and 580 schools have been closed, according to Ross.

"You can't move people, you can't move goods, you can't breathe," he said.

Ross has worked for 12 years for the United States in helping the Middle East peace process, successfully negotiating the Interim Agreement in 1995 and the Hebron Accord in 1997. He is a commentator for numerous news networks and has recently finished writing his book, "The Missing Peace," which will be available in January.

The talk is the first funded by the Robert and Pamela Jacobs Distinguished Lecture in Jewish Life and Culture. It was also sponsored by the Department of Judaic and Near Eastern Studies, the College of Humanities and Fine Arts and the Office of Jewish Affairs.

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, MAY 8, 2003

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Opinions should be aired with care and professionalism

With the suspension of sports columnist Bob Ryan on Thursday, Boston Globe editor Martin Baron made the right decision to clamp down on the stupidity, not the free speech, of one of its most outspoken employees.

Ryan is the much too fine month without pay. He access to his other outlets on television and radio. Ryan came under fire for comments he made on WBZ-TV anchor Bob Lobel on last Sunday's "Sports Final" about New Jersey Nets point guard Jason Kidd's wife Joumana.

Upon meeting with his woman, this Joumana Kidd, who wants to be a star, wants to be a TV star, Ryan said. She wants face time on camera. The great Ryan forget face time is to bring the cute. [illegible] Oh great I'd like to smack her."

Ryan's [illegible] comments were further illuminated by Mrs. Kidd's already tenuous relationship with Boston fans, who last year were particularly vocal in their criticism of her presence at games, and blamed her (from) her husband's arrest the year prior on a domestic assault charge.

Baron said yesterday, "Bob Ryan's comments were a clear and egregious violation of the standards of The Boston Globe. Bob has been told in no uncertain terms that his remarks were offensive and totally public."

Arguments have, however, been made in favor of Ryan's case. As a high-profile sports commentator, locally on WBZ, and nationally on ESPN, Ryan's actions perceived as simply a reflection of himself – not a representative of The Boston Globe or any network his work appears on.

Still, his word remains his word, and while some may perceive the comments as laughable and largely innocuous, an equal number rightly perceive them as Baron and The Globe did: inappropriate and deserving of reprimand.

Had Ryan's comments appeared in print by way of his column, The Globe would have been called on to shoulder a part of the responsibility and certainly would have lessened his suspension.

Instead, he took to the airwaves with an opinion – one that he has since retracted – that reflected, whether he intended it or not, his newspaper as a whole.

The Globe's decision, if nothing else, helps to set an important precedent for its staff: that they simply can't walk about casting out threats, as unintentional as they may be. That while open discussion and dialogues should be encouraged, they must be tailored professionally – with a criticism but ultimate respect for the subject of discussion at hand.

In the end, it seems, the old adage fits best: sometimes children are better left both unseen and unheard.

For the time being, at least.

Hoedown tradition should end

Peter Trovato

As of late, the 5 o'clock news has not been friendly to UMass. Reports documenting rape, theft and budget cuts seem to be the only time the flagship university receives any press attention. And the latest incident to make news-paper headlines and breaking news segments was the debacle that took place this weekend: the annual Hobart Hoedown gone wrong. But can this party ever go right? The answer, which is becoming ever more apparent, is no.

And the sole blame for the annual party going awry goes to us – the students. It is not the police or the non-student residents of Hobart Lane. It is the students who have ruined this social gathering. A gathering that, through the years, has only garnered infamy because of the disorderly conduct that takes place. Last Saturday, the unruly behavior of UMass' finest resulted in an embarrassment for both the University and students.

Amidst all the problems the University faces regarding budget cuts being handed down from the state, a riot breaks out – an uprising that didn't represent a celebration of a super bowl victory or advocate for social justice. Instead, a riot "just for the hell of it." Let's pelt police officials with rocks and beer bottles; let's light trees on fire and turn over cars. After all, that's what really makes a party. While some people are investing their time in saving UMass, attending rallies for more funding and demanding a better learning environment, others are systematically tearing it down live on the 5 o'clock news.

I doubt there will be another Hobart Hoedown, and rightfully so. It just isn't worth it. There has to be another way for students to convene on a spring weekend. The Hoedown, simply put, is a disaster. But every year, thousands of students flock to Hobart Lane and that is why it is our fault. Our continued support of the event allows for its conception. And the only way for it to end is for the students to refuse to attend the springtime festivities.

> "Some will be shocked and scream from the mountaintops that the Hoedown is a tradition. But it is time for students to question our traditions, because these traditions are hurting us in the long run."

Some will be shocked and scream from the mountaintops that the Hoedown is a tradition. But it is time for students to question our traditions, because these traditions are hurting us in the long run. Before our eyes, our school is being dismantled by the State House – bonds are being rejected and buildings plans are being smashed. We have no ground to fight for our school if we shoot ourselves in the foot by injuring 15 police officials in a riot.

If you think the two are unrelated, you're sorely mistaken. It is taxpayer's dollars that fund this University. Unfortunately, for us, taxpayers watch television and read the newspaper. Seeing drunken college students smashing the windows of police vehicles and burning oak trees doesn't sit well.

There has to be an alternative for our spring weekend. Students have to find a different place to party. The Hoedown is not working anymore – this weekend being the best evidence for that. Next year when spring weekend rolls around, students should stay away from Hobart Lane and find another outlet. A safer, more accepted place to get together on one of the last weekends of the year.

Whatever that place may be, it is going to take the responsibility of the students to realize what they are representing. At all times we represent our school. When a few of us turn over cars in Pulton, the entire university turns it over too; when a few of us smash beer bottles in a riot, the entire university does the same thing.

At the same rate, when some fight for this school to be upheld, we all fight together. When a rally of 500 people takes place in Boston it is really a rally of 25,000. And in order for us to go forward in the battle for our school, the media cannot be reporting violence on this campus constantly.

And what happened this weekend can no longer happen. The Hoedown has been a black mark on the University for quite a while now. It is supposed to be fun, but the "fun" is not helping the overall cause of the students. Keeping the University the number one priority, the Hoedown should be shut down forever.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Jamie Loo

So here it is, my last hurrah. I can't believe it's been four years! I've been waiting a long time to write this. In the grand tradition of graduating ed/op columnists, here are my Notes from the Basement.

If I could do Book of Boo that if you want to make change in a system you should work on it instead of ignorantly protest it. Thanks to Boo for the advice. Rob for letting me come back and Despres for planting the insane idea that I should apply for editor. Dan, thanks for passing me to fill out the actual application you know me better than anyone at this newspaper. Thanks for being my first friend when I came back and for being one of my best as I leave here.

UVC IV 1-9 you're the first [illegible] as my heart always. Much love to UMW News forever. Charlie, remember you're a close friend. Bill Bayce "the ladies choice." Jessica one of my most loyal friends. Nicole Angel the audio miracle at the first game. Melissa you're cooler than you give yourself credit for.

Every late night talks, the 5th floor [illegible] parties, tangelo bars, flashcards, [illegible] ice cream, tears, long drives, Poor Judith Barker." More than words. Chris, more than words. Thanks for being part of my life.

Paul, I cannot wait to show your future children the photo documentation I have of your hairstyle changes. Betsy, I will be paternal in my photos. Jeremy, you're one of my favorite editors and compatriots. Thanks for helping me make sense out of papers that I was convinced didn't make sense...if that made any sense.

All ANA Caucus, never forget the 2000 vote fiasco! Keep fighting the good fight and remember the power lies in the chairs. You guys should have say about what happens in the Office of ALANA Affairs (OAA).

OAA past and present! Arthur, Marjorie, Randavone, Shelley, Malcolm, Marina, Dave, Felix and Sonny, you guys are all going to do great things in life and I'd better hear about them. Don't let that dictator hoss suppress you guys too much.

Place I will never work: The New England Aquarium Penguin Colony. I love penguins, unfortunately at 5'2" I don't meet the height requirement to ever work there. I've been to the aquarium and gosh darn it, the water can't be that deep!

IVCF. I didn't see you guys much this semester but I want you to know how much you've meant to me over the years. Thanks for the prayers and the constant support.

SGA, no matter what anyone else says, I know you guys are trying hard to work for the student body. Props to Speaker Dan Saunders for being one of the most professional people I've ever worked with on this campus.

More cool people: Pat, I'm going to miss Hallway Mime Time. Zassha, thanks for always sticking by me. Emily, thanks for being my biggest Collegian website fan (girl, you read my columns more frequently than some of my friends on this campus do!). Winnie, when you get back from Australia, we have to learn the sport of curling. Kat, some day we will go to a disco and tear up the dance floor. Kristen "Poof Mama," I'm going to miss all the songs.

Lucy Liu, why did you ever advertise for Cover Girl? None of that make-up matches our skin color correctly!

AAPA, I wish I was going to be around to see the organization grow. Keep fighting for Asian-American studies!

Oh goodness, the people that keep this paper running: Jen, I'm glad the M&M game worked for you otherwise we would have never met. You told me once that you thought I was amazing; the only reason I'm even close to that is because people like you inspire me to be better; you're amazing. Melissa, there is no other person in the world I would want to sit with on a guardrail at 2 a.m. When are we getting the pink house?

Kulak, I have three words for you: Teacups of Death! Lizzy thanks for reminding me I am not gutless and I have a spine sometimes. Gerald, don't ever change. Regan, please drive safely in Wisconsin, if you break down somewhere it's going to be just you, the cows and the corn. Scott, I expect e-mails about dog mushing; you're nicer than you advertise. Sacco, the next time I go to Staten Island to visit my aunt I expect you to take me to Denino's. Despres, give yourself more credit, you have more writing talent in your thumb than some of us will have in an entire lifetime! Marzelli, be good, Jim, I'm going to miss the under the breathe comments, that only I get to hear during layout. James, I'm going to miss your stories and your sarcasm, don't ever change. Amy, we'll have to continue our instant messaging cross-country, because you know the subject we always discuss never gets old. Merritt, I'm going to call this newsroom next year to hear you laugh. Oh, and to hear Nick make the purring noise. Courtney, stop harassing me!

I turned into a rabid Minuteman hockey fan this past season, and guess what? There is no ice hockey at the University of Illinois. I suppose I'll just have to be a good grad student and study on winter weekends.

Someone came in here last week and claimed all ed/op writers do is sit in this basement, complain and contribute nothing to this campus. The last time I checked, my fellow columnists were teaching GPE classes, representing the Maroon and White in ice hockey, tabling in the Campus Center for their RSOs, working at the Annual Fund, going door-to-door for fundraisers, being RAs, playing intramurals, protesting the war (or yelling at protesters), members of the SGA, do I need to continue? This the most diverse and active ed/op staff I've been a privilege to be a part of. And they have guts to put out their opinions every week to over 17,000 people, more guts than some of you will ever have, who sit around and complain but can't make a phone call or send a letter to the editor. Columnists, it's been a pleasure to work with you, keep writing and keep people on this campus and in this world on their toes.

UMass, do me two favors. First, don't change the mascot. Secondly, I found out that the fight song that the band plays at all the games actually has lyrics, and obviously barely anyone knows them. Teach the fight song at football games or something! Fellow students, don't be so destructive and don't drink too much. Fight, fight for the life of our school by fighting the budget cuts. Remember to respect each other. Seize every day. UMass, it's been real. I hope when you all leave from here whether it's in a few weeks or a few years, that you'll miss it as much as I will.

The mysterious webcams of Iowa

Scott Eldridge II

Somewhere in Iowa a field lies fallow. A now stagnant image on a webpage serves as an ephemeral memory of last year's excitement – the gripping day to day progress of thousands, maybe millions, taking advantage of every daylight hour and every drop of rain.

"I like your soybean field – as a daily fan of your cornfield, this is a pleasant difference. I also enjoy all the information concerning soy beans."

This testimonial posted on a comments page best summarizes the attention paid to this phenomenon, though specialized, that has surfaced in the Midwest.

Soy cam, Corn cam and Dairy cam, this triumvirate of technology for Iowa, seems to be unique to that state – a quick webcrawl failed to find any other websites devoted to showing off agriculture with quite the same fervor. Apparently the agriculture in Iowa is the most riveting in the union and only Hawkeyes are drawn to this sort of...education, entertainment, something?

The run down is that the soy cam and corn cam are down right now – Iowa Farmer Today is waiting for the soil to firm up so they can plant the internet cameras again. Images from last October, two on each page, show the remnants of harvested fields. But when back online, the pages will feature shots of the soy and corn fields updated every 15 minutes.

Every 15 minutes? How much progress can you actually see in the space of 15 minutes? Save the wonders of time-elapse photography, I don't think you can visually track the advancements of a crop of plants with any visual wonderment. I remember watching sped up shots of flowers blooming and dying at as a child tuned into PBS, but blooming flowers offer color and an attraction beyond the stimuli of a little bean plant or stalk of corn.

Even if there is beauty in agriculture I can't understand the strong interest of these webcams. And there is interest, the sites have attracted the interest of many displaced Iowans, an Airman stationed in Germany and an Iowan who is now in the Army.

> "Apparently the agriculture in Iowa is the most riveting in the union and only Hawkeyes are drawn to this sort of... education, entertainment, something?"

I could understand the tips, timetables and farmer's charts placed elsewhere on the site. These technical details offer mountains of likely necessary material for starting soy farmers or veterans working on a better yield. But the camera offers only poor resolution and a wide angle view so detached from the bean – or corn – that only the moniker at the top of the page tells you what you are watching beyond the obvious, a field.

With the dairy cam there is only a slight improvement – with 30 second updates you can check on the milking parlor, the special needs parlor and the free-stall cam. These three cameras show stuttered movements of penned in milking cows and, if you hit it right, you might see the blurred movement of a milked cow or grazing heifer.

Back to the soy and corn – interesting via their dullness these cameras baffle the abilities of the internet. Granted, I would rather do a weekly checkup on sos than stare at "Chris" – a webcam user who simply points the camera in his direction while he surfs the web. And it surpasses the typical girl gone wild cam, separating itself from these far-from-educational or work oriented cameras.

What's interesting though is the devotion this page holds. For sos to attract the attention of the Air Force in Germany and live corn coverage to attract weekly and daily viewers goes beyond the interest of fantasy sports or online casinos. There isn't even an interaction factor here – fans of the site watch and wait and diehards post their feedback – and the site holds up on its visual doldrums.

Iowa Farmer Today – the sponsoring publication – does offer a wide expanse of services for farmers. Listings on machinery, advice on planning, yearly statistics and features on the success of Iowans in the field fill the better part of the online edition of the weekly newspaper.

"I have checked in on the soy cam and the corn cam and am still amazed. How much purpose does a live feed of growing plants serve? How much can change day to day? Is there nothing else going on in Iowa?"

- My post to the soy cam.

Summer Concert Season HEATS UP in Boston

Deny thy Britney and refuse thy name: Christina Aguilera and Justin Timberlake co-headlining a concert dubbed the Justified and Stripped Tour? Oh the horror!

The dirty fighter and the 'N Sync badboy (no the boy band has not broken up – they return to the studio later this year) hope to appease concertgoers when they roll through Boston's FleetCenter Aug 5 and 6. Timberlake is rocking his 2002 solo debut, "Justified," while Aguilera is supporting last year's "Stripped."

"I'm really looking forward to working with Justin," Aguilera said in a statement. "We are going to put on an unbelievable show. Get ready. This is something you don't want to miss."

"I'm looking forward to this tour because it's the first time I'm touring as a solo artist and the first time I'm getting to perform the songs from my CD 'Justified' for my fans," Timberlake said. "This tour with Christina is going to allow the fans to see two great concerts in one night."

Boston audiences agree, which is why a second date has been added.

The tour won't be Aguilera's and Timberlake's first collaboration; as children, the two co-starred on Disney's "All-New Mickey Mouse Club," as did Ms. Spears.

Britney will be crying a river on June 4 when the tour kicks off in Phoenix.

Aerosmith and Kiss

How often do you get two legendary musical acts hitting the road on the same stage? Not so often.

Kiss and Aerosmith will be making rock fans happy this summer when they kick of their co-headlining summer tour in Hartford, CT on August 2. The two groups will be blasting their way into the Boston area on August 25th and 27th at the Tweeter Center for the Performing Arts in Mansfield. The tour is scheduled to hit most major cities across the U.S.

Aerosmith's last album release was a greatest hits release last year featuring yet another collection of tunes spanning three decades, as well as the radio hit from last summer "Girls of Summer."

Kiss is best known for their bizarre onstage theatrics and taking the pyro, makeup and costumed enhanced performing to a whole new level.

Saliva will open up for the two bands on the entire tour in support of their latest release, "Back into Your System."

Warped Tour

One of the most enduring rock festivals of our generation will unveil itself to eager fans starting June 19th in Idaho.

The tour is, of course, the Vans Warped Tour, the huge day-long celebration of punk music and extreme sports that has been drawing fans every since Green Day was just a band struggling to get its voice heard. Now the festival that has showcased such classic punk bands as NOFX and Bad Religion will shine its spotlight on today's up-and-coming rock stars.

Rising stars AFI, The All-American Rejects, The Ataris, The Used and Simple Plan will join veterans Rancid and Pennywise on stage, along with the occasional underground hip-hop act (Atmosphere, Talib Kweli.) Along with music, the festival will highlight various social causes and extreme sports tournaments.

Counting Crows and John Mayer

John Mayer and Counting Crows will be hitting the road together this summer in one of the most anticipated tours of the summer.

Mayer is still touring promoting his first commercial release, "Room for Squares." He also won a Best Pop performance Grammy last February for the sweet ode to romance "Your Body is a Wonderland." Mayer is expected to be playing some new material on this tour off of his upcoming, still-unnamed second album. His latest single is "Why Georgia," and it's currently moving its way up the Billboard Hot 200.

Counting Crows released their 5th album, "Hard Candy," last July and are heading out on tour in support their latest collection. Their first release, "August and Everything After," was nominated for several Grammy awards.

The tour kicks off on July 7th in Denver, Colo., and continues through September. Mayer and the Counting Crows will be playing in the Boston area on August 22nd when they take the stage at the Tweeter Center for the Performing Arts in Mansfield.

People in the news: Timberlake, Rome

NEW YORK (AP) – Justin Timberlake is going from center stage to the sidelines as a special correspondent for Turner Sports.

The 'N Sync singer will report from several sports events for TNT, including the NBA playoffs, NASCAR races and the PGA championship. For TBS, he'll appear at major league baseball games and Big 12 and Pac-10 college football games.

"We are excited at what this unique marriage between the world of sports and entertainment can bring to our high-profile sports properties," Mike Pearl, executive producer for Turner Sports, said Tuesday. "Justin's interest and enthusiasm not only in the NBA, but in all sports should help provide our broadcasts with a new fresh approach."

The 22 year-old pop star has played in the celebrity basketball game during the NBA All-Star Weekend the past two years. Last year, he hit a long-range jumper over fellow TNT analyst Kenny Smith, who won two championships with the Houston Rockets.

Timberlake's debut solo album "Justified," has sold more than 2 million copies.

LOS ANGELES (AP) – Lawrence Hilton-Jacobs, who played Freddie "Boom Boom" Washington on the '70s sitcom "Welcome Back Kotter," was arrested for investigation of misdemeanor domestic battery for allegedly pushing a woman to the ground during an argument, police said.

Hilton-Jacobs was roller-skating with the 42-year-old woman at Venice Beach when two officers heard a commotion about 2:30 p.m. Sunday, investigated and arrested the actor, police spokeswoman Grace Brady said. Brady said there were no visible injuries to the alleged victim whose name was not released.

Hilton-Jacobs was booked, with bond set at $20,000, and was released from custody late Monday.

The 49-year-old didn't immediately return a call Tuesday for comment placed through his agent Dan Tolstoy.

Hilton-Jacobs also appeared in the 1970s films "Claudine" and "Cooley High" and in the TV miniseries "Roots."

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) – Music Row veteran John Grady will take over as president of Sony Music's Nashville division, the company said.

The announcement follows a shake-up last week at Sony Nashville in which the division's president and two other executives resigned as part of a company-wide restructuring.

Allen Butler, president and executive officer, resigned Friday along with Blake Chancey, executive vice president-senior vice president of A&R (artists and repertoire), and Mike Kraski, executive vice president-general manager.

No other replacements have been named.

"With his eclectic tastes, passion for music, dead-on marketing sensibilities and vast business acumen, John Grady is one of the most talented guys in the business," said Don Ienner, president of Sony Music U.S.

As the new president of Sony Nashville, Grady also will oversee Columbia Nashville, Epic Nashville, Lucky Dog and Monument.

Grady most recently was president of DMZ records, a joint venture between Columbia Records and recording artist producer T Bone Burnett and filmmakers Joel and Ethan Coen.

From 1997 to 2002, he was senior vice president of sales, marketing and promotion for Mercury Nashville and Lost Highway Records, where he helped market the Grammy-winning, multiplatinum "O Brother, Where Art Thou?" movie soundtrack.

He also has worked for Capitol Records, Arista Records, MCA Records and A&M Records.

NEW YORK (AP) – Bolt down the tables. Jim Rome is back on 1SPN.

The combative sports talk-show host returned to the network with the premiere of his weekly show, "Rome Is Burning," Tuesday night. The hour-long show features commentary from Rome, plus guests and other commentators.

He stopped "The Last Word With Jim Rome" on Fox Sports Net late in 2002, after a five-year run. Rome's first foray into television came in 1993, when he hosted "Talk2" on ESPN2.

'Fever' falls short of spectacular but singer Karen O's vocals shine

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Reviewer

Raw, primal carnality drips from every inch of "Fever To Tell," the long-awaited full-length, major label debut from New York City scenesters the Yeah Yeah Yeah's. Lead singer Karen O sounds like she's on the perpetual verge of climax, her voice teetering just on the edge of hoarse. There are times when she sounds like she's already there, her caterwauling vocals an orgiastic burst of yelps, moans, screeches, growls, yawps and sighs. O doesn't so much sing as become possessed by the music, her old school rock star swagger drenched in as much conviction and sexuality as she can fit in in less than 40 minutes.

O's lik, a pleasure-sucking cross between Polly Harvey and Debbie Harry, and for her the mission is to get it, and get it fast. "So stuck up/ I wish you would stick it to me/ flesh ripped off..." she sings in the attention-getting opener "Rich," lyrics that she follows with some ungodly skyscraping howls. "I got a man who makes me wanna kill," she roars on "Man" and later on, on "Black Tongue," she caps a series of steamy "uh-uh, uh-uhs, uh-uhs" with an enraptured shriek of pleasure. It's hard to tell if O's act is a put-on, or if she truly is this, ahem, excited by her music.

The Yeah Yeah Yeah's "Fever To Tell" Interscope

If "Fever To Tell" isn't the new breath of rock that music magazine hipsters have hyped it to be, then that's just fine, because the Yeah Yeah Yeah's aren't the saviors of rock and roll. The trio of O, Nick Zinner (guitar) and Brian Chase (drums) manage to both live up to the hype – and fail to achieve such stratospheric heights laid out for them. "Fever To Tell" is 37 minutes of jagged art-punk anthems that come in fast, quick, and dirty, and go out before you know it. The problem with the Yeah Yeah Yeahs, and the thing that keeps them from greatness, is the noticeable insubstantiality of the music.

At least half the songs come in under three minutes ("Man" and "Tick" last less than two) and O has a neat lyrical trick in which she repeats words or phrases over and over and over again. Pair that with lyrical content that's mostly centered around sex and how to get it and you have the aural equivalent of a one-night stand – enjoyable, but empty and ultimately forgettable.

That isn't to say that "Fever To Tell" isn't a wholly unpleasant experience. O's libidinous, whooping vocals go a long way to make this "The Karen O Show," but Zinner and Chase know how to back up a force of nature vocalist. Lacking a bass, Zinner makes up for it by threading his guitar through two amps, kicking up a tornado of skuzzy back-alley blare. As O pants and heaves, Zinner tosses out darts for guitar lines, not so much riffing as laying O on a cushion of noise. All the while, there's Chase, steadily supplying rhythm back on the drums.

The Yeah Yeah Yeahs travel through down New York alleyways to the junction where punk rock and disco sleaze meet. As much of "Fever To Tell" is as danceable as it is spasmodic, with flailing punk butting up against grubby, late night dance-pop. Just listen to the jangly keyboards that hum through "Rich."

Chase provides the heartbeat of the album, and when he melds those voodoo rhythms with Zinner's simmering vortex and O's passionate wails, the sound resulting is one of pure ecstasy.

That said much of the first half of "Fever to Tell" is samey, with one blast of sharp clatter after another. The Yeah Yeah Yeah's are known for their vibrant stage shows, so their long time fans may be surprised that in the second half of "Fever To Tell" the songs get progressively more stripped down and intimate. They still like to play with old rock tropes, such as on "Y Control," but this time Zinner plays his guitar in open fields that allow his notes to breath, while O surrenders vocal tics to reveal raw vulnerability under her sexy-party-girl swagger.

The album's emotionally heartbreaking centerpiece, the beauteously wistful "Maps," has a bruised and delicate O whispering the yearning refrain "Wait/ They don't love you like I love you" as both an order and a plea. The closer, "Modern Romance," strips the music down to the sparest of parts. O's voice has now become a backwoods warble, earnest and devastated and held in the air by the spacey guitar and the slowly pulsing drums. It's a wrenching and absolutely absorbing portrait of a human who has used sexual bravado to conceal their insecurities. This is the real reason the Yeah Yeah Yeah's rock – not because they make fuzzy New York scene noise, but because a heart beats underneath.

Micrology concludes the year with 'guess the retired food slogan'

All good things must come to an end: this much is true in life as well as microwave columns. Summer is approaching faster than a bullet in a pair of track shoes and this column marks the final week of Micrology. I hope the witty quips and useless facts served as a humorous interlude in the journey from Ed/Op to the Sports page.

Finals and papers have left most of the student body with itches in their britches, so let's have a little quiz of our own, shall we? The following advertising slogans have been used for the past 50 years to describe some of the nation's most popular foods. Try to figure out what the slogan was actually used in advertising and which ones are phony. Who cares if you cheat?

A) READY TO EAT
B) BORING AS HELL
C) GIVE IT A TRY
D) DROWN THEM IN SUGAR, THEY'RE NOT SO BAD

First introduced in 1941, Cheerios burst onto the scene with the slogan "Ready to Eat." It's about as colorful as the cereal itself, which should give you some idea of how basic the product actually is. Long ago, the breakfast item had Cheeri O'Leary, a bright-eyed, pig-tailed Irish lass, as a mascot. The cute little chick was kicked to the curb before the end of the decade, when the Lone Ranger became the long-standing spokesperson for Cheerios. When last contacted, Cheeri had checked herself into the Betty Ford clinic for detox. It's a sad, sad fate, which befalls these beloved mascots.

A) FAT THIGHS ARE UNDERRATED
B) A KID WILL EAT THE MIDDLE OF AN OREO FIRST AND SAVE THE CHOCOLATE COOKIE OUTSIDE FOR LAST
C) OREO: MAKING THE WORLD A BETTER PLACE, ONE DAY AT A TIME
D) OREO: WE KNOW WHERE YOU LIVE

The turn of the century brought about many interesting changes in America, perhaps none so profound as the introduction of a chocolate cookie sandwich named Oreo. Without the consultation of American youths, advertising reps quickly decided their slogan should focus on the creamy white frosting betwixt two dry wafers. Several tests have been done to refute this slogan (no I'm not kidding, look it up) and many researchers have discovered children prefer dunking the cookie into a tall glass of milk or eating the treat whole.

A) A LITTLE COKE-AINE WILL DO YA
B) PEPSI TASTES LIKE POO
C) THE GREAT NATIONAL TEMPERENCE
D) COCA-COLA: JESUS WOULD DRINK IT.

No, the Messiah wouldn't drink the fizzy beverage, but millions of Americans would before the century would come to a close. In the late nineteenth century Dr. John Sythe Pemberton marketed the carbonated beverage to the public. By 1905, the soda was marketed as "the great national temperance." One thing was certain; burping contests would never be the same. As for the cocaine reference, the rumors are true. Though you'll never discover the fact on the Coke company website, the name Coca-Cola was derived from the two plants used to flavor the beverage: kola nuts and coca leaves. The precise amount of cocaine in the early beverages cannot be determined, however a strain of the drug was present in the first years of its marketing. But worry not, straight edgers, the soda has been drug free since 1929.

A) CHOOSY MOTHER'S CHOOSE JIF
B) PEANUT BUTTER MAKES IT BETTER
C) YUMMY HAPPY GOOD SPREAD
D) STICKS TO YOUR MOUTH LIKE A GOOD MORNING KISS

Ok, so this was an easy one. The slogan for the peanut spread first appeared in 1977. The actress hawking the sticky protein was none other than Bibi Osterwald, who played Jewish mother Sophie Steinberg in the television sitcom "Briget loves Bernie." The slogan has undergone some change over the years and has more recently morphed into "Moms like you choose Jif." Wouldn't a marketing technique such as this one make those who simply prefer the taste of a peanut butter product being endorsed by a flying man-child feel badly? By the way Peter Pan, since we're bringing up your own product endorsement, let's drop the act. You're pushing 100 right now; the tights and pointy shoes are getting old and scary.

A) BEEF: LET'S EAT A CRITTER
B) BEEF: THE ATKINS THINNER
C) BEEF: TASTES LIKE BABY
D) BEEF: IT'S WHAT'S FOR DINNER

Another easy one, for some reason babies and critter consumption didn't fly in the boardroom discussions. Believe me, no one's more surprised than I am. This slogan got the panties of every animal rights group in a twist. Connections with beef and cancer/mad cow disease/heart disease have left the cow carcass with a bad rap. In an effort to boost purchases, the USDA began running commercials with savory beef meals in the late 1990s. The bottom line to the slogan has left many wondering why the anonymous voice commands that they consume something that they have no particular interest in. But if T.V. says it's good for me what could be wrong with that?

Apple Computers, James Dean in briefs

MOSCOW (AP) – Russian officials promised to take tougher action to protect intellectual property rights and rid the country of its reputation as a major producer of counterfeit music and videos.

"Intellectual property is the most important resource, including for economic growth," Prime Minister Mikhail Kasyanov told a meeting of the government commission created to fight the problem, according to the ITAR-Tass news agency.

Russia has come under increasing pressure, particularly from the United States, to do more to tackle software piracy. Washington says Russia is the world's second largest producer of counterfeit music and video products after China.

Russia's Interior Ministry estimates the turnover in pirated goods at $1 billion to $5 billion, and Kasyanov acknowledged Tuesday that "chaos and illegality reign supreme in this sphere at present."

Licensed CDs and cassettes are far more expensive than pirated goods, and many Russians say counterfeit products are the only ones they can afford, making a crackdown unpopular and thereby reducing the political incentive for the government to get involved.

Media Minister Mikhail Lesin said the government would try to take measures that would ensure that neither the consumer nor the vendor suffers, the Interfax news agency reported.

He said the government commission expects to draft its proposals by September. The aim will be to "harmonize the national laws concerning copyright and adjacent rights with international conventions and international legislation," ITAR-Tass quoted Lesin as saying.

Russian law enforcement officers routinely conduct very public raids on illegal markets, but usually the sellers are back in business within days.

'INDIANA JONES' TRILOGY TO BE RELEASED IN NEW DVD SET

LOS ANGELES (AP) – The "Indiana Jones" trilogy starring Harrison Ford will debut in the digital format for the first time on Nov. 4, Paramount Home Entertainment and Lucasfilm Ltd. said.

The three movies, directed by Steven Spielberg and produced by George Lucas, previously have been available only on VHS tapes, which have inferior picture and sound quality compared with DVD.

The new DVD set will include "Raiders of the Lost Ark" (1981), "Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom" (1984) and 1989's "Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade," it was announced Tuesday.

Behind-the-scenes documentaries, cast and crew interviews and other special features will be presented on a fourth disc.

"This collection explores every facet of how the films were made, from stunts to visual effects to the music and sound," said Jim Ward, a marketing executive for Lucasfilm. "We take viewers around the world to explore the history behind the Indiana Jones legends."

The films will be available only as a collection, priced around $49.95.

APPLE COMPUTER SAYS ON-LINE MUSIC SERVICE SALES EXCEEDING EXPECTATIONS

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) – Apple Computer Inc. said it exceeded record industry expectations by selling more than 1 million songs since the launch of its online music store a week ago.

"Our internal measure of success was having the iTunes Music Store sell 1 million songs in the first month," Doug Morris, chief executive officer of the Universal Music Group, said Monday. "To do this in one week is an over-the-top success."

The sales affirm what analysts and industry executives have said of the Apple iTunes Music Store – that it's one of the most consumer friendly methods yet of buying songs electronically and legally.

Songs are 99 cents per download, and unlike competitors, the Apple service has virtually no copy protection. Customers can keep the songs indefinitely, share them on as many as three Macintosh computers and play them on any number of iPod portable music players. No subscriptions are necessary and buyers can burn unlimited copies of the songs onto CDs.

More than half the songs were purchased as albums, Apple said. The company also sold 20,000 of the newest iPod models over the weekend and received more than 110,000 orders.

Apple chief executive officer Steve Jobs won licensing deals with all five major record labels to open the online music outlet – a coup that other industry-backed, subscription-based online services obtained only recently after more than a year of stagnant sales.

The iTunes Music Store launched April 28 with 200,000 tracks. About 3,000 more songs were being added Tuesday, Apple said.

A $30 MILLION PLAN WILL RENOVATE KIEL OPERA HOUSE IN ST. LOUIS

ST. LOUIS (AP) – A St. Louis landmark is about to get a new life.

Developer Donald Breckenridge has announced plans to renovate the Kiel Opera House, refurbishing the ornate art deco building into the performing arts and community center of its past. The building is scheduled to reopen in 2005.

"After spending the last seven months researching and planning this project, I'm totally committed," Breckenridge said Monday.

Breckenridge plans to spend up to $30 million to renovate the opera house, which closed in 1991 when a civic group demolished the adjacent Kiel Auditorium to build what is now the Savvis Center, home of the St. Louis Blues.

The Kiel Opera House was placed on the National Register of Historic Places in 2002.

Under a joint operating agreement, Clear Channel Entertainment of New York and St. Louis-based Fox Associates would bring Broadway shows and other entertainment to the 3,500-seat auditorium. Plans also call for renovation of four smaller theaters that could be used for smaller productions and speeches.

Savvis Center is the lessee for the complex that includes Savvis and the Kiel Opera House. Savvis Center President and chief executive Mark Sauer said owners Bill and Nancy Laurie will waive rental payments for the first 20 years after the renovation is complete.

Breckenridge said the majority of financing already is in place. State historic tax credits will help fund the project.

JAMES DEAN GALLERY MOVING FROM ACTOR'S HOMETOWN

FAIRMOUNT, Ind. (AP) – The curator of a gallery of James Dean memorabilia plans to move the display from the film star's hometown.

The new location in Gas City is less than 10 miles north of Dean's hometown of Fairmount, but gallery owner David Loehr hopes the new site's proximity to the interstate will attract more visitors.

"I think by moving to this new location it could become one of the most popular tourist attractions in the state," Loehr said.

Wizards sever ties with Jordan

By Joseph White
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Imagine that, an NBA team showing Michael Jordan the door. Even he was shocked.

The Washington Wizards abruptly dumped basketball's most popular figure Wednesday, ending a relationship that produced much fanfare but little success over 5 1/2 seasons.

Disappointed with the team's poor record and embarrassed by infighting on and off the court, owners Abe Pollin and Ted Leonsis told Jordan about their decision in a short morning meeting at the team's arena.

After it was over, Jordan left in a convertible, with the top down.

He was the Wizards' president before coming out of retirement to play for them the past two years. He retired for good last month and expected to return to the team's front office.

"This was definitely my desire and intention," Jordan said in a statement. "However, today, without any prior discussion with me, ownership informed me that it had unilaterally decided to change our mutual long-term understanding.

"I am shocked by this decision, and by the callous refusal to offer me any justification for it."

A Wizards source, speaking on condition of anonymity, told The Associated Press that Pollin's decision was based on three factors: player dissension, a franchise faltering after the years of Jordan in charge, and deteriorating relationships throughout the organization.

The source said no decision has been made about the front-office people Jordan hired, or whether Jordan's hand-picked coach, Doug Collins, will remain for the final two years of his contract.

"While the roster of talent he has assembled here in Washington may not have succeeded to his and my expectations, I do believe Michael's desire to win and be successful is unquestioned," Pollin said in a statement. "In the end, Ted and I felt that this franchise should move in a different direction."

Jordan led the Chicago Bulls to six NBA titles in the 1990s but never came close to duplicating that success in Washington. In essence, he transformed the Wizards from a largely ignored mess into a very public one.

The Wizards haven't won a playoff game since 1988, and the franchise's only NBA championship came in 1978 as the Bullets.

Jordan put the franchise back on the map when he was hired in January 2000, but his record was just 110-179 as the top decision-maker, a role he kept even after returning as a player.

tated by the team's performance, while others purchase raffle tickets with hopes of winning a free pizza to be eaten in the luxury seats behind centerfield. Several UMass professors unwind by journeying to the field after teaching a full day of classes, as do many other campus employees. Only a small fraction of the crowd consists of UMass students, many of whom are just interrupting their afternoon jog to watch a few innings. Regardless of where they come from or why they choose to go, the Minutewomen point to their fans as a tremendous source of support.

"Our fans are great," Cahalan said. "The old men that come out and the alumni that come out are awesome. They're always coming over and saying stuff to us and congratulating us and telling us how awesome we are. If we don't have parents to come to our games, then the alumni and our fans are enough. They definitely pat our backs enough for everyone."

Fan support should prove to be a vital part of UMass' fate in this weekend's A-10 Championship Tournament. In past years when the Minutewomen have traveled elsewhere to compete in the annual competition, the opposition's fan-base was fractional in comparison to the crowds drawn to the UMass Softball Complex. In hosting this late-season contest, the UMass fans should provide a championship atmosphere that is perfectly suited for a conference tournament.

"I think the fact that we draw well and do have fans makes it into a championship environment," coach Elaine Sortino said. "In the last environments that we've been in the last three years, there were hardly any people there. It's tough to have a championship and no fan support."

Opposing teams are not the only ones that must compete with both the Minutewomen and their fans. The umpires have been held in check all season by UMass' dedicated group of followers. With their backs only 10 feet from the crowded bleachers behind home plate, the umpires either make the right calls or become victim to a barrage of boos from angry fans.

Even the eldest of the UMass faithful won't let the umpires get away with making a bad call. When an umpire called a questionable third strike in a game against St. Bonaventure earlier this season, the UMass fans were not afraid to inform him of their discontent. One older gentleman who had been quietly watching the game got a laugh from the rest of the crowd when he blurted out, "What's the matter ump, got a hot date tonight?" The UMass fans may appear harmless and innocent as they punch out their BINGO numbers, but when push comes to shove, there is no room for error.

"The fans can really set the tone of the game," Holtz said. "If they're all over the umpire right off the bat, it's awesome. Having them so close is really important for not only intimidating the other team, but it also sets the tone for how the strikes are going to be called. Seeing people lined up all along the outfield fence makes us feel like there is tremendous support for us."

With the A-10 Championships taking place at UMass this year, the Minutewomen will look to give something back to their fans in the form of a tournament victory.

"The greatest plus is to be in our own environment and to have the opportunity to bring the championship to the people who have supported us for so long," Sortino said. "It makes me feel good that they can see it since they haven't been able to for the last couple of years."

The Minutewomen truly are lucky to have such dedicated fans. And the fans are lucky to be able to watch the games in such a quality facility. It is only fitting that such a successful team play at a venue such as the UMass Softball Complex.

From the bleachers behind home plate, the fans are treated to a charming view of the UMass campus. From the high-rises in Southwest to the water towers behind

CHRIS FIORE/COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen have won 55-straight home games at the UMass Softball Complex.

Orchard Hill, nearly every building on campus can be seen from the UMass Softball Complex. A slight turn to the left and you are struck with a magnificent view of the Berkshire mountains in the far-off distance. As the wind shifts, the not-always-pleasing smell of nearby farms lingers in the air.

The grass on the field has maintained its deep green color despite the cold winter and wet spring, while the music between innings keeps the players and fans enthusiastic. There are so many things that make the UMass Softball Complex unique, and they are all things that the team has grown to love.

"I love how the people can surround the field. I like the feeling of the scoreboard and the fact that it's big and we get to put all of the players' names on the board with their numbers," Sortino said as she looked out onto the field from next to the dugout. "I think that we have a great sound system. I think that our anthem is great. I love our grass; we have a beautiful playing surface. The dugouts are first-rate. It's just a great playing site."

Granted, the Minutewomen have a lot of things on their side as they head into the A-10 Championships this afternoon. But winning is never guaranteed. Sortino has always emphasized that point, and doesn't consider home games automatic victories. If the Minutewomen want to add another A-10 Championship banner to the fence, then they must continue to play as relentlessly as they have all season.

UMass will face Fordham in the first round today at noon, and the Rams will look to make their first appearance in the tournament a memorable one. But the Rams are entering a place where many have come, but only few have succeeded. The Minutewomen will fight intrepidly to defend their home field as win number 56 hangs in the balance.

"When you're good at something, you just try to get better and better," Cahalan said. "I think that we play extremely fearless at home. We play to win, we don't play to not-lose."

does that would make Yoda bite his little green knuckle in envy.

Like last year against Navy, when Leveille was pummeled to the ground on a 1-on-3 fast break. With the Midshipmen hacking at him like Paul Bunyan, he weaved through on his knees and fed a blind pass to a trailing teammate for the goal.

Cannella was asked about it after the game and could only reply with "Well, ... Kevin can do that."

In fact, he does it all the time.

In a late March game against Hofstra, Leveille was sandwiched between two Pride defensemen as he entered the restraining box. Somehow, he managed to free his right hand and shovel a pass to Chris Fiore while collapsing to the turf.

"I wish I could help you out," Fiore says. "But I don't know what it is. It's like, when he gets out there he's like Mr. Lacrosse or somethin'.

"Some kind of superhero."

Even Leveille can't explain his so-called "powers." When asked about that play against Navy, he becomes a foil of his on-field self. Instead of smooth and calm, he looks uncomfortable in his own skin.

"I don't know," he says while shifting awkwardly in a metal school chair. "I saw him coming before I got hit I guess. I kind of look before I'm supposed to look so I don't have to look again. You know?"

Translation: You can't explain what he does.

Cannella uses "that extra something" as the all-encompassing phrase to explain the magic Leveille does with a lacrosse stick. All great players have it, and it's what allows Leveille to be the most important person in a game, without scoring.

"He knows what it means to play offense," Cannella said after a 10-9 home win over Navy in March. "There are more important things than points. It's not easy to explain what he does out there, but he didn't score today and you could argue he was our best player out there."

It's easy to marvel at Leveille's statistics. He's been one of the country's most dangerous midfielders for the last three years. And he'll likely leave UMass in the top 10 in career points and goals.

His teammates even argue that he could score more if he was so inclined.

"He wouldn't be happy," Cannella maintains. "He makes people around him really good. That's the way we play and he enjoys the hell out of it. He's the ultimate team performer. That's the way he's always been."

Ten years ago, while Cannella was still an assistant under John Espey at Stony Brook, Leveille's exploits were urban legend in upstate New York. Cannella saw him play for the first time at a youth tournament in Lake Placid run by Kevin's father.

"Kevin was very, very good," he remembers. "He just had a knack for scoring. He wasn't as big as he is now, but he still has the hands he has now."

At the Empire State Games after his freshman year at Albany Academy, the roster had Leveille listed as a junior. So college coaches weren't surprised when he dominated the tournament, leading an overmatched Adirondack team to a medal.

"Coaches started calling me, sending me letters and offering me scholarships right on the spot," Leveille says. "Then I told them I was just a freshman and they were like, 'I don't think we're supposed to do this.'"

So while the nation's top college coaches put their offers on the shelf, Leveille took Albany, a town with no major sports franchises, and made it his own.

Crowds were above average for his hockey and lacrosse games. People were anxious to see Leveille and childhood friend Marc Cavosie (now in the Minnesota Wild organization) put on an offensive display in two sports. Things like NHL Division I and scholarships began to scuttle along the sidelines of lacrosse fields and through the stands in hockey rinks.

Entering his junior season, Leveille was the two-sport, blue-chip prospect people expected him to be. That's when he began to hear the overtures.

Coaches promised him starting spots, National Championships and the ball (or puck) whenever he wanted it.

Some people around Albany told him to stay close to home and go to Syracuse, or take his talents down south where the weather is pleasant.

But Leveille shut those people out. He had followed his father's lead his entire life. He started playing lacrosse when he was eight because his dad had recently picked up the sport. And some of the first games he played were in youth leagues started and run by his father.

So when George told his son he supported him in making his own choice, it's no wonder Kevin took it to heart.

He faced down the important decisions by listening to himself. He knew he couldn't play both hockey and lacrosse in college, so he chose to play lacrosse, despite the potential of a lucrative pro contract for hockey.

"You score more in lacrosse, I like that," he says.

His college decision was a lot less difficult. He could have gone to Maryland or Johns Hopkins, but their slow down style wasn't a good fit for Leveille's open-minded approach.

Syracuse and its run-and-gun offense was an option, but they recruited him late and he "really didn't want to go there."

Any chance those schools had was rendered mute when Cannella walked into the Leveille living room.

"I promised him we'd play up-tempo," Cannella remembers. "I told him we'd get him the ball in good positions."

Leveille was convinced. And despite the mercurial Pioneer Valley weather and second-rate facilities, he signed with the Minutemen.

For Cannella, Leveille's mere presence accelerated the move to a more aggressive offensive style. Cannella began running the offense through his prized recruit and after a four-win freshman season that Kevin calls "the best learning experience of his life," the plan began to work.

He opened his sophomore year with four goals and six points against Hofstra and rode the momentum to a 43-point season. Senior attackman Rich Kunkel was the top scorer, but everybody close to the team knew Kevin was the catalyst.

So it was no surprise when Cannella called Leveille's number in a tie game against Georgetown.

With under a minute left and an NCAA tournament bid on the line, Leveille hesitated on a dodge and lost the ball to Kyle Sweeney.

It should have been over, instead it was Steve Dusseau who scored in the waning moments to clinch the ECAC's automatic bid and end UMass' magical 10-0 start.

Two days later, Leveille slouched in his chair in a 9 a.m. English class. While the professor talked about Dante's Inferno, Leveille was thinking about his own personal levels of hell on the lacrosse field.

He hung his head and dragged his heels out of the room after class. Leveille was looking for a place to hide. But not from a fan or past acquaintance. He was trying to hide from himself.

He looked almost lost in the dusty hallway of Bartlett Hall, when a friend inquired about his mood.

"I had the ball," he responded. "I had it, I froze and I just lost it."

Along with the ball, Leveille seemed to lose his magic. Not only was he held scoreless a week later in a 10-9 loss to Syracuse, but whispers from reporters suggested he was hurting the team when he was on the field.

All of a sudden, things began to fall apart for the golden boy of lacrosse. Despite a 12-2 season, the loss to the Orange assured UMass would be sitting home for the postseason. So Leveille spent all summer wondering if he cost his team a chance at a National Championship.

With that in mind, he came into fall practice as motivated as he'd ever been. Then, while he was standing on the sideline during an intrasquad scrimmage, a teammate was checked into his knee, effectively curbing his momentum.

Leveille had never experienced adversity like this in his career. Everything had always come easy to him – scoring, performing, winning and even staying healthy.

"I wince in practice when he gets hit," Cannella says. "He's so rubbery though he seems to just get back up. I remember watching him in high school. He was so tough he'd take the hit to make the play."

Unfortunately, he wasn't even playing when he took the worst hit of his career, and he hasn't been the same since. Leveille was healthy enough in the spring to play, but he was hindered by the injury and a cumbersome knee brace.

"I never felt 100 percent," he says. "I wasn't in the best shape I could have been in. I felt like I was out of the loop."

He played like it too. Through 10 games (UMass was 8-2) Leveille was on pace for another 40-point season. But he wasn't putting up the numbers people expected from a player who scored 43 as a sophomore.

His critics saw his smooth deliberate style and mistook it for an aloof attitude.

"I've always been criticized for looking lackadaisical on the field," he says. "It might look that way, but I worked my tail off."

Cannella, Fiore and anybody in the program will vouch for that. The real problem was that Leveille wasn't having any fun. He had misplaced his creativity and flair. His dumbfounding feats were few and far between, as he seemed resigned to simply running the offense.

That fact was compounded by a 9-8 loss to Yale in which Leveille went scoreless and was a non-factor at the end of the game.

"That was a wake-up call for all of us," captain Matt MacFarland would say later.

UMass looked like it was falling apart right before the Georgetown game that would decide the fate of the ECAC's automatic bid.

Leveille admits now that he had been thinking about the rematch with Sweeney and the Hoyas.

"It was always in my mind," he says.

Who knew?

After Leveille lost the ball, Cannella chose not to bring it up.

"You can't say anything to a guy like that," Cannella says. "But I wasn't worried about it at all. He's a good enough kid to stay positive."

Like his dad had done for him when Kevin was choosing his direction in life, his coach did the same, and let him work it out on his own.

"I know the type of person Kevin Leveille is," Cannella says. "He knows there's always better days ahead."

His coach was right. Leveille quickly turned a damp Saturday afternoon in Washington into one of his best days.

Four goals on four shots with Sweeney on him the whole game. He was flawless in a 17-13 win. When the game ended, and UMass was officially headed to the tournament, five members of that senior class that were denied their chance at a title one year earlier, leapt over the bleachers and rushed the field.

The first person they grabbed was Leveille.

The magic was back. A week later, he was UMass' best player in a loss to Cuse at the Carrier Dome.

He scored three goals, big deal. Leveille was back to dropping jaws again. Like he did in the second half when he caught an errant clearing pass behind his head in full stride, then slipped past two defenders as they crashed into each other.

He impressed again in the quarterfinals against Hopkins when he and Fiore combined for two goals in the last 42 seconds to send the game into overtime.

Leveille cut the deficit to one when he lost two defensemen with a direction change before faking All-American goalie Nick Murtha into the blue Baltimore sky and depositing his third goal of the game.

The Blue Jays scored in OT without Leveille and the offense ever getting another possession. That gave him something to think about, not dwell on, over the summer.

Now in his senior year, he is having fun with the game again. He's back to drawing up plays and trying new things in practice. His knee is mostly pain free, his creativity is in full effect and he has people around campus talking about lacrosse.

Fans are showing up at Garber Field just to see what he'll do. To see if he makes a goalie fall down like he did against Hartford. To see if he scores 10 points in a game like he did against Stony Brook. To see if he scores on a behind-the-back shot from an impossible angle like he did against Sacred Heart. To see if he owns a game without registering a single point.

Like his fans, Leveille knows this is his swan song.

"My games are dwindling," he says.

But no matter what happens the rest of the way, Cannella is sure his star has secured a legacy.

"Every great player does," Cannella says. But like most parts of Leveille's game, Cannella can't explain exactly what that legacy is.

Cannella has established a tradition at UMass where certain jersey numbers are held in high regard to honor those who first wore them. They are passed on only to players that prove themselves worthy.

The No. 3 started with all-world attackman Mark Millon. The number two began with Sal LoCascio, who is widely considered to be the greatest goaltender of all time. The No. 19 will start with Kevin Leveille.

"He's given us another number," says Cannella, while leaning back in his office chair. "Whoever wears that number next, he's going to have to be a very good player."

In an adjacent cubicle, assistant coach Andy Shay overhears the comment and chimes in. "He's not gonna be that good."

Senior midfielder Kevin Leveille will go down as one of the best players in Massachusetts men's lacrosse history. No. 19 will play his last game at Garber Field in Sunday's NCAA Tournament game against Hofstra.

Baseball avenges Beanpot bombing

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Two weeks ago, a listless Massachusetts baseball team couldn't get anything going behind a freshman starter, and fell to Northeastern 6-1 in the 2003 Baseball Beanpot Consolation game. The loss began a four game losing skid.

Oh, how things have changed.

Yesterday afternoon, with another freshman starter (Jason Hickey) on the hill and the same Husky squad in the opposing dugout, the Minutemen (22-16, 12-8 Atlantic 10) scored two unanswered runs in the bottom of the fourth and another in the fifth, and held on for an 8-7 victory to run their current winning streak to five games.

UMass	8
Northeastern	7

Hickey's classmate, David Sullivan, bookended the victory with a no-hit inning of relief.

"To get a win like this with freshmen on the hill is big," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "I don't think of them as freshmen really anymore because they've been with us for long enough now, but they showed good poise and threw well out there today."

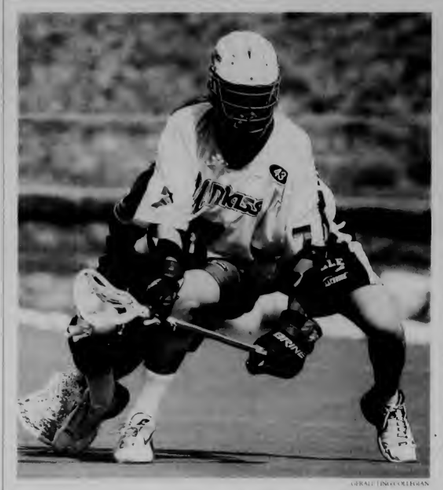
"I felt good out there today," Sullivan added. "My arm felt good and my confidence was high. It was good to go out there and get guys out and help us grab a win."

Hickey lasted 5 2-3 innings, giving up six runs on four hits with five walks and five strikeouts to earn his first victory of the season. Sullivan picked up his first career after giving up no runs and no hits while hitting a batter in the ninth. Classmate Kristin Deniers also chipped in on the hill, giving up one run over 1 2-3 innings.

Senior outfielder Matt Boulanger, who homered earlier in the game, drove in designated hitter Chris Morgan with what could turn out to be the winning run in the bottom of the seventh with a sacrifice fly.

After the Maroon and White posted three more runs to take a 7-5 advantage, Northeastern (15-19, 8-8 America East) was able to claw its way back to 7-6 with three runs in the top of the sixth, two of which crossed home on bases loaded walks by freshman righthander John Toffey, who was the lone rookie to struggle on the afternoon, as he was unable to retire a batter.

UMass had taken its first lead of the game at 4-3 in the bottom of the third when Morgan scored on the first of Boulanger's two sacrifice flies.



The Minutemen offense was again paced by shortstop Mike Arbas. The junior leadoff hitter went 3-for-4 with two runs batted in. Senior captain Tom Ellerbrock chipped in by going 2-for-3 with two runs batted in while Boulanger added an RBI.

"The big thing was that we came out with a win," Stone said. "We were able to get a lot of guys work, which was also good. But where we're hopefully heading for postseason play, its good to know we have our guys sharp and on their games."

"It's big for a young guy like David Sullivan to go out there and pitch like he did. That gives us the confidence to know that we can go to a guy like that if we need to down the stretch."

With St. Joseph's set to arrive this weekend for the season's biggest series, the Minutemen will have their final tune-up tomorrow afternoon when they host Central Connecticut State.

Stone plans another freshman starter, as righthander Jon Davis will take the hill against the Blue Devils. First pitch at Earl Lorden Field is scheduled for 3 p.m.

Sophomore Chris Doyle and the UMass men's lacrosse team will host Hofstra Sunday at 1 p.m. in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

Improved Hofstra heads to Garber

"I had a good game against them last time, and a lot of my goals were in transition, so we're going to work the transition game again," Zywicki said. "Hopefully, I'll get to finish a lot of balls again."

Hofstra's goaltender, Matthew Southard, had a less than stellar outing against the Minutemen in that contest, making only 10 saves. But he has come on strong as of late, raising his save percentage to just short of 56 percent.

"He's the main reason why they beat Syracuse," Cannella said. "He made some great saves in the game and played really well. He's played well down the stretch here. This is his first year too, so it's been a learning experience for him."

Hofstra's offense is somewhat top heavy, with seniors Joe Kostolansky and Jim Femminella scoring 41 percent of the team's goals on the year. Still, Cannella sees a team with many weapons up front.

"I think there are a lot of guys on the Hofstra team that can hurt you," he said. "There are a lot of guys who have 10 goals, 15 points. The two guys at the top are seniors, very similar to us. [Kostolansky and Femminella] are four-year starters for them. Those two guys are the big scorers, but you still have to cover people in these games."

With the Minutemen carrying a top-five ranking into the final week of the season, an NCAA home game was awarded to the Maroon and White, and the seniors will get an opportunity for one more game at Garber Field.

"It's another chance to play here at home," Fiore said. "For us seniors it's another shot at Garber. But for everyone in general, it's just another home game, another chance to play lacrosse. There's only 16 teams playing right now, and we're one of them, so it's nice to be there."

"We missed out on an opportunity to [play at home] in 1998," Cannella said. "We have the opportunity in 2003 so it's great. It's a great place to play this time of year; it's a great atmosphere with the crowds that we get. I'm really happy for the seniors that they get to play on Garber Field, and I'm happy for the entire team because it's a special place for all of us."

Rally lifts Sox past Royals

By Doug Tucker
Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) – Johnny Damon heard the boos from the Kansas City fans.

"I really don't mind it," he said. "They have some false information on how this team is run."

Damon helped the Boston Red Sox rally from a five-run deficit against his former team, getting three RBIs Wednesday in a 9-6 victory over the Royals.

The popular cornerstone of a youth movement in Kansas City until he refused to sign a long-term contract, Damon was traded to Oakland in 2001 and was booed every time he came to bat Wednesday.

He hit a two-run home run in the seventh off Kyle Snyder and an RBI double in the eighth against Albie Lopez (4-1).

Damon said Royals fans "will see what happens" when stars Mike Sweeney and Carlos Beltran become eligible for free agency. Sweeney can void the final three years of his new $55 million, five-year contract if the Royals fail to reach .500 this season or next and Beltran could be eligible after the 2004 season.

"They're still talking about cutting payroll," Damon said. "So the Royals are trying to stay in the race through July and see if (owner) David Glass goes and gets people who help them down the stretch."

The Royals cut about $4 million this year, bringing their opening-day payroll to about $40 million, one of the lowest in the major leagues.

Boston's is around $97 million, one of the biggest.

"I'm very happy to be in Boston," Damon said. "I played my heart out here. If I had signed a contract, guess what? Mike Sweeney might not be here. The fans keep wanting to think I demanded to be traded. But I think Mike Sweeney is definitely a better person to be here in the community than I am."

The Royals, who have lost two straight at Kauffman Stadium after an 11-0 start at home, built a 6-1 lead before Boston scored four runs in the seventh and four more in the eighth.

"When you have a big inning like that, good teams need to go out and make sure the other team doesn't come back," Royals shortstop Desi Relaford said.

Steve Woodard (1-0) allowed one hit in 1 1-3 innings in relief of John Burkett, who made his 400th major league start. Brandon Lyon got three outs for his third save in three chances.

Boston led 1-0 on Shea Hillenbrand's second-inning sacrifice fly before Kansas City chased Burkett in a six-run sixth. The Red Sox then pulled to 6-5 in the seventh on Jason Varitek's sacrifice fly. Damon's homer and Nomar Garciaparra's RBI triple off Jason Grimsley.

Boston went ahead in the eighth on Bill Mueller's RBI double off Lopez. Jeremy Giambi's run-scoring single, Damon's double and Todd Walker's RBI single against D.J. Carrasco.

Burkett gave up six runs and six hits in 5 2-3 innings, struck out six and walked one. Snyder, who didn't get a decision in his major league debut at Boston last week, allowed five runs, five hits and four walks in 6 2-3 innings.

MINUTEMAN UMass LACROSSE

UMass Lacrosse NCAA TOURNAMENT PREVIEW

MINUTEMAN UMass LACROSSE

First round won't be a pushover

By MATT BRADY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

By virtue of its 12-2 record in the regular season, the Massachusetts lacrosse team earned a home playoff game. Better yet, on Sunday at 1 p.m. the Minutemen face off against a team that they doubled up, 14-7 earlier in the year, Hofstra.

So winning the game should be a piece of cake for the Minutemen, right? Not so fast.

"They've improved," senior midfielder Kevin Leveille said. "They have a couple different looks now. We're watching videos and studying what they do, so we'll be prepared for them."

The Pride (11-5) has made significant strides since falling to the Maroon and White in March. Hofstra went 8-2 over that stretch, including wins over Syracuse at the Carrier Dome and over Duke at home, vaulting them all the way to No. 7 before falling to Towson last week.

"They have a lot of young guys also that have really improved," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Hofstra, traditionally, is a team that really gets going a little bit later. I think it's a tribute to their staff to keep the guys working very hard and they've brought along a lot of their younger players."

The Minutemen have a strong rivalry with Hofstra, partially because of the history of the two teams. Each team has won 14 games in the all-time series, and this will be the third time they have been head-to-head in the first round of the NCAA Tournament, splitting the two contests. The Maroon and White also has many players on its squad who hail from the Long Island area.

"It's always been a good matchup, UMass and Hofstra," Cannella said. "It's a pretty good rivalry. The two teams have been so competitive. There are similar type kids that both schools recruit and attract, so it makes a competitive situation."

Senior midfielder Chris Fiore, third on the team in scoring, grew up five minutes from Hofstra, but was told he was too slow and says that gives him a "little extra incentive."

"Personally, I like playing Hofstra," he said. "They're a team from my area at home, so it's like playing a school that's right at home for me. We don't like them, they don't like us, so it's just a good rivalry between two schools, so it's going to be a good game."

In the Minutemen's triumph over the Pride earlier in the year, sophomore attackman Jeff Zywicki put up five goals and Fiore scored three en route to the 14-7 victory.

HOFSTRA Pride

Record: 11-5 (4-1 Colonial Athletic Association)
Coach: John Danowski (163-102, 18th year)
All-Time Series: Even, 14-14
Key Players: A Joe Kostolansky (49 points)
A Jim Femminella (34 goals)
G Michael Southard (55.5 save percentage)

Outlook: The Pride struggled through growing pains early, but came together in time to make a run into the tourney with key wins over Syracuse and Duke. Hofstra must overcome its previous road woes and overcome what is sure to be a hostile Garber crowd. A career performance from Southard would help.

UMASS Minutemen

Record: 12-2 (3-2 Eastern College Athletic Conference)
Coach: Greg Cannella (76-46, ninth year)
Last Meeting: 3.23.2003, 14-7 UMass
Key Players: A Jeff Zywicki (55 points)
M Kevin Leveille (48 points)
G Bill Schell (59.9 save percentage)

Outlook: The Minutemen must forget their early-season trouncing of Hofstra and play their up-tempo game aggressively. Senior middies Leveille and Chris Fiore have been there, and must lead by example. Schell has been the cornerstone of the young, up-and-coming defense.

A superhero's run

Leveille's powers unexplainable

By MATTHEW F. SACCO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Like a celebrity, Kevin Leveille has to be inconspicuous. While watching a college hockey game at Houston Field House in Troy, N.Y., he slouches in a chair with his face shaded by a maroon baseball cap, hoping to avoid the inevitable – somebody recognizing him.

Delmar, Leveille's hometown, is just a few miles from here. That's where the legend started. Where the rumors of the scrawny kid with the stick attached to his arm traveled through Albany County like a paper bag in a windstorm.

For three periods, he modestly glad-handed those who would bring up the past. He politely listened while some advised him to come back to the area to play professional lacrosse when he's finished with school.

But now the game demands his attention, as a third period goal by RPI has forced overtime with UMass.

He sits just a few rows behind the visiting goal with his hands tucked comfortably into a denim jacket. Only his eyes are moving as they follow the play.

His body remains still until a UMass defenseman hesitates and coughs up the puck in his own zone. RPI counters quickly and scores, bringing 3,325 people to their feet. Leveille is already headed for the door.

"He can see things before they happen," says teammate and friend Chris Fiore.

Statistics will tell you that Leveille is a very skilled lacrosse player. But what sets him apart from the "mortals," as Fiore calls them, is something nobody has been able to explain.

Part of it is the field vision that borders on prescience.

"It's hard to describe, he's a step ahead in his mind," UMass coach Greg Cannella says. "He has the ability to make a play in a fraction of a second. That's the best I can describe it. He might hit a guy in the head with a pass. Then some guys just step back and shake their heads."

There are also the little things he

Softball's 'Plex a major advantage

By JEFF BOYD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Maybe it's fans that religiously venture out to every home game. Maybe it's the picturesque view of campus behind the field. Or maybe it's the knowledge that each time opponents walk to the mound they must pass a fence lined with Atlantic 10 Championship banners. Whatever it is, the Massachusetts softball team simply doesn't lose at home.

It's fair that the Minutewomen have played well at the UMass Softball Complex over the years would be an understatement. To say that they have been dominant at home still doesn't paint them any justice. The bottom line is that UMass has won 53 consecutive games at home, a number that may increase when the A-10 Championship commences this afternoon.

Although this winning streak has gradually gained recognition over the course of the season, not a single member of the team cares to think about it. In fact, most team members, including the coaches, refuse to talk about it.

It's just numbers. It doesn't get you where you need to go at the end of the year," senior co-captain Kaila Holtz said. "It's great that we win at home and it's great that we win at home a lot, but I think that when you start counting it just puts pressure that doesn't need to be there."

Many of the younger UMass players were still in high school when the Minutewomen last dropped a home game – a 3-1 loss at the hands of Dayton back on April 30, 2000. Three years and later, no other team has been able to overcome UMass' dominance at home.

Junior co-captain Jamie Cahalan has played in every game since joining the Minutewomen three years ago. Since the day that she first set foot onto the UMass Softball Complex, Cahalan has never known what it is like to lose on her home turf. That is something she takes great pride in, but at the same time, it's not something she chooses to dwell on.

"I've said before that I've never lost at home, and then I find some wood to knock on really fast. You don't ever want to spoil it, but it's one of those things that you really don't even think about," Cahalan said.

For many of the seniors on UMass, winning the last few games of the season will prove to be extra special. In addition to Holtz, seniors Anna Percy, Jessica Bartlett, Emily Robustelli and Brandi Cross will all get a chance to close out their UMass careers in front of a home audience. And each of them would tell you that they would like nothing more than to go out on top.

"I think that we've just established a tradition at home that we hold dear to our hearts as UMass softball players," Holtz said. "Of course we're going to turn it up a notch and want to preserve that. Once we have a good thing going, we just want to keep it rolling."

Regardless as to whether the team chooses to talk about its home winning streak or not, each of them can find something that is special about playing at home. For some, it's seeing their name and number flashing brightly across the scoreboard in left field. For others, it's hearing the diverse crowd of senior citizens, students and alumni holler at the umpires and rooting the team on. It's things like these that give the Minutewomen a real home-field advantage at the UMass Softball Complex.

"When you're sitting in the dugout and look out at the campus on a beautiful day, it just sets everyone at ease," Holtz said. "We know we're at home, we know what we're doing here and that we are good to go."

Knowing how the ball is going to bounce and being familiar with the outfield walls are just a couple of advantages that teams have when playing at home. At the Complex, the fans may provide the greatest advantage for the Minutewomen as they faithfully attend each and every home game.

The fans at UMass softball games are unique in their own way. They don't stomp on the bleacher seats, nor do they yell profanities at the opposition. Most of them are retired and come to the games to relax. Many of them play a modified version of BINGO that is dictum it up a notch and want to preserve

Chancellor addresses faculty on future of UMass

By S.J. PORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A rousing beginning to the Faculty Senate meeting this week included Presiding Officer Jerome Mileur announcing Secretary Ernest May's birthday. The senators responded by singing to May, before turning to more serious issues facing the campus. Their agenda began with an address from Chancellor John V. Lombardi concerning the future of the University of Massachusetts and the Amherst campus if the House of Representative's preliminary budget is passed.

Lombardi assured the Senate that although the proposed budget called for "dramatic reductions" to the University and the Amherst campus, "when we get done, we will be strong, and we will be able to compete."

The Chancellor told the Senate that he was there only to bring them up to date on what he knew, but that nobody had definite answers and plans yet. Due to the postponed budget vote, Lombardi said that the campus and university would not know anything definite until sometime around the second week of June. At that point Lombardi hopes to be prepared to make decisions about where the reductions will come from. To enable his office to do this, advisory groups of undergraduate students, graduate students, faculty and staff from multiple areas have been coordinated to consider the options.

According to Lombardi the university has already sustained close to an 11 percent budget reduction since last year. He said the proposed new cuts would bring close to a 30 percent reduction to the campus in state support.

"We have to get ready today for what we're going to have to do in June," he said.

Lombardi outlined the method that he would take once the budget had been voted on in June by organizing campus activities and programs into three categories. Cuts would be systematically be made in the categories beginning with the first and hopefully avoiding reducing programs in the last. The campus, he said, would not make unilateral cuts.

"We cannot slice across the board," he said.

The first category to be brought up for cuts would consist of programs that while possibly valuable to the university, do not contribute directly to its core mission of teaching and research. Lombardi also stressed that the process of reduction would take three to five years to "wash through" the University. He stressed a "multi-year" plan to carry the campus through this period.

Asked to give an example of the type of program in the first category, Lombardi felt that if he gave a real example, rumors would spread that this program would actually be cut, which would in turn "basically eliminate the program." Instead, he gave the fictional example of a program in Palmer to alleviate the town's traffic problems.

"Saying that we're thinking of eliminating a service or program in the academic world basically eliminates it," Lombardi said. "There are no definite decisions until we know what the scale of the reductions are. But we need an orderly, structured process to proceed through this."

The second category from which cuts will be made are activities that are more closely related to the university's core teaching and research mission, but that are still not directly involved. Programs that fall into this category, Lombardi said, include administrative functions and intercollegiate athletics.

Dave Falvey, one of several representatives of the Student Government Association present, asked the Chancellor to comment on what athletic programs would be cut. Falvey said that he had heard professors and students say that a predicted five to eight teams would be cut, and asked where professors would have received that information.

Lombardi responded by explaining that intercollegiate athletics, "like everything else, is at a risk," because part of their budget is subsidized by the state. Athletics, according to Lombardi, is at risk to lose the $7.5 million allotted by the state in the general funds to the university. The rest of the athletics budget is generated by student fees and ticket and merchandise sales. He added that no plans had been made yet to cut athletic teams.

"Give me the professor's name and I'll find out where the hell the information came from," Lombardi told Falvey. "This rumor has equal validity as the rumor that I just blew up the Minuteman. Get rid of these rumors!"

Lombardi said that if it comes down to a fight between "history, which is part of the core work of the university, and athletics – it goes to history."

The third and final category in which Lombardi will look to make cuts is the "main event – teaching and research programs."

"We don't want to move on this, but if the moment of truth comes we will have to look at this. When we do – now we're in serious discussions – anything we do will damage some of the core work at the university," he said.

Lombardi said that he'd already begun to search for "crummy departments and programs" at the university to cut, but hadn't been able to find any.

"A crummy program would make my day!" Lombardi said. "I would have felt virtuous as I cut the budget."

Lombardi did tell the Senate that he thought the original proposed $40 million in reductions had already begun to shrink, "but it's not gone down far enough by any stretch of the imagination."

If the proposed reductions pass through the legislature in June, Lombardi feels that the university will be in deep trouble. However, he also said that the university will survive and continue to be first rate at what it does.

"Ninety percent of our students will be fine, some percent of our students may have some trouble."

Lombardi stressed that this year's budget reductions and finalized budgetary decisions would be posted online at the website www.umass.edu/budget. His hope is that the availability of information will ensure that nobody feels as though their program has been singled out for cuts. The site will allow the community to view where the campus is as a whole and what effects reductions have had and will make.

SGA President David Carr asked the Chancellor what students could do to keep up morale and help the situation. Lombardi asked that students remain involved and informed.

"It's important students be engaged. We anticipate working through this," Lombardi said. "We're going to protect our students."

Lawmakers cut Bulger's office by twenty percent

By STEVE LEBLANC
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – House lawmakers cut the office of University of Massachusetts President William Bulger by 20 percent, but avoided an up-or-down vote on Gov. Mitt Romney's plan to abolish the office altogether.

The amendment, approved by a 109-46 margin, funnels the $1 million saved by cutting Bulger's budget into a scholarship fund for low-income students.

House leaders, who oppose most of Romney's higher education proposal, including the elimination of Bulger's office, defended the amendment by saying the vote gave lawmakers a chance to weigh in publicly on the issue.

"We want to recognize the work that is being done at the University of Massachusetts," said House Education Chairwoman Marie St. Fleur, D-Boston.

But critics, including Republicans and some liberal Democrats, said House leaders should have allowed an up-or-down vote on Romney's proposal to kill the office.

"I'm disappointed that (Democratic leaders) have resorted to this tactic once again," said House Republican Leader Bradley Jones, R-North Reading. "At some point in time it will be you on the receiving end ... it is wrong, it is unfair."

The reluctance to allow a clean vote will cloud the good that is being done in boosting scholarship funds, according to state Rep. Paul Demakis, D-Boston.

"The story will be that once again we played legislative games to avoid an opportunity for a debate and to duck a tough issue," Demakis said.

Also Thursday, House lawmakers raided millions in Turnpike assistance funds to partially restore proposed health cuts and met Romney halfway by requiring state employers to pay more for health insurance, although they fell short of Romney's proposal.

House Speaker Thomas Finneran said he hopes to wrap up debate on the stripped down $22.5 billion spending plan Thursday night.

The budget debate has been alternately described as "grim" and "painful" as representatives struggle to close a $5 billion spending gap without raising taxes or borrowing money.

To help ease some of that pain, the House approved an amendment that takes $13.2 million from a Massachusetts Turnpike Authority contract assistance fund and distributes the money to a slew of health services, from anti-smoking programs to dental care and breast and prostate cancer education and testing.

Some of the money would also go to help restore money cut from rape crisis centers, according to a spokesman for Finneran.

The money doesn't fully restore all the money that the original House budget plan cut from the programs, but eases the severity of some of those cuts.

House lawmakers had come under increasing pressure to soften the blow of the cuts by advocates of health and human services programs.

House lawmakers also approved an amendment that would boost how much current state employees are required to pay in health insurance costs from 15 percent to 20 percent with the state paying the balance. The change would take place July 1.

Lawmakers discarded a proposal by House Ways and Means Chairman John Rogers, D-Norwood, to create a sliding scale that would require state employees with higher salaries to pay a higher percentage of their insurance costs.

The plan adopted by the House will cost the state about $4 or $5 million more than Rogers' plan.

Romney had urged lawmakers to boost what employees pay up to 25 percent. The House agreed to require new employees hired as of next year to pay the higher costs. The amendment left largely untouched how much retired employees must pay.

Senate leaders said Thursday that their version of the budget, which they will begin to unveil next week, will contain no new taxes, borrowing or an expansion of gambling to close the estimated $3 billion deficit.

The Senate Ways & Means Committee will vote on its budget plan May 21, with a debate by the full Senate to follow.

House Representatives lessened the UMass president's office by $1 million, putting the funds towards a scholarship program. Other revisions of governor Mitt Romney's budget included funding to reduced health care programs.

U.S. calls for U.N to lift sanctions on Iraq

By EDITH M. LEDERER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS (AP) – The United States will introduce a resolution Friday calling for the United Nations to lift sanctions on Iraq immediately and phase out the oil-for-food aid program over the next four months, diplomats said Thursday.

But the proposal already faces opposition from Russia and France, raising concerns about another divisive diplomatic fray like the one that preceded the U.S.-led war to oust Saddam Hussein.

The U.S. resolution also would create an international advisory board – including U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund – to audit the spending of income from Iraq's oil industry and to ensure it is benefiting the Iraqi people, the council diplomats said. They spoke on condition of anonymity.

Annan would be asked to appoint a special coordinator for Iraq to be based in Baghdad to oversee U.N. involvement in rebuilding efforts, the diplomats said.

U.S. Ambassador John Negroponte asked the Security Council to schedule consultations Friday to circulate the U.S. draft.

President Bush ordered U.S. sanctions against Iraq lifted Wednesday, allowing U.S. humanitarian aid and remittances to flow into Iraq.

The U.N. resolution proposed by Washington would completely lift the crippling sanctions imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait, which led to the 1991 Gulf War.

Russia and France, which both had lucrative contracts with Saddam's government under the oil-for-food program have not been in a hurry to end it.

The United States also could face opposition from council members who want the world body to be a major player in creating an interim government for Iraq. U.S. officials have insisted that Washington and its allies in the war must remain in the lead.

Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Yuri Fedotov said Wednesday that Moscow only wants a suspension of the embargoes on food and medicine.

Russia has circulated its own draft resolution calling for Annan to run the oil-for-food program until an internationally recognized Iraqi government comes to power.

Phasing out the oil-for-food program over four months would end U.N. control over Iraq's oil revenues. The United States wants to use the money to pay for Iraq's reconstruction.

U.N. humanitarian programs that have been operating under the oil-for-food program would end as well, although U.N. officials already have started setting up new aid programs in Iraq. The program had been feeding up to 90 percent of Iraq's 24 million people before the war.

No date has been set for a vote on the resolution, but Security Council diplomats are working against a June 3 deadline when the current six-month phase of the oil-for-food program expires.

Many council members have said they want to avoid more bruising diplomatic confrontations. But emotions are still raw from the dispute over the war, which saw the United States, Britain and Spain backing an invasion of Iraq and

SARS death rate double estimates

By Emma Ross
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) – The overall death rate from SARS worldwide is about 15 percent – double previous estimates – according to the first in-depth global analysis by the World Health Organization (WHO).

Officials at the U.N. health agency said Thursday the calculation indicates the disease is more dangerous, particularly in the elderly, than experts had thought. More than half of SARS patients over 65 are dying.

In addition, a study to be published Friday suggests the SARS virus is surprisingly stable and not mutating significantly – a finding that could indicate the virus may have been in humans for a while.

Until now, WHO had estimated the death rate to be between six percent and 10 percent. The new estimate was based on more complete and detailed data from China, Canada, Hong Kong, Singapore and Vietnam.

A study earlier this week estimated the death rate in Hong Kong to be about 20 percent overall, but about 50 percent in patients over 60.

"The global estimate we had previously was always clearly an underestimate," said Mike Ryan, who is coordinating SARS response at the World Health Organization.

"We always had a figure in our heads that was a range, but now we see that it's toward the upper end of that range. We didn't have a proper estimate and this is now much more accurate," he said.

Severe acute respiratory syndrome has made more than 7,000 people around the world ill and killed more than 500.

Until now, WHO has been making a crude calculation of the death rate by dividing the number of deaths by the number of SARS cases. Using that method, the death rate would be 7.1 percent, which underestimates the true death rate because it assumes everyone still hospitalized will survive.

Another method is to add up the number of people who have died and those who have recovered and divide the deaths into that total. However, that overestimates the death rate because deaths show up more quickly than recoveries and it ignores people who are hospitalized, Ryan said.

The new figure was reached by estimating what proportion of those hospitalized will recover and what proportion will die. It also takes into account the length of time patients have survived – looking at the risk of dying in the first week of illness, the risk in the second week, and so on.

However, the figure is still only an estimate. The final death rate will be known only when the epidemic is over. Also, the estimate is for those diagnosed with SARS, not necessarily everyone infected with the SARS virus. Including such people would lower the death rate.

As suspected, the analysis indicated the chances of dying from SARS greatly depend on age and, linked to that, on the existence of other illnesses, Ryan added.

The death rate is below 1 percent for people aged 24 or younger, rising to 6 percent for those 25 to 44, 15 percent in those aged 45 to 64 and more than 50 percent for those over 65, WHO estimates.

"You really have to take into account the age groups because that will determine the outcome," Ryan said. "Some countries, like Canada, appear to have a high case fatality. In fact, that's more determined by the fact that their patient group was older.

"In Vietnam, their fatality rate was 8 percent. That's probably determined less by the quality of care but more by the fact that the majority of those cases were in young, healthy adults," he said.

By contrast, WHO said the death rate was 14 percent in Singapore and 15 percent in Hong Kong. The agency did not give a rate for China or Canada.

WHO experts said there is no evidence the SARS virus is becoming more lethal.

In a new study published Friday, meanwhile, scientists found few mutations among 14 SARS virus samples, indicating the genetic makeup has remained remarkably stable.

In the first major analysis of mutations of the SARS virus, posted on The Lancet medical journal's Web site, scientists from Singapore's Genome Institute identified genetic differences that reveal two geographically distinct strains of the virus – signatures that could help in tracing where an individual's SARS strain originated.

The apparent stability of the virus is a double-edged sword, experts say. It does not seem to be mutating into a more virulent form, as feared. But it is also not becoming more benign.

"This virus is seeming quite constant as it is passing through people. Although there are some changes, there are not a whole lot," said Earl Brown, professor of virology at the University of Ottawa in Canada, who was not involved with the study.

If the virus remains stable, any vaccine created is likely to stay useful, Brown said. He said the findings also suggest the SARS virus may have been in humans longer than thought.

"Generally you'd see a virus mutate more when it first comes into a new situation," Brown said. "I'd be concerned that maybe it's been in humans longer than we think and it's already made its little changes and has settled down to a happy lifestyle."

U.S. will try to end Iraqi sanctions

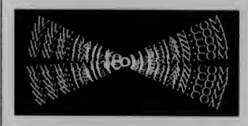
France, Russia, Germany and China opposing military action.

Bush and Secretary of State Colin Powell adopted a conciliatory tone Wednesday and stressed the importance of putting aside past differences and uniting to help Iraqi rebuild.

In Washington, Bush insisted "the mood that existed before the war has changed and people want to work together for the good of the Iraqi people."



Powell told the Foreign Policy Association's annual dinner Wednesday night that the U.S. resolution "can bring us all together to give the Iraqi people a better life and hope for a much brighter future." He received the association's medal along with Javier Solana, the European Union's security and foreign policy chief.

Germany indicated that it might not be an obstacle this time and would work with the United States.

"I think the general mood in the council now is that the war that we didn't want is over now, and that's a fact you cannot change," said Germany's U.N. Ambassador Gunter Pleuger. "So let us not repeat the debates of yesterday and look forward and solve the problems that are at hand in the interests of the Iraqi people."

France proposed suspending the sanctions, phasing out the oil-for-food program and having U.S. and U.N. inspectors work together. Its proposal would not lift sanctions until a legitimate Iraqi government is in place.

U.N. inspectors must certify that Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs have been eliminated along with the long-range missiles to deliver them before sanctions can be lifted.

Personal politics giving way to Boston progess

In Boston some elected leaders are letting their personal politics move into the shadows.

In a public apology, house speaker Thomas Finneran made amends for comments he directed toward Governor Mitt Romney.

The two, who have been pitted against each other since Romney raced for the governor's seat, have recently come to verbal blows over the governor's financial plans.

"It was a phrase or two in there that, upon reflection, I think was far too pointed, far too personal, and inappropriate to the relationship that I think must be developed, given the magnitude of the crisis," said Finneran in a radio interview with WRKO.

Finneran wrote in a letter last week that Romney was "polarizing issues [and relying] on simplistic PowerPoint presentations and press releases" to deliver his plans for the commonwealth.

The speaker's apology – which Romney spokesman Eric Lehmstrom said the governor appreciated – shows some tact on the part of Finneran.

It also shows a smart move for the Democrat leader to focus the legislature more on action and less on politics.

The personal politics need to be pushed aside." Pittsfield Representative Peter Larkin and Finneran supporter said. "We got off the campaign trail four months ago, and hopefully he'll [Romney] follow," he added.

Larkin was speaking specifically to recent comments by the Beacon Hill officer toward University of Massachusetts President William Bulger. Other comments from Romney include attacks on legislators who are pushing for Big Dig tunnels to be named after late House Speaker Thomas "Tip" O'Neill.

"I think it's fine to put our fighting men and women first, and our politicians second," Romney said. "There may be some legislators that are used to doing it the other way around, and I think it's time for a change."

Romney is looking to name the tunnel the Liberty Tunnel.

The governor made his campaign as an outsider working into Massachusetts politics – he pushed that he would change the political field in the commonwealth and not work with longtime political ties.

Instead, the fresh face governor has jumped head first into games of politics.

Beyond his comments on Bulger and his verbal attacks on legislators, Romney has put forth plan after plan that, on the surface, look more like upheavals than reforms.

Instead of revising a state system he found corrupt, Romnes has made more enemies than friends and distanced the legislature that he so desperately needs to do much of anything.

Budgets need to be passed, reforms may need to be made, bills certainly need to flow through the branches of our government – personal attacks have no place in a state looking to stride forward.

A history of the CC/SU Commission

The construction of the Student Union and Campus Center buildings was paid for with millions of dollars in student fees. Approximately 12,000 students use these buildings every day. What role do the students have in the operation of these buildings?

The Campus Center/Student Union Commission (CC/SUC)

Formerly known as the Board of Governors, it was created in a joint act between the Student Government Association and Graduate Student Senate in 1971. The name was changed to the Campus Center/Student Union Commission in 1993.

According to the Joint Act of the SGA and the GSS in 1992, the commission is to be appointed in the following fashion: nine undergraduate students are to be appointed by the SGA president and approved by the SGA Senate. Five graduate students are to be appointed by the GSS president and approved by the GSS Senate. Two undergraduate SAFE fee paying student members are to be appointed by the Chair of the Department of HREA. Two more undergraduate fee paying student members are to be appointed by the Dean of the School of Management.

The CC/SUC is indispensable because it is the major source of input that students have regarding the operation of the CC/SU buildings. Former SGA President John Sheehan was the last president to appoint all nine of his appointees. The commission remained SGA President David Carr was the last appointee because he knew that the CC/SU Commission was unable to be dissolved by the administration as much as he never submitted his speech at his candidacy.

However, the CC/SUC has continued to work. Last year, Blue Wall and the Coffee Shop increased their prices. They opened their doors and changed their menus. Surveys conducted by the CC/SU Commission restored the menus, hours and prices that the students wanted. When the University Store put a cap in the Campus Center Corporate last year, it was the CC/SU Commission that negotiated to restore the cap, which now creates profit for students. The most diverse and powerful speaking engagement I've witnessed in the two years on this campus was Talk About It with Dead Prez and Saul Williams, and that was put on by the CC/SU Commission.

On August 30, 2002, the chair of the CC/SU Commission Anthony Graham received a memo from the SGA President David Carr, commanding "a hiring freeze for the commission. This freeze limited the commission to two employees with reduced salaries and reduced maximum hours. In addition, President Carr declared all space allocations made in Spring 2002 for Fall 2002 null and void."

The chair of the CC/SU Commission recollects, "We realized that with the freeze we were set up for failure. We were doing the job of nine people with two and couldn't keep it up much longer. We spent over three months trying to get a meeting with President Carr, but he didn't return any of our phone calls and stood up meetings with GSS. He left a mess for us to clean up. I finally got a meeting with myself, the president of GSS at that time and President Carr when I caught him walking in the Events Office. We told him in that meeting that he didn't have the authority to make a hiring freeze, without the permission of GSS, and that he's failed to execute proper communication with the Commission and GSS. He finally lifted the hiring freeze on Nov. 24, 2002."

Even after the possibly illegal hiring freeze was lifted, the president didn't appoint any students to the commission, and made it hard for them to get paychecks, as evidenced by one employee receiving one check for the entire semester only after she threatened to bring in a lawyer. The SGA has also refused to fund the commission in the past year, but it keeps going. That's right, the CC/SU Commission is self-sufficient.

On April 23, the day before their most recent advocacy event, the chair of the commission was told that he could not have his event and was handed an unsigned memo identical to the one he had received on Nov. 24, 2002 with the date changed.

The SGA president put in a motion to Administrative Affairs on April 27 requesting that "1) The Campus Center Concourse Vending Program be administered by Tix Unlimited. 2) The RSO space allocation process be put under the authority of the SGA. 3) The CC/SUC be dissolved as of June 30, 2003."

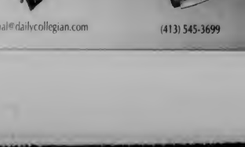
By transferring table vending to TIX Unlimited, the president hopes that TIX will become self-sufficient, which he claims would save the SGA up to $18,000 a year. However, this plan doesn't take into account that TIX's sole function to date has been to "act as an outside agency to handle ticket sales and revenues of student-sponsored events," according to the TIX website.

TIX Unlimited has not done a very good job of doing this simple task. How will they handle interviewing, certifying, scheduling and supervising the daily operation of all vendors and university organizations for the CC/SU Table Vending Program? This question was never answered. Coincidentally, he withdrew the motion when the chair of the CC/SU Commission raised his hand to make a point of information. Still he has left room for the motion to come back.

The CC/SU Commission's mission statement says, "The CC/SU Commission has two distinctive goals: administration and advocacy." If the administrative duties are transferred and the CC/SU Commission is dissolved, who will advocate students' needs and concerns regarding the building they paid for and spend most of their time in?

Equally intriguing are the implications regarding the role of the Graduate Student Senate (GSS). TIX Unlimited doesn't work with GSS and the proposed SGA panel for space allocation wouldn't need to work with the GSS. So what happens to the voice that graduate students have in regards to how the CC/SU buildings are run? To take it a step further, if the CC/SU Commission was created through a joint act between the SGA and the GSS, how can the SGA dissolve and put hiring freezes on the commission without permission from GSS?

This has been the subject of heated debate in the SGA Senate, and the answer to that question from those who advocate the dismantling of the CC/SU Commission is that the GSS charter has not been approved by the Board of Trustees, and therefore GSS has no say in the fate of the Commission they created. Is this true? I can't say, but GSS needs to clear it up soon. After a presentation by Graduate Student Rene Gonzalez urging the SGA to consult GSS before dismantling the CC/SU Commission, an admittedly furious Gabe Tavarez got on the podium and yelled "F— GSS!!!" He was applauded by many undergraduate senators. Don't believe me? It's on tape.



Each graduate student pays as much as or more than each undergraduate in tuition fees to the buildings and their senate, and thus should be entitled to the same voice in the CCSU Complex as their undergraduate counterparts.

As we all keep an eye on this situation we should ask ourselves, how much is our voice worth? My voice in what happens in the Campus Center/Student Union Complex is worth more than the president is offering, so I'm making it heard.

Springtime insanity

Jen Hodson

After last week's performance at the Hobart Hoedown and the Spring Concert, I think it's safe to say that this semester is about ready to end. I don't know what it is but there's some sort of gas in the air that's making students drop like flies and become full time partygoers as if it's their day job.

It is sad but I have become one of those students. I have found myself permanently unable to focus or pay attention to schoolwork or anything else that's even semi-school related. If I'm lucky I make it to half of my classes during the week and am able to get a couple hours of work done at the most. I sometimes wonder whether this is a conscious choice or an unexplainable phenomenon that takes over my brain without my knowing it.

This coming Monday I have a group project in one of my classes that I haven't even started yet, which is worth 40 percent of my grade. And I have two exams the day after in courses where I can't even remember the last time I went to the class. Well that doesn't exactly make me the Lisa Simpson of school now does it? I'd rather take Homer Simpson's advice and hide under some coats during a major exam and hope that everything turns out OK.

There are so many things that I have to do but just can't find the time in my no class, no work schedule. Call me lazy, but even parts of my normal daily routine like showering and eating have become bothersome activities for me. No, really though, I feel like my mind has been set to the switch for slug mode and it would take the jaws of life to pry me out of it.

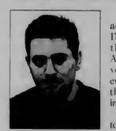
After the next two weeks hell as we all know it will be over. I will get to leave this dump and go back home to friends that I've missed and a word that's not used too often. What's that again? Responsibility? This will be another summer where I will get to bask in the sun, drink lemonade and lounge around during the day. Not to mention that my parents will be leaving me with an empty house for two whole weeks and God knows what kind of doors that will open.

I'm sure we aren't the only ones who will be happy that summer is soon approaching. Cops and townies will rejoice when we leave as well. Police officers will be able to retire for a short while from all the riots they are used to breaking up. The Mace and billy clubs will be put on the back burner for now and will not be used again until next year. What an interesting thought that is.

"I'd rather take Homer Simpson's advice and hide under some coats during a major exam and hope that everything turns out OK."

But as it stands for right now, we are all stuck with only a few days left of classes and then a week or so of finals. What will you be doing during your last two weeks at UMass? I think for the most part I will be attempting to study and trying and make it through yet another semester with hopefully good grades.

What's to come for next yen? Who knows? Hopefully when I am a senior and I get out of this trash dump, I will have already been accepted to a decent law school and will be ready to face and challenge the real world that awaits me and for that matter, the rest of the senior class. That makes me want to end on a positive note.



It's scary to think about but these are probably the best years of our lives. So my advice to all you youngsters out there who are just getting here is to take advantage of the time you have left here at UMass.

Join clubs and organizations, play intramural sports, meet lots of people and take action in things that interest you. Don't wait for things to happen to you because the only person who can make things happen is yourself. Make sure you try new things and take as many different classes as you can so you get your money's worth of an education. This is also a good way to find out what you're interested in as well. Drink and go to lots of parties and make sure you try every illegal substance at least once. Just kidding – don't really do that. But most of all make sure that when you do leave here, you leave knowing that your time was spent well.

The silent death of democracy

Yousef Munayyer

In the last presidential election, according to the Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance (IDEA), slightly less than half of America's voting age population voted. That number is lower than every election since 1960. People in this country are not politically involved and it's pathetic.

The United States is supposed to be the beacon of democracy yet it ranks lower than many nations when you consider voting turnout. In fact, the global average voter turnout is about 65 percent. Since 1945, among countries that have held at least two elections, the United States is 114th out of 140 on the list, averaging 48.3 percent over the years. It falls behind nations like Italy with 94 percent, Germany with 80 percent, the U.K. with 75 percent and India with 60 percent. What does this say about the American public?

I could go on about the political education in America but that isn't necessarily relevant. In fact, the IDEA found no direct correlation between literacy or education and voter turnout. The United States has a literacy rate near 100 percent, however not even half as many people vote.

I have wondered for a while why people do not vote and honestly, I can't come up with a decent answer. For a while I thought people were content with their lives and because of that, I felt they did not need to get involved. I figured that as long as football was on the set and the beer was flowing, not many felt that things could be better. And that's what being politically involved in your society is all about, trying to make things better than they are.

"I said before that voting is a democratic duty as opposed to a right. I think it is more vital than a right."

Then with the elections in 2000, after having seen the same president for eight years and the economy starting to slump after the dot com bubble burst, I thought more people would exercise their democratic duty. I was wrong. Only 49 percent went to the polls.

Then Sept. 11 shocked the world. I thought for sure at that point that there would be an uproar. Had this happened in many other nations in the world there would have been riots, civil unrest and maybe even an overthrow of the government. Instead we saw the complete opposite. Fear silenced a population from demanding answers. Demands for who was responsible were silenced; instead we were made to focus on "evildoers." However, it was not the evildoers that didn't see it coming; it was not the evildoers that are in charge of national security. But still, silence.

For a while I thought maybe many people felt their vote didn't matter, but after the debacle in Florida in 2000, how can anyone feel that way. Afghanistan was pounded, Iraq was next and when a midterm election took place only 39 percent came out. Midterm elections always draw a smaller turnout but after America had been through one of the most troubling times in its history, the polls had little to show for it.

This is very troubling. It seems people just do not care. Maybe in 2004 things will be different, but democracy is dying in the meantime. If Sept. 11 didn't make people more politically active, the only thing I can imagine that would is the status of the economy. People will ask questions when their wallets are lighter, or so you would think.

I said before that voting is a democratic duty as opposed to a right. I think it is more vital than a right. If paying taxes and sitting on a jury is a duty then voting should be held to the same high standard. Unfortunately, it's not.

Many nations have compulsory voting where voting is enforced. You don't necessarily have to vote for anyone but you still have to vote. Some nations enforce this with fines. Some others even go as far as incarceration. I am not suggesting that the United States adopt this system, but when the vital principle of democracy, the voice of the people, is vanishing from political discourse what kind of democracy are we to believe we are?

In recent years, participation is down. The power of the executive has grown with such things as Congress' abrogation of its right to declare war, the judiciary halting the counting of votes in 2000, the USA PATRIOT Act striping the public of its rights and still, silence. Does it irk anyone else that this seems to be an introduction to a modern day leviathan?

Maybe people are just too bogged down with their lives. In early 19th century Europe, an era that gave birth to liberalism and nationalism, revolutions were very frequent with revolts and uprisings in many major cities. People were getting together, getting involved and making decisions that would shape the face of Europe for years to come. However, England was silent. People there were so occupied with working through the industrial revolution that had just caught fire that they had little opportunity to be politically active. Is that what is happening here? I doubt it.

In the end it is probably a combination of factors. Whatever it is it hurts the status of democracy in the United States. Though we are not going to be a direct democracy we cannot even expect to maintain a republic if political participation continues to decline. I can only offer this: educate yourself because no matter how well informed you think you are, you still don't know everything.

Take some time out of your busy schedule this summer to read a book, and then even another book if that's not too much to ask. Read about issues from several sources. Find out why unemployment is up. Find out why they hate us. Find out what different candidates have to offer. Be prepared to speak, learn, teach and listen. Get involved in public political discourse.

Democracy is dying silently every day and if the people do not control the government, the government will control the people.

To emulate old video games or not to emulate

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

Another eventful year at the University of Massachusetts has almost passed once again. The summer is just weeks away and that means hours of endless gaming. However, after months of reviewing games on PC, GameCube and PS2, I have grown tired of the 3D graphics and stressful situations. Instead, I plan on kicking back a few rounds of old school game play. That means I will be dusting off the cartridges of my NES and losing my breath trying to get each game to work correctly.

If there is anything that is underestimated by today's gaming crowd, it's the old school systems like NES, Sega Genesis and even Atari. While the graphics are not exactly award winning, there is literally no stress involved when playing games like "Duck Hunt" or "Sonic: The Hedge Hog" because they were meant to be fun. I know I don't freak out if I miss a duck or if I drop a few rings, although I wish there was a way to shoot the annoying dog that laughs at you. These games were definitely the best of the best of my era. But there is one game that rules over all of them: "Mike Tyson's Punch-Out."

"Mike Tyson's Punch-Out" is easily the best-known game of the 8-bit era of gaming. Pretty much anyone who grew up with NES knows this game by heart. From Glass Joe to Mike Tyson himself, each competitor that Little Mac faces has his own series of moves and weaknesses. This game definitely provides about an hour of entertainment as you beat the crap out of the helpless computer opponents. If you are a fan I recommend downloading the remix of the game's theme song.

These games are classics, but most realize that unless you grew up being spoked by parents that bought you every game on the market or unless you were related to a video game producer, chances are you don't own every game ever released. That is unless, of course, you decided to defy the laws and downloaded gaming Roms, modified versions of games that can run on PC.

Roms are the easiest way to bring your favorite games to your computer, but according to the government laws, and from the companies themselves, using them is clearly an illegal act. Some people may say that the Roms help in gaming sales because while it's a free game, it's just not the same without some controller hookup. Others disagree and say it hurts the gaming industry just as much as downloading MP3s hurt the music industry. As for me, I agree with both sides on this subject.

On the pro-Rom side, there is a good reason for having Roms available to download. While it is technically stealing, there are many games that are very rare and hard to come by. So the Roms provide the poor gamer with Internet access a way to download the games he grew up with. On the anti-Rom side I can see how it hurts the industry. While I was guilty of this act before I decided to buy NES, I never downloaded anything but NES Roms. Today, you can get Roms and emulators, programs that act like the gaming systems, for PS2 and X-Box games. This is where the whole Rom system went wrong.

The major problem with up to date gaming being free over the Internet is that it causes gaming companies to boost prices on games. This is because they are fully aware that their software gets leaked onto the Internet and they need to compensate for it. A PC game that won't be out for three months can be available on the Internet as soon as one or two months before it is released. There may be a reasonable solution to all of this.

First, the gaming companies need to decide if downloading old games, such as NES or Genesis games, should be overlooked due to their age and lack of availability. If not, then just set up a site to download and charge per game. They could even just develop good working emulators and sell those so the company makes a small profit.

Next, keep an Internet track on illegal game downloads. While this statement will probably anger those who download games every day, this could help bring down prices and make games more affordable. Then companies can put more time toward making better games than worrying if they can get it out before it gets leaked.

Finally, gamers need to use common sense when it comes to downloading software. I personally don't see the harm in downloading "Adventure Island" with an NES emulator because the game is simply impossible to find. While on the other hand, to download a currently available game would just cause more problems for the companies. I would be perfectly content with spending money on a game I want rather than downloading about 10 that I would play maybe once a month.

In the end, downloading Roms and emulators is still considered illegal, but no more illegal than downloading a Metallica song. This is a subject that will no doubt be debated for years to come. I will definitely be pushing for some agreement on letting old school games be available for download, while putting a track on pirated versions of newly released games. So before you download "State of Emergency" to your computer, just think if it is worth the time spending. But why would anyone want that game in the first place?

'Satin Rouge' ends multicultural film festival on a sensual note

By Lauren Freeman
Collegian Staff

The 10th Annual Multicultural Film Festival ended Wednesday with a screening of Raja Amari's first feature length film, "Satin Rouge." The film, set in Tunisia, is an exploration of the art of belly dancing and hence another appropriate addition to the festival's theme: art in film.

"Satin Rouge"
Directed by Raja Amari
Starring Hiyam Abbas Hamd El Fahem
Zeitgeist Films
Un-rated
95 mins

To the average American, belly dancing evokes thoughts of eroticism, mysticism, snake charming and flying carpets. In other words, this ancient ritual has become a cultural signature for the Muslim people, a blatant stereotype that is frequently misunderstood.

Raja Amari's goal in making this film was to reinvent this ritual. A former belly dancer herself, Amari studied at the Conservatoire de Tunis. Her depiction of belly dancing calls to the forefront the liberating aspects of the sensual dance.

Perhaps the most surprising and welcoming aspect of this film was the fact that the women who danced at the cabaret were not the skinny, large-chested women that American media thrive on. These women were voluptuous and of rather average appearance. The fact that they are average outside of their role as belly dancers makes it fascinating when they transform into such sensual women when dancing. This film is a call for all women to unleash the sexuality in themselves. It is testimony that all women are inherently sexy.

Nothing exemplifies this average element more than the main character of the film, Lilia (Hyam Abbis), a widowed housewife, is portrayed as lonely and empty, dependent on her daughter and the memory of her husband for any sense of worth. When she begins her secret life at the cabaret, she undergoes a transformation into a woman more directly involved in life. It was enlightening to see a woman undergo such strengthening of character. It was also rather humorous to observe a formerly strict mother sneak out of her home at night.

Some extreme feminists might cringe at the contradictory nature of this premise. The idea that a woman must put herself on display in order to evoke passion is relatively outdated. However, I think it is important to understand the history of this dance before jumping to any conclusions. Unlike the common striptease, belly dancing has its roots in religious ritual and was also a dance to celebrate the strength of women and fertility. The transformation of Lydia's character is liberating and furthermore, it celebrates freedom.

The main concept to take away from this movie is that every woman should have some little secret all to her own that fills her with vitality. This doesn't mean that we should all strip at night. It is simply that it isn't necessary to divulge every detail of our lives to our loved ones. Whether you write in a journal or play your kids' video games when everyone is out for the night, it is important to save some pleasures just for yourself.

The ending of the film is very complicated. New conflicts arise that are reminiscent of Greek tragedy, or perhaps more appropriate, the soap opera. Interestingly enough, Amari continuously inserts clips of the Lydia watching a program that is obviously a soap opera. This parallel to the soap opera seems to reinforce the idea that Lydia has transformed from a woman of inaction to a woman of action. She is no longer dependent on fantasy to enliven her day, but actively lives her life to the fullest extent.

The Multicultural Film Festival was once again a very successful and enlightening experience.

Former '007' Roger Moore hospitalized after collapsing

NEW YORK (AP) – Roger Moore, the suave star of seven James Bond movies, was recovering in a hospital Thursday after collapsing during a Broadway performance.

Moore, 75, was diagnosed as suffering from exhaustion and dehydration after fainting during a Wednesday matinee performance of the comedy "The Play What I Wrote," said Jerry Pam, the English actor's agent in the United States.

Roger Moore

Moore was expected to be discharged from the hospital Thursday or Friday, said Jackie Green, a spokeswoman for the show's press agent.

"He is absolutely fine. The doctor is pleased with his progress," she said.

Moore was playing the part of the "mystery guest star" – a rotating cameo role filled by celebrities – when he fainted toward the end of the second act, Green said.

He finished the performance after a 10-minute break, Green said.

After the show, EMS personnel took Moore from the Lyceum Theatre to St. Luke's Roosevelt Hospital, Pam said.

The hospital wouldn't release any information about Moore's condition Thursday, citing privacy laws.

Pam said Moore had been doing a lot of traveling recently as part of his work as a goodwill ambassador for the United Nations' children's agency UNICEF and had flown to New York for his role in the play.

"He's almost given up his career for UNICEF, he's so dedicated to it," Pam said.

Moore is best known for his movie roles as the British agent "007." The first James Bond film was "Live and Let Die" in 1973, and he went on to star in six other Bond movies: "The Man With the Golden Gun" (1974), "The Spy Who Loved Me" (1977), "Moonraker" (1979), "For Your Eyes Only" (1981), "Octopussy" (1983) and "A View to a Kill" (1985). He also played the hero Simon Templar in the TV series "The Saint."

Open mic jam hits Valley

This Sunday, the Hadley Pub kicks off what creators hope will become a new weekly tradition: an open mic night for freestyle rappers.

Hosted by Broktune, darlings of the local underground hip-hop scene, the event will run from 8 p.m. until closing time.

There are no other local forums for hip-hop musicians to comfortably take the stage, according to Broktune member Dan Barnes, a.k.a. Awetisdick (pronounced autistic). "Two years ago, when Hellow band member Corpse Crisps and I would take the stage at regular open mic sessions at local bars and clubs, we were met with a lot of attitude and harshness from people who felt hip-hop didn't belong there. With this freestyle night, we want to alleviate this problem for other fledgling rappers."

The major thing that distinguishes freestyling from other forms of hip-hop music, is the freshness and spontaneity of the lyrics. Nothing is pre-written and the performers create rhymes to whatever beats are played.

This can create a feeling of pressure for potential participants, according to event co-host Tom Buchele (a.k.a. Corpus Crisps), which is why this event at the Hadley Pub is an attempt to create a safe and supportive environment for hopeful hip-hoppers.

"We don't want anyone to feel intimidated from getting on stage and spitting lyrics, which is why we'll make every attempt to keep negativity and competitiveness to a minimum," he said.

This doesn't rule out an end-of-the-night freestyle "battle," a competition popularized in the film "8 Mile" where willing rappers engage in a contest of lyrical one-upmanship. Sunday's battle, though, which will likely offer free pizza to the winner, is only going to be one segment of what will otherwise just be an open freestyle forum.

Promoters see this as part of a nationwide movement toward local hip-hop. "Hip-hop is changing," said co-host Barnes. "It doesn't necessarily come from an urban setting, and mainstream rappers aren't the only ones being listened to. More and more, it's becoming a format for people in Amherst and Oregon and Omaha and wherever, to get up there and talk about what they want to talk about."

Broktune, local rappers with a large cult following, got their own start from humble beginnings. "I call it the 'circle tour,'" joked band member Buchele, "which meant me and my friends leaving from my parents' driveway, freestyling to whatever was on the radio, and ending up back in my parents' driveway because, hey, we lived with our parents. The point is we rhymed about what we knew. You don't need street credentials to enjoy making hip-hop."

Swimming with Fish is Reel Big fun

As a small group of us sat in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center early Sunday afternoon, waiting for Reel Big Fish to enter, I had a sneaking suspicion that this wouldn't be a normal Q&A session. The term "press conference" should be used rather loosely, as the "press" consisted of strictly University of Massachusetts students, most of them who were working for UPC and were there for the spectacle.

But soon into the conference, any semblance of structure (or maturity) was gone quicker than one of the band's three-minute ditties. I asked lead vocalist/guitarist Aaron Barrett how he thought the band had evolved since its formation years ago, and he answered in a complete deadpan, "We haven't evolved so much as we've mutated from cute little boys."

That was the end of any serious questioning.

The conference deteriorated rapidly from there, with trumpeter/vocalist Scott Klopfenstein quoting Gandhi out of his handy book one minute, and treating the microphone as if it was part of his anatomy the next. Even aspiring musicians in the room received words of advice from Klopfenstein as to the first step to beginning a band: "Don't start."

I had conducted an interview the previous week with trumpeter Tyler Jones, and he was completely down-to-earth and forthright, answering anything during the talk. But being with his five other wacko bandmates must have put him in a different mood, because Jones was especially off-the-wall for the hour-long session. He claimed that opening for 50 Cent and Rahzel was his favorite concert he has ever performed in. Coincidentally, the two acts that would follow Reel Big Fish that night were also Jones' least favorite acts to play with. Ever.

Minutes later, Jones decided he wanted to take a gander at being part of the "press." But instead of using the conventional method of actually walking over to where everyone was seated, he proceeded to crawl on all fours and plop himself amidst the rest of us. By asking multiple times when the "farce of a press conference" would end, he was half right. It might have been a complete joke, but those in attendance didn't want it to end.

When Reel Big Fish finally took the stage around 7 p.m. on Sunday, the crowd initially gave them an enthusiastic round of applause. But the bulk of those in attendance reacted to little of what the band did for most of their set, aside from an enthusiastic group of about 15 kids that had formed a mini-pit near the back center of the floor. No one reacted to Barrett's javelin-like heave of the microphone halfway across the stage, no one responded to Scott's screeching falsetto during "She Has a Girlfriend Now." The band received merely polite applause following each set, except from the rowdy bunch in the back.

Maybe it was just that the crowd was looking forward to 50 Cent (although last year's openers, Guster and The Roots, were warmly accepted by the rowdy Spring Concert crowd). Maybe it's true that ska is as dead as critics and music fans claim. Maybe the band's lyrics and antics are too immature for the crowd. And maybe Reel Big Fish couldn't come through on their promise earlier in the day ("It'll be a surprise if we don't suck," Klopfenstein said.)

Or it might just be the crowd didn't completely understand.

Important series for Minutemen

A-10 East title up for grabs

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

The streaks are headed in opposite directions. The Massachusetts baseball team is on a five-game tear, while Saint Joseph's, the Minutemen's guest for three games this weekend, has lost 10 in a row.

That said, neither streak matters much because the final series of the regular season, which could decide the A-10 East's top seed, has nothing to do with the past. Should the Hawks take at least two from the Minutemen and White this weekend, and with only the top three teams from each division earning a spot in the playoffs, the Hawks will be clawing for every game this weekend.

When the series kicks off on Saturday at noon for the first game of a doubleheader, the Maroon and White will have to battle not only the Hawks, but any complacency that comes with a playoff berth tucked safely in its back pocket.

Sunday's first pitch is also scheduled for 12 p.m.

Recent history would put Eric Chown and Keith Doherty on the hill tomorrow. Chown opened up the Minutemen's doubleheader against St. Bonaventure last Saturday with a seven-hit, four-strikeout performance that earned him the 4-3 win. Doherty rolled in the second game, scattering four hits and giving up two earned runs en route to the 10-2 UMass victory.

Both pitchers threw complete games.

Freshman Matt Torra, the National Pitcher of the Week as voted on by the National College Baseball Writers Association, finished off the Bonnies with a three-hit shutout, striking out four in nine innings.

It's safe to assume that the trio will once again take the starting duties, although sophomore Mike Crane's perfect record and 3.80 earned run average certainly make him a candidate.

It's unlikely that UMass coach Mike Stone would put Crane back on the hill this weekend though, as the Braintree, Mass. native battled mightily for 10 innings in his last start, giving up just five hits and two runs, but earning no decision.

Neither team has played since May 4, as yesterday's UMass-Central Connecticut game was canceled due to rain, and the Hawks have had the week off.

Senior tri-captain Anton McKenzie and the Massachusetts football team will come out of hibernation this Saturday at noon for the annual spring game at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Walker shoulders blame

By Tom Canavan
Associated Press

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) – Antoine Walker is taking the blame for the Boston Celtics' 2-0 deficit in their Eastern Conference semifinal series against the New Jersey Nets.

Walker, who teams with Paul Pierce to carry the Celtics, let his team down for the second straight game, missing 12 of 15 shots and scoring seven points in Boston's 104-95 loss Wednesday night.

Game 3 is Friday night in Boston in the best-of-seven series that was billed as a matchup of New Jersey's big three of Jason Kidd, Kenyon Martin and Richard Jefferson against Boston's duo of Walker and Pierce.

Everybody has played well, except Walker. The burly forward is averaging 10.5 points on 9-of-35 shooting.

"Paul is carrying his load, he's playing like a superstar," Walker said of Pierce, who is averaging 33 points. "I just have to come along with him. It's a tough time. I try to pride myself on being a playoff player, and I am coming up short for the first time in my career. I just have to bounce out of it. It's not over."

Pierce gave Boston a chance to win both games. He had 34 points in a 97-93 loss in Game 1 and added 32 points, 10 rebounds and 11 assists for his first playoff triple-double Wednesday, helping the Celtics nearly overcome a 16-point deficit at the start of the final quarter.

The Nets survived because Jefferson hit a monster jumper with 5:26 to play with the shot clock winding down and the Celtics within three at 85-82.

Walker then missed a shot in the lane and Kerry Kittles nailed a 3-pointer to push the lead to eight points. Boston never got closer than six points the rest of the way.

Jefferson finished with 25 points. He also hurt the Celtics on the other end, too, limiting Pierce to four third-quarter points when the Nets took control behind Kidd, who had 13 points, four rebounds and four assists.

Kidd finished 23 points, 11 rebounds and eight assists and Kenyon Martin had 14 points, 10 rebounds and did another great defensive job on Walker, who averaged 19.5 in the first round of the playoffs.

"I just try to beat him to the spot," Martin said of defending Walker. "I'm moving my feet and working on defense like I always do. I try to contest every shot and not let him get the easy looks he's normally used to getting."

Walker insisted he had good looks all night and didn't make the shots.

"Obviously I want to get out of this," Walker said. "It's just the way to get out of it. You have to use your teammates because these guys are giving 110 percent and I feel like I am coming up a little short and hurting this team."

Pierce said the Celtics can help Walker more when the series shifts to Boston for the next two games on Friday and Monday.

"We have to watch the film and do a better job of giving him better positions to score," said Pierce, who sprained his right ankle late in the game but never left the court. "We have to open up things for him. We're not doing a good job of giving the ball to him where he likes it."

The Nets found Jefferson in just the right spot for his huge shot from the right wing with 5:26 to go.

As the shot clock hit five seconds, the bench started screaming "butter," the team's watchword to get a shot off in a hurry to avoid a 24-second violation.

Jefferson got the ball, elevated and hit nothing but net.

"That was a monster shot, a big shot," Nets guard Lucious Harris said. "He knocked it down and that put a little damper in their play. They played great defense and he made the shot."

Jefferson said there was no pressure in a quarter in which New Jersey missed its first eight shots from the field.

"Sometimes you don't even know there's a drought because we have so many guys shooting the ball," said Jefferson, who was 10-for-18 from the field and held Pierce to four points in the third quarter. "It's not like you have Paul Pierce shooting the ball all the time. When the shot comes, you just have to knock it down."

Pierce gave the Celtics a major concern when he sprained his ankle with 5:45 to play.

"I really don't know how bad it's going to be," said Pierce, who never left the game. "I don't think it will have an effect on me for the rest of the series. I'll get treatment on it and be ready to go."

Host UM advances in A-10's

By Jeff Boyd
Collegian Staff

For five whole innings, Fordham pitcher Michelle Schlichtig kept the Massachusetts softball team's offense stagnant. Unfortunately for the Rams, Schlichtig's dominance fell one inning short, as the top seeded Minutewomen posted three runs in the sixth inning en route to a 3-1 victory in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Championships.

Yesterday's duel-but was a true pitcher's duel as Schlichtig and UMass' Kaila Holtz mowed down opposing batters, striking out 10 and 12 respectively. In a complete game effort, Holtz allowed just one earned run on only two hits. Holtz also threw an astounding 105 pitches over her six innings of work, 72 of which were strikes.

UMass	3
Fordham	1

"It feels good to win. It doesn't matter if I have to throw 500 pitches, it always feels good to win," said Holtz.

Both of Fordham's hits came in the third inning when Brandy Kean led off the inning with a double to centerfield. Two batters later, Ivy Pollock drilled a double off the outfield wall that scored Kean to give the Rams a 1-0 lead.

Down by a run on their home field, the Minutewomen found themselves in an unusual spot. Coach Elaine Sortino was pleased to see that her team didn't panic when Fordham went on top.

"I think that when they went ahead in the early innings, nobody's eyes got big, everybody stayed calm," said Sortino. "We knew that we needed to do what we needed to do and we just stayed with it."

Holtz managed to settle down after the third inning and didn't allow another Fordham hit the rest of the way. An unusually large strike zone caused Holtz to strikeout, looking two at the plate, but it also helped her to dictate the game on the mound.

"As a pitcher, you always like to see a big strike zone. As a hitter, you're like 'oh no, here we go,'" said Holtz. "Unfortunately at the plate I was kind of a victim of that, but on the mound you just try and run with it."

The game remained tied until the bottom of the sixth inning when the UMass offense finally came alive. Senior Anna Perey led off the inning with a single and ended up on second base when the ball was thrown over the head of Fordham's first baseman. Senior Emily Robustelli then ripped a double to the outfield that scored Perey to tie the game at 1-1. A sacrifice bunt by sophomore Hilary Puglia moved Robustelli to third base, setting up Brandi Cross's game winning RBI single that put UMass up 2-1.

Sophomore Denise Denis added some insurance for the Minutewomen by driving in a third run to give UMass a 3-1 lead heading into the seventh.

After walking the first batter in the seventh inning, Holtz fanned the next three Rams she faced to give the Minutewomen a dramatic first round victory.

Brandi Cross' game-winning RBI couldn't have come at a better time for the Minutewomen. However, Cross remained modest after the game and gave most of the credit to the players around her.

"Emily crushed the ball to tie up the game, then Hilary did a great job with laying the bunt down, and it's just pretty easy after that. They did all of the hard work," Cross said.

The second round of the tournament will be played today at the UMass Softball Complex beginning at noon. The Minutewomen are slated to face Temple, who won their game against St. Joe's in the nightcap of yesterday's action.

The second seeded Owls finished the regular season with a record of 20-18 and a conference mark of 10-4. Today's matchup will mark the first time that UMass has faced Temple this season since their doubleheader back in April was cancelled.

UMass set for ECAC's

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

As the dust settled from the Atlantic 10 tournament, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team was almost sure its season was over.

Only a few days later, head coach Carrie Bolduc was notified that her team was selected to play in the ECAC championship game.

The Minutewomen will meet No. 13 Cornell, in a game that has all the ingredients for classic battle. The Maroon and White will be traveling to Ithaca to play in its first ECAC championship since 1998.

Cornell has strong program, evident in their appearance in last season's NCAA Final Four. This year, however, the Big Red has had its share of hard times and wasn't given an NCAA bid.

The ECAC championship brings together two teams that haven't played often, but share an interesting similarity. Phil Barnes, now an assistant coach at Cornell, was the head coach of the Minutewomen just a year ago.

Bolduc wasn't interested in Barnes being present. Her team is more concerned with the competition at hand and finishing a successful season on the right foot.

"I don't think the girls are even thinking about it. The seniors are ready to play their last game and have fun," Bolduc said.

The Maroon and White finished second in the A-10 and suffered losses to elite teams such as Dartmouth, Syracuse and A-10 champion Temple. The ECAC committee looked over the strength of schedule and overall success, and the Minutewomen were on the top of the charts.

"It's evidence that we are a top 20 team ... I think we are better than our record shows," Bolduc said.

On offense and defense, the Maroon and White exhibit leadership from their seniors, who are looking to win their final game in the UMass uniform. Leading the attack are seniors Lydia Robinson and Jada Emery, who are ranked one and two on the team in goals scored, respectively, while another senior, Kelly Kurtz, has been an intricate part of the Minutewomen's nationally ranked defense.

"It is an honor that we were looked at with our strength of schedule and how we've played," Bolduc said.

The Maroon and White will need to contain a quartet of scorers that pace Cornell offensively. The Big Red is led in scoring by Sarah Averson and Lindsay Steinberg, who have 40 and 32 goals, respectively. Heading up their supporting cast is Allison Schindler, who has only netted 10 goals on the season, but is the premier distributor on the team with 26 assists. Jamie Quinn has also been a large contributor, chipping in with 29 goals on the season.

Coach Bolduc is also very impressed with Cornell head coach Jenny Graap, who was the NCAA Women's Lacrosse Coach of the Year in 2002. She has led the Big Red to their best collective winning percentage during her tenure and has turned Cornell into a viable powerhouse.

"They are very well coached. Jenny has done very well with her team," Bolduc said.

The Minutewomen are ready for their final game, and are eagerly awaiting their final challenge of the season. The Maroon and White have played well this season against some intimidating opposition. Now it's their chance to prove just how good they really are.

"We're not going into this game with a casual attitude, this is our last chance to play at the highest level," Bolduc said.

A true Celtics fan fires back at Byron Scott

Todd Foster

During a raffle interview with WEAS's Mike Francesa Wednesday, Byron Scott made childish, generalized insults about Boston Celtics fans. Scott remarked how Boston fans get "liquored up" from drinking before games, and how African-American athletes are hardly becoming embraced within the city.

Well, last time I checked, beer and sports is somewhat of a national pastime. But wait, there's more.

When Francesa asked "if Boston is still a backwoods town when dealing with black athletes," Scott's true opinion becomes evident.

"I think there's a part of that up there," Scott replied. "They're not very good fans. You could be a great fan and have a great tradition without being crazy and hostile."

"Sacramento has the best fans," Scott boasted. "They don't get outrageous like the Boston fans."

As a Celtic fan, I'm insulted for my years of sober and slightly drunken dedication to the team I love. I would pay to see Danny Ainge give the former Laker a right hook to the jaw like back in the day.

First of all, what arena doesn't have drunk fans in it? You mean to tell me he can sit down and call my fellow Boston fanatics a bunch of lushes on a New York radio station? Have you ever seen a game at Madison Square Garden? It used to be full of a bunch of drunken morons who aren't noticed anymore, because their team just flat out sucks. The fact is that anyone who drinks is going to drink before any game, regardless of what team they root for. To single out one arena and one group of fans is highly unprofessional, and the NBA should take action.

On the topic of accepting black athletes, I don't think anything could be further from the truth. Our city was home to one of the greatest black athletes of his time, Bill Russell. The Dean of Defense wasn't accepted everywhere he went, but we loved him. After numerous championships as a player and coach, he will be "embraced" by Boston forever.

Not to mention Paul Pierce is the most popular Celtic since Larry Bird.

The French Lick legend is the most white basketball player of all-time and happens to be the beloved of Boston's sons, but that's still not saying anything about accepting African-American athletes. You need evidence to make a hotel statement like the one Scott made, but he didn't have any.

"The fans, they're very cruel and they're crazy," Scott cried, while breaking out a new box of tissues. "They come into the game – a 7 o'clock, 7:30 game – they come into the game pretty juiced up. These guys are drinking. They've had their share of beers already before the game has started, and they can get pretty hostile."

Scott was completely out of line and has lost my respect as a sports-writer, a fan and a person. How can Scott sit on the microphone and bash us about how much we love our Sam Adams? For a coach to say so much about the fans shows that he can't handle the pressure of the job. If you can't handle the jungle, go back to the playground.

As for being hostile and crazy, what are we supposed to do? Sit with our hands on our laps and saying anything about accepting African-American athletes. You need evidence to make a hotel statement like the one Scott made, but he didn't have any.

Since we have won 16 championships and the Nets have won none, I think I understand what it takes. First, you shouldn't worry about the drunken fans and focus on the game. Second, you shut up until you win a championship. And third and most important, break out a celebration barrel like we do in Boston after Sweet 16.

Don't forget why we are the best sports city in America, because the fans had the desire and the passion to make it that way.

I'll drink to that.

University readies for 133rd commencement

By Ferron Salniker
Collegian Staff

On Sunday, May 25, the class of 2003 will walk the stage for the 133rd commencement for bachelor's degree candidates at the University of Massachusetts. Commencement will be held rain or shine at 10 a.m. at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Matt Dunphy, a dual-degree candidate majoring in Theater and English and a veteran at delivering commencement speeches has been selected as this year's student speaker. He spoke at his eighth grade graduation, and was also the speaker at his graduation from Cambridge Rindge and Latin High School in 1999.

Dunphy has been a clarinetist with the Minuteman Marching Band for four years, and has served as the manager for one year and personnel manager for two years. In addition he served as manager of the Hoop Band for one year.

In 2002, he was a member of the Chancellor's Task Force on the Marching Band.

In addition to being a dean's list student, Dunphy is a recipient of a Chancellor's Talent Award for the Arts and Theater and serves the theater department as a peer advisor. He has appeared in several theater productions, including as Costard in "Love's Labor's Lost," as The Player in "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," and as Harlequin in "Love in Disguise."

Dunphy's speech will focus on life progressing in stages – he hopes to express that his class is moving on as a group. Next fall Dunphy will be attending The Catholic University of America, in the master of fine arts in drama program with a concentration in acting.

Dunphy will not be the only student honored during the ceremony. Eleven graduating seniors will be recognized with 21st Century Leader Awards for demonstrating exemplary standards of achievement, initiative, and social awareness. The recipients have excelled in many areas: as leaders uniting and inspiring others to take constructive action, as researchers in their respective fields, as community activists on or off campus, as undergraduate teaching assistants, or as significant creative or athletic talents.

Three individuals will receive honorary degrees from UMass at commencement.

The honorary degree recipients are Kathleen A. Cote, a University alumna and managing partner of Boston Commerce Ventures, Steven M. Glickstern, a University alumnus and managing director and chief executive officer of Azimuth Alternative Asset Management, and Ernesto Zedillo, the former president of Mexico, professor of economics and politics at Yale University and director of the Yale Center for the Study of Globalization.

Zedillo will receive his honorary degree during the Graduate School Commencement Saturday, May 24 at 10:30 a.m. in the William D. Mullins Memorial Center. Cote and Glickstern will receive their honorary degrees during the commencement on Sunday.

Immediately following the commencement ceremony Graduates and guests are invited to the Chancellor's reception. The reception is open to all graduates and their guests, and faculty members from each School and College. It will be held under the large white tent in the southeast corner of the stadium near the entry gates. Snacks and drinks will be served.

The reception will be an opportunity for graduates and guests to meet and take a family photograph with Chancellor John V. Lombardi and faculty.

A number of receptions will take place before and after the commencement ceremony. For a complete listing of other events in relation to commencement including celebrations for each college and various receptions visit www.umass.edu/commencement.

On Friday, May 23, a commencement ball in the Student Union will provide a formal setting for graduating seniors to celebrate with an evening of music, dancing, gourmet food and refreshments. Social hour will begin at 7 p.m., with music and dancing from 8 p.m. to midnight. There will also be rides around campus in a horse-drawn carriage. Tickets are $40 each, and must be purchased in advance by ordering online or calling the Alumni Office at (413) 545-2117.

No advanced registration is required for commencement seating, which cannot be reserved. Guests are strongly advised to arrive on campus by 9 a.m. Shuttle buses from parking lots to the stadium will begin operating at 8 a.m. Coffee, drinks and snacks will be on sale inside and outside the stadium.

SHARING A PASSION

A Hollywood producer takes over Amherst Cinema

By Jesse Hirsch
Collegian Staff

When Hollywood producer Larry Jackson was a graduate student at Cornell University in 1971, he visited the Amherst Cinema for the first time and was far from impressed. He had no idea that one day he would buy the ailing movie theater.

"I saw a first run showing of the exploitation movie "Shaft," and I've gotta tell you, the Cinema was in bad shape. It was falling apart from years of neglect, paint was peeling, things didn't look good. I thought about buying it and converting it into a country cinema-tech, but it didn't really work out."

Now, over 20 years later, with an accomplished career doing work on films ranging from "Sid and Nancy" to "Silence of the Lambs," Jackson is in the process of converting his whimsical dream into a reality. He recently co-purchased the defunct Amherst Cinema and has plans to convert it into a 3-screen art house movie theater, among other things.

The story of how this entertainment mogul made it to the Pioneer Valley is packed with love, luck, and even some violence, likening the experience to some of the films Jackson worked on.

"I was knee-deep in snow shooting a little action movie called "Angel's Crest," when I got a call from a cousin we have in Leverett," Jackson said.

Jackson said his cousin told him a movie theater in Amherst was going up for auction, and that it was perfect for Jackson.

"My wife and I had been looking at getting out of L.A. for a while, moving to some country town somewhere, and letting our kids grow up outside the horrors of Los Angeles," he said.

Jackson that the auction was happening in a couple of days when he received the call, though, and didn't have much time to decide.

"While I was thinking over the Amherst idea, my wife and I woke up on Saturday morning to two guys with 9mm guns in our face, robbing our house," Jackson said. "While these professionals were cleaning out our stuff, my wife turned and whispered to me 'Amherst is looking real good right now.' That pretty much sealed the deal."

Taking over

Soon after, Jackson joined up with a committee that had already bid on the cinema, and he packed up his family and moved East, ready to take on the overwhelming project of renovating and refashioning the historical cinema.

Amherst Cinema closed in 1999 after a 75-year history of showing movies on one screen. It had been in financial trouble for some time, having difficulty competing against the larger chain cineplex that opened in Hadley. Even when they started screening art movies, giving it a specialized niche market, it was too late to salvage the ailing theater.

"There was a viable audience for the type of movies the cinema started playing, but at that point it was totally falling

Engineering students show off designs

Twenty-nine senior engineering students at the University of Massachusetts exhibited their senior design projects Friday at the Gunness Student Center in Marcus Hall.

A number of student-made inventions were showcased at the show.

One invention showcased was an alarm system built from the ground up with a microprocessor that was connected wirelessly to a personal digital assistant (PDA). The system allows the user to control their car through a wireless network. The user can roll up their windows, start their car, turn off their lights, and check the status of their car.

"We're doing a Two-Way Paging Car Alarm which you can control and query the status of your car with a remote PDA wirelessly to your car," Long Dang, team leader of the project said.

"You can have the same thing implemented in your house," Dang said. "If someone is breaking into your house, or if your kids coming home or leaving the house you can tell. If it is connected to more stuff like lights, you can turn the lights on, check if the stove is off. So there are a lot of possibilities for our idea."

Another project showcased was an Electronic Ovulometer. By licking a slide and placing it into the invention, a women can detected the chemicals that are produced in a women's body during ovulation. This invention was made to find a women's prime time to conceive a child.

"[It detects] different hormones that surge with sodium chloride and when they interact, surge, they produce a pattern...and when you see that you know you're ovulating," Katrina Barnes, team member of the Electronic Ovulometer design group said.

Another group invented an Intelligent Remote Physiologic Monitoring System to monitor sick patients. An armband, worn by the patient, monitors blood pressure, heart rate and rhythm, and blood glucose.

"What our system does is it remotely monitors a patient's data from home or vital signs from home, and it sends data to a hospital's web server," Joshua Gilbert, team member of the group, said. "From there, doctors can, from their home, with there laptops or their PDAs monitor a patient's vital signs as they sit at home or in their hospital beds."

Another group invented The Autonomous Sound Seeking Robot to be used in rescue operations. The robot guides itself toward sound. It has a built in sonar system that allows the robot to avoid obstacles.

"We were thinking search and rescue type things," Darren Maczka, a team member in the group, said. "Anytime you go in some environment where you wouldn't want to bring a person in ... the sound detection can be modified to different type of sound like a heartbeat."

Tornadoes rip through Midwest again

By Betsy Taylor
Associated Press

Rescue and cleanup crews picked through wreckage in several states yesterday after another batch of storms roared through the middle of the country, doing heavy damage in Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky and Tennessee.

Winds up to 150 mph tore into homes in central Kentucky, causing more than a dozen injuries. Rescue divers searched through debris Sunday for a missing woman whose mobile home was tossed into a river as a tornado cut a seven-mile swath in Mercer County.

"It disintegrated, and pieces of it were blown into the Salt River," Steve Oglesby, area manager with the state Division of Emergency Management, said of the mobile home.

The storms stem from a volatile weather system that "has been hung up over the area the past two or three days," said Chris Geelhart, a National Weather Service spokesman. The worst of the storms appeared to have moved out of the region Sunday morning.

More than 300 tornadoes have been reported across the Midwest since the start of May, and at least 47 people have died in the storms. The toll includes an Oklahoma man who died Sunday, becoming the first victim of twisters that swept through central Oklahoma on Thursday and Friday. About 145 injuries were reported in those tornadoes.

In addition, a 5-year-old West Virginia boy was found dead Sunday in a flooded creek, and authorities said a 13-year-old Alabama girl was killed when a tree fell on her home during the storms.

Meteorologists say it was the most active week of tornadoes on record, easily eclipsing the most recent comparable rash, in 1999.

President Bush, wrapping up a weekend vacation in Santa Fe, N.M., told reporters he planned to visit some tornado sites Tuesday, including at least one in Missouri.

Missouri was hit again with storms over the weekend. A fraternity house at Culver-Stockton College and dozens of buildings in the surrounding town of Canton were hit when a tornado swept through Saturday evening.

The steel dome of the college's administrative building lay crumpled on a lawn Sunday, and the gymnasium, which had held about 1,000 people for graduation hours before the storm hit, was in ruins. Parts of a nearby mobile home park in the town of 2,500 were unrecognizable, but authorities reported no life-threatening injuries.

"All the furniture, the fridge, I haven't even found the bed yet. The sink is way over there. It's gone. It's all gone," said James Rockhold, 37, who had taken his family to a safer building after hearing about the storm.

United States says Hussein's party dead

By TED ANTHONY
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – The United States declared Saddam Hussein's Baath Party dead yesterday, with the war's commander telling Iraqis that the instrument of their deposed dictatorship was dissolved and promising to purge its influence from the country it dominated for 35 years.

Gen. Tommy Franks' message, delivered in Arabic by an announcer on the coalition's Information Radio, broadcast a clear message over the AM radio waves across postwar Iraq. Any activity by Baath Party holdouts who oppose U.S. occupation will not be tolerated.

"The Arab Baath Socialist Party is dissolved," Franks said, but high difficulties remain in genuinely eliminating it.

American administrators are struggling to balance the need for a fresh start with an unwelcome reality – that thousands of Iraq's civil servants had Baath affiliations.

Franks' order came a month after American troops invaded Baghdad and drove out Saddam's regime, which used intrigue and terror to make sure the minority Sunni Muslim-dominated party extended its reach and control into all corners of Iraqi society.

The statement told Iraqi citizens to collect and turn in any materials they had relating to the party and its operations. It called them "an important part of Iraqi government documents."

Unseating the Baath, which advocated Arab unity but became a personal tool of Saddam and his lieutenants, was considered a top priority of American military planners in the run-up to the Iraq war, which began March 20 and largely ended by mid-April.

Banning was the next logical step – one that has followed American military victories in the past. Allied occupiers banned the Nazi Party in Germany after World War II, and the Fascist Party also was banned in Italy. But lower-level party figures were rehabilitated if they renounced the old regimes and were cleared of specific criminal wrongdoing by tribunals.

The general's order Sunday was in some ways academic, given that the Baath regime is no more and the U.S. military and its civilian administrative counterpart occupy the country.

But some upper-level government and party leaders, including Saddam, remain unaccounted for. The United States says it has made hunting them down a high priority.

For Iraqis who lived under Saddam's brutality for entire lifetimes, the news was unthinkable mere months ago – a coda to the convulsions of history they have spent recent weeks watching from front-row seats.

"The people are liberated from fear, from their chains. We were living in a big prison," said Amir Sadi, 25, of Baghdad. "The Baath Party was like a gang. It wasn't a political party."

Whatever it was, it was everywhere.

In the weeks since fighting ebbed, the U.S. occupying force's administration has moved to appoint its own overseers to government ministries and bring people back to work with an eye toward excluding Baathists who worked closely with the Saddam regime.

Palestinian leaders ready for plan

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

JERICHO, West Bank (AP) – Palestinian leaders have put aside reservations to parts of the U.S.-developed plan for peace with Israel and are ready to get started on it, Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas said Sunday, heeding an appeal by Secretary of State Colin Powell.

"We have accepted it as it is," Abbas said. "True, maybe we have some reservations. But in order to give a way for the peace process, we have dropped down all our reservations, and we said that we accept it as it is."

While other Palestinian leaders accused Israel of hedging in its acceptance, Abbas spoke forcefully about continuing with the plan to gain a Palestinian state within three years on land still partly ruled by Israel. Abbas also was clear about his goals:

"We look forward to stopping, ending, totally ending settlement, ending the siege, ending the separation wall, assassinations, the collective punishments, destruction of farms and the infrastructure and restricting the movement of citizens and Palestinian institutions and to set out to free thousands of Palestinian prisoners."

For his part, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said, after conferring in Jerusalem with Powell, that Israel soon would meet with Palestinians, "and with the help of the Americans, we will be able to achieve a settlement that will lead to peace."

But Sharon said: "When it comes to security, the security of the citizens of Israel, and the security of the state of Israel, Israel will not be able to make any concessions, and there are no compromises, when it comes to security, not now, and not in the future."

On that front, Abbas told Powell he wanted to go beyond a cease-fire eventually to uproot those carrying out the violence, a senior State Department official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. He said Abbas wants to consolidate authority and end competition with other groups for his own sake.

And Nabil Shaath, a top Palestinian official, said on CNN's "Late Edition" that Abbas accepted an invitation from Sharon to meet before Sharon goes to Washington on May 20 to see President Bush.

"We see no other game in town," Shaath said. "This is the only way available now for peace."

Under the peace blueprint, Palestinians must rein in militants and combat terror, and Israel must remove illegal Jewish settlements and freeze construction in more established Israeli communities in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Israel made overtures during Powell's visit. It said it was releasing dozens of Palestinian prisoners, easing roadblocks that hamper Palestinian travel and work restrictions for those employed in Israel; and expanding Palestinian fishing rights off Gaza. At least 61 Palestinian prisoners were released Sunday and Israel Radio said a total of 200 are to be released by Monday.

On the ground, the violence did not stop. Palestinian gunmen killed an Israeli motorist in the West Bank, and Israeli troops raided a Palestinian town.

Summing up his busy day, Powell said he had found "sufficient good will to get started" toward implementing the blueprint, or "road map." It was developed by the Bush administration with the European Union, the United Nations and Russia in an effort to end 31 months of conflict, commit Israel and the Palestinians to stop the violence, and establish a Palestinian state.

Powell plans to confer Monday in Jerusalem with Christian Jouret of the European Union, Terje Rowed Larsen of the United Nations and Andred Vdovin of Russia, the U.S. partners in the so-called quartet, on the state of the process and results of his talks. Then he goes to Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan to urge Arab leaders to back his diplomacy and to use their influence with the Palestinians to stop attacks on Israel.

Yasser Abed Rabbo, a Palestinian minister, suggested the path ahead would not be smooth, noting that the Israelis are insisting on reopening the "road map" for a number of revisions. His Cabinet colleague, Shaath, said, "What's missing is not where the U.S. stands, it's where Israel stands."

Abbas' emergence as the Palestinian leader with whom the United States intends to deal is not universally accepted. European leaders contend that Yasser Arafat, as head of the Palestinian movement, should not be shunned.

Bring your professor or TA to dinner at the Dining Commons!

Now that the spring semester is almost over, you may want to show your appreciation to your professors or TAs by taking them to the Dining Commons for a meal. The DC will be the best place since we will pick-up the tab.

Here's how it works:

During the week of May 12-16, 2003, any student on the meal plan can bring one professor or TA per day to any DC for any meal on us. All you need to do is to have the professor or TA sign-in at the cashier's station and be accompanied by a student on the meal plan. Limited to one meal per day.

Tornadoes were reported in 10 counties across the central part of Illinois, officials said.

A twister that tore through South Pekin, Ill., 10 miles south of Peoria, damaged more than 150 homes, said Scott Gauvin, a spokesman for the Illinois Emergency Management Agency. More than 30 injuries were reported.

At least 25 homes in Lima, Ill., a rural community about 20 miles north of Quincy, were damaged when one tornado touched down, Gauvin said. The post office and a church in the community of 120 people were destroyed, and the top of the water tower was gone.

"It looks like a bomb had gone off," said Lima resident Mark Kroner.

Several funnel clouds were also spotted in Sangamon County, where the Illinois capital is located, and some flooding was reported, said Bill Russell of the county's emergency services agency.

Storms and powerful wind were also reported in Iowa, Wisconsin and Michigan.

In Tennessee, three tornadoes struck the middle part of the state, leveling homes and toppling trees and power lines.

Heavy damage also was reported in the western part of the state, but National Weather Service officials were still trying to determine whether the damage was caused by tornadoes.

At least four people were taken to hospitals, but none of the injuries was life threatening, said Kurt Pickering, a spokesman for the Tennessee Emergency Management Agency. About 400 homes and another 100 churches and businesses were damaged, he said.

"We've got a big old mess," said Maureen Culberson, a dispatcher with the Williamson County Emergency Management Agency. "And after having a week ago game through the same thing ... it is unbelievable."

Seniors present designs

Another group invented an on board diagnostic system for cars. The diagnostic is done with a laptop.

"It allow[s] you to read engine data and check you engine for fault codes and clear them if you need to evaluate your engine to get fixed," Issh Arak, a team member of the group, said. "We have a wireless portion that can be used for street racing. So you can have the computer set-up inside the car and somebody outside the car on the street making sure everything is going all right."

The senior design project was divided into a two-semester class. In the first semester, computer systems engineer and electrical engineer students formed teams, defined their projects in detail, mapped out an approach, developed models, simulated performance and ordered components. In the second semester, teams built, troubleshot and refined prototypes.

Hollywood producer takes over Amherst Cinema

apart," Jackson said.

He said the cinema had practically no heating, air conditioning that barely worked and a leaky roof.

"Even though they were reclaiming audiences they had lost after the opening of the [now defunct] Mt. Farms Theater, it wasn't bringing in enough money to cover their overhead."

THE PLAN

Jackson and the others who sit on the Amherst Cinema board of directors now envision a grand future for the closed theater. He said they've purchased a large lot of land next to the cinema and plan to tear down the old building and replace with a cinema that has three auditoriums ranging in size from 90 to 200 seats.

"There will also be a 350-seat performance space for music and theater, an art gallery, and a bar and cafe in the lobby to give patrons a place to sit around and discuss art and movies," Jackson said. "It's going to be pretty amazing."

The movies shown will be mostly independent and classic films, with the more popular ones shown in the biggest auditorium. Using his Hollywood connections, Jackson hopes to bring in "name" actors and directors to talk about their experiences in the movie business.

Getting Amherst Cinema from where it is now to where he would like it to be is going to take a lot of time, energy, and, maybe most importantly, money. Of the $2 to $3 million needed to get the theater up and running, over a million has already been raised from local donors.

Jackson says he has "absolutely no doubt" that it will get off the ground, however.

"It's just a matter of time before it all falls into place," he said.

RECALLING THE PAST

For all the bustle and excitement of this new venture, Jackson still has fond memories of his time in Hollywood. For instance, he recalls the inception of "Silence of the Lambs" to be a very interesting experience.

"It originally started as a Gene Hackman project, with Gene directing, screenwriting, and acting the role of Hannibal Lecter," Jackson said.

Jackson said Michelle Pfeiffer was supposed to have the role of Clarice Starling. Jackson said Hackman had to pull out when his daughter said she didn't like him playing in such violent movies, and Pfeiffer pulled out because her agent didn't think it fit her image to carry a gun. It left them with Jonathan Demme, a "no-name director," and Jodie Foster, "a good actress who wasn't real popular."

"We needed a big name for the part of Lecter, but were turned down by Warren Beatty, Dustin Hoffman, Jack Nicholson, Al Pacino, and Robert DeNiro," Jackson said. "Mostly they said something like 'Me, play Hannibal the cannibal? You've gotta be kidding!' So we went with Tony [Hopkins], a guy who might have been a great Shakespearean actor, but didn't really have the edge to play a role like this. We thought the movie was going to bomb miserably, and we couldn't have been more wrong."

Despite his obvious affection for the movie business, he has no desire or intention to go back.

"It used to be about creative entrepreneurship," Jackson said. "Now it's all about stock holders and the bottom line. I'm fine right here in Amherst."

Jackson envisions Amherst Cinema's re-opening to take place sometime in 2005. For more information or to make a donation to the project, contact Mark Lambert at 256-1991.

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, MAY 12, 2003 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Mascot change criticism enters national debate

The public debate about the possible mascot change from the Minutemen to the Gray Wolves has now gone beyond the Amherst campus.

Since news broke of the possible change, the national media has picked up the story and many news organizations have openly expressed their opinions on it.

The Boston Herald's Sunday staff opinion read: "The school's athletics director insists the Minuteman logo has raised 'gender, firearms and ethnicity issues.' Wonder what he and the rest of the geniuses in the UMass administration think of Notre Dame's Fightin' Irish logo – a symbol so ubiquitous you'd think they had campuses in every corner of this country. Ah, but they win games, don't they?"

Columnist Larry McDermott at the Springfield Republican wrote that, "It's the team name, and it's the one we know. It works. If someone is offended by the name, the folks who run UMass should just say, 'I'm sorry,' and get on with the game."

Last week, Tony Kornheiser of ESPN also criticized the idea on his Television show, Pardon the Interruption: "Without Minutemen there would be no University of Massachusetts, there would be the University of England at Amherst."

The Internet has provided another outlet for people to voice their concerns over the mascot. Massfive.com has had over 200 posts on their web forum, and it seems that many of the respondents are opposed to the change. There is also an online anti-gray wolves petition, which has collected over 3,500 signatures.

When news first broke about the mascot change we at The Collegian expressed concern that not enough students were involved in the process. Since then, the student body and alumni have flooded us with letters concerned about the change. The majority of these letters have been from people who are avidly opposed to the change for a variety of different reasons.

While we expected the UMass community past and present to respond to the news, the national news picking up and questioning it is something we at didn't expect. Most stories that hit the wires and gain national attention are given a paragraph for a day and then never seen again. The debate over the mascot, however, has stayed fresh in the minds of the national media.

And the consensus from the national media seems to be that they are opposed to the change as well.

The idea has been entertained long enough now that it should be clear to Athletics Director Ian McCaw and the rest of administration that this is a bad idea. Not only have those in the UMass community voiced their concerns, those outside the community have as well. It's time for the administration to listen to these concerns; if they don't listen to those of us connected with UMass, maybe the national media's jokes will eventually get to them.

A good virus is hard to find

Robert Carey

In almost every major media source there has been a clamorous uproar over SARS. The coverage of this affliction has stirred a reactionary portion of the world into a panic-stricken state of severe hypochondria. While SARS may be potentially dangerous to the elderly, and those with a depleted immunity, its lethal potency is drastically reduced, if not entirely nulled, against a population of healthy well-feed people. The SARS pandemic has been largely hyped by poor media coverage that shows terrified people wearing medical masks, and spraying disinfecting fug into rice paddies. On television, the disease looks like a killer of horrific scale.

The truth behind SARS is far from frightening, and once again, the media has built a monster in order to turn the eyes of the public towards them. In East Asia, where the disease has its origins, 500 people have died, out of some 6,905 cases (a measly seven percent fatality rate). This out of a part of the world that's home to 4 billion people. In Western countries, where people have access to greater health care, and are better fed, all of the little outbreaks have been quickly contained, and the casualty rate stands at zero. In the meantime, 6 million people die every year from malaria, tuberculosis, and pneumonia.

In fact, in America, 36,000 people die every year of the flu. But who's running stories about these boring, everyday killers? Nobody. It is the mysterious and uncouth diseases that draw a crowd. How is the media supposed to stretch the truth on a disease that is already familiar to the medical community, when they can report on what they have deemed "killer pneumonia?"

The largest casualty in this media-run circus is the Yen. East Asian stock markets have plummeted since this hype has gripped the world in an uncalled for panic. The media has warned already terror-stricken tourists to stay away from the Orient. The World Bank has estimated that East Asian economic growth will decrease 10 percent this year because of the SARS scare. The lack of enthusiasm to partake in international commerce with this part of the world is good for European and American markets, which have nervously watched the Chinese economy grow 10 times its 1990 size.

"The World Bank has estimated that East Asian economic growth will decrease 10 percent this year because of the SARS scare."

Back home, the economies of cities stricken by the disease have been particularly sensitive to the woes of a local area under the black cloud of sensationalized media. In Toronto the CEOs of Expedite Plus, Rogers Communication, and the Blue Jays have been buying tickets to baseball games and redistributing at reduced cost, in order to boost the morale of a city stricken by a non-lethal outbreak of SARS. In regards to the gesture Victor Deschenes, CEO of Expedite Plus, said: "With the challenges that Toronto has been faced with in the past couple of weeks...corporate citizens have started the ball rolling towards recovery." I wish Boston would come down with a case of SARS, if the prescription for recovery were sporting events at reduced cost; tickets to a Sox game are far too overpriced.

I understand that if people aren't alarmed or shocked by something, then they generally do not watch the news. However, isn't there some kind of code of ethics in journalism to report the unbiased truth? I am sure that journalists could find plenty of true and shocking stories around the world if only they dug hard enough. Finding one of these stories would be superior than scaring the public with some imaginary bobgoblin.

When frightened, the masses can become more reckless and more destructive than a raging bull surrounded by eight rodeo clowns. The journalistic code of ethics is in place for a reason, and to break it will lead to nothing but chaos. The media may have to come to the unfortunate reality that until medical science begins to severely regress, pandemic diseases won't have the punch that they used to.

I feel like some gray-haired curmudgeon typing this, but the influenza pandemic of 1918 resulted in 40 million people dead in one year. Now there was a disease worth running to the hills for. Back in those days the media didn't have to exaggerate mass suffering in order to sell newspapers. However, there still is a large amount of suffering in this world and the media needs to do a better job finding it.

Stability through honesty

Dan Barrett

The world is not a very stable place. Victors in Iraq has led to widespread looting and the destruction of priceless cultural artifacts. India has rejected offers from Pakistan for mutual nuclear disarmament. Iran is in possession of hidden, underground nuclear facilities. North Korea is developing fuel rods necessary for the creation of nuclear weapons. China, Japan, and South Korea are contemplating beginning their own nuclear weapons programs. On the Korean peninsula alone, the Pentagon estimates that over one million people will die in only seven days if conflict breaks out.

That's 100 people every minute, for seven days.

It has become brutally apparent that international stability is necessary for our own survival. The neo-conservative factions of our government see this stability as being achieved through the forced spread of American culture. However, this approach has created a palpable air of tension in the international community. Stability, still seems remote, despite our recent military successes in Iraq and Afghanistan.

If transplanting American cultural assets, such as civil rights and representative democracy, has been met with such resistance, how are we to achieve stability? If the promotion of freedom is a worthwhile cause, (and it is) how to achieve it without seeming imperialistic?

"Capitalism doesn't survive on the strength of its theories alone, however; it survives because it works."

The answer is simple. There is a way to promote democratic values in the Middle East without resorting to military force. There is a way to usurp oppressive, cruel dictators without invasion. There is a way to ensure civil rights without destroying local cultural traditions.

The answer is Capitalism.

There have been few things more universally reviled on college campuses than Capitalism. You will never see a pro-capitalist rally outside Wal-Mart. People do not play songs on the acoustic guitar about Adam Smith. The fact of the matter is, however, that capitalism is the surest and safest way to promote world peace.

Capitalism as a concept is simple; value is traded for value, and only for value. Force plays no part whatsoever in a capitalist system. If you have something I desire, I cannot simply take it away without your consent; I must trade for it. I pay as much as I am willing to pay, you take as much as you can get. If we are both unsatisfied, then the trade is canceled. No one is coerced and no one is forced. Capitalism, by its very nature, forces honesty in human relations.

Capitalism doesn't survive on the strength of its theories alone, however; it survives because it works. Capitalism weeds out that which is inferior or which does not work; in this way it is much like evolution. Thus, a Capitalist society encourages immediate improvements in the quality of life. You are not forced to buy something, or wear something, or eat something simply because the state or a religious institution tells you to. You buy, wear, and eat the best you can afford. Contrast Seoul, an economic powerhouse where every man, woman, and child owns a cell phone, and Pyongyang, where people eat bark to survive. This is not a hypothesis. This is reality.

But capitalism can't exist in a vacuum; it needs freedom to survive. If a person no longer has the freedom to choose, then they may no longer buy what they wish, and the "evolutionary" aspect of capitalism dies. As such, it is no longer capitalism, and improvements to the quality of life stop. In a way, capitalism is very fragile; too much government control and it shatters. Because of this, Capitalism and individual freedoms need each other to function. Again, contrast the representative government of South Korea to the totalitarian regime of North Korea. Though they are separated by mere miles, they might as well be on entirely different planets.

Of course, capitalism too has its problems, but the freedoms and possibilities capitalism provides allow people to change it for the better. Communism and Socialism, by contrast, allow no choice. There is no way for them to adapt and no way for them to improve. This is why you get cell phones in Seoul and grass for food in Pyongyang.

Most of the things President Bush says nowadays involve blowing people up, and as such I don't like him all that much. On Friday, however, in a commencement speech at the University of South Carolina, Bush pressed for free, open U.S. trade in the Middle East as a step towards solving the Israel-Palestine conflict. "Economic prosperity is critical" to the peace process, he noted.

He couldn't have been more right. Both as an American citizen concerned about the security of our country, and as a human being, traumatized over the killing of many innocent people in order to kill a guilty few, I believe that only through non-violent means can we create the type of world in which security, personal freedoms, and peace can exist.

In other words, Capitalism built this nation. All war ever did was kill some people.

Support free trade in the Middle East.

Attendance an elementary school concept

S. J. Port

Upon entering the golden gate of college life, one of my many expectations was that the days in which attendance was factored into my grade would finally be over. No more teachers doing roll call, or counting the number of classes you'd missed against you. My father a retired professor, and others all explained to me that in higher education your grade was based on two or three exams or papers each semester. Attendance was up to me, they said.

Contrary to what I was led to believe, UMass has a strict attendance policy outlined on page 59, section VIII of the Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities handbook. The University seems to consider requiring attendance a necessary administrative duty. The policy states that students are expected to attend all regularly scheduled classes for which they are registered. In cases of illness students are expected to explain their absences directly to their instructor. Students are not to be penalized for classes missed due to illness. However, "an instructor teaching a course where grading criteria are spelled out may lower a grade or even fail a student for poor attendance."

Attendance is a valuable and imperative component of education, agreed. However, when a student reaches the undergraduate level he should be expected to be mature enough to decide what courses he needs to attend and understand that it is best to attend all courses. The current policy is one of the few ways in which the University seems to be parenting undergraduates.

In a place where nobody holds your hand, and it is left up to the student's initiative to succeed and seek out help as well as opportunities it seems strange to create a policy regarding a student's attendance. One would almost expect the University to write a policy that read more like this, "It is obviously in the student's best interest to attend class, however as undergraduates they should be mature enough to make the decision whether to attend a class which they are paying for or study on their own." Instead it chooses to allow professors to penalize students for attendance regardless of their performance on the crucial course work, or if they actually participate in the course when they are there.

"In a place where nobody holds your hand, and it is left up to the student's initiative to succeed and seek out help as well as opportunities it seems strange to create a policy regarding a student's attendance."

Language courses, discussion sections, and honors classes are notorious for insisting on a student's attendance. In one recent course I was told that although I received an A for my participation in the course, I had missed enough classes that the 10 percent of my grade, which was generated by attendance, was an F. I had received A's on both papers and all other work for the course, but had missed two more classes than was allowed by the professor and therefore would have to be penalized by a drop in my grade to an A/B.

A few professors have caught on that the correlation between a student's attendance and their performance is not necessarily an exact science. One instructor I have this semester explained that although he would like us all to come to class, and found himself both educational and entertaining, he felt that we should be mature enough to either realize this for ourselves and come to class, be smart enough to do the work on our own, or adult enough to accept the consequences of doing poorly because of missing valuable lectures and discussions in class.

Another professor takes attendance so that when students begin to do poorly on homework assignments and exams he is able to understand whether it is because of absences on dates when the material was taught or if it is perhaps due to holes in his teaching, or the student's understanding of the lecture.

If a student's attendance is part of his/her grade, then a student's participation must also be part of the grade. Many students attend all their classes but sleep, doodle, or tune out during them. Others who participate in discussions and question lectures unquestionably gain more from the course. Students who do not regularly participate in their classes are a waste of space, and should not be given credit for attending.

Grades should be based on the quality of one's work, not the regularity of attendance.

One last time: You can call them shallow but they're also right

Running with Scissors

Melissa Hammel & Lizzy Nielsen

It seems like just weeks ago when the column Running with Scissors began, as sort of a humorous column on ways to improve the University of Massachusetts campus. Now that we as the authors of this column have reached our final installment, we are here to bring you just a little bit more of our wit and wisdom to take on the road with you, a final list of all of the things that we have written about to date. So without further ado, here is our final summation of the top things one should and should not do in daily life.

SMELL GOOD

We have said it over and over again but we will reiterate it again: It is important that you shower and apply deodorant. Smelling good is quintessential. If you ever want to go on a date with a member of the opposite sex, or simply share a small elevator space with a stranger without causing them to be ill, then apply some cologne on your already showered and clean-smelling self. This becomes even more important as the summer progresses. Do everyone a favor and shower. On the flip side, dousing yourself in cologne is never a good thing. You are trying to smell nice, not make the entire Western world keel over with the stench of your cologne. If people are standing more than two feet away and can smell you, you're wearing too much.

BUTT FLOSS

Despite our warnings to the female population of this campus, the Ladies of Running with Scissors have spotted plumber's butt on a number of women we have run into. What we are talking about is women who don a tiny little thong with very low pants and leave half of their butt hanging out in the middle of a bar or during class. We are believers that the only people who should see your bare behind are those of your own choosing and not the entire Southwest living area.

KEEP THE GIRLS INTACT

Ladies, please wear bras. It's so easy to tell when someone isn't, as there is a lot of unnatural movement in the upper body area. There's nothing attractive about excessive jiggling. If you can pull off a shirt with a built-in bra, then do it. But if they can't, keep the twins in line by putting on a bra. Perkiness beats sagging. Just ask 60-year-old ladies.

CLUB ATTIRE TO CLASS? NO

Please, when you go to class, avoid the hoochie black pants and tube top you wear to the Hippodrome on the weekends. Shoes that resemble stilts are also unacceptable. Some of the creatures we see walking out of Southwest on Monday morning at 9 a.m. in platforms and three feet of makeup are disgusting. Save the club attire for the clubs, and wear class clothes to class.

BACK AWAY FROM THE BAR

The worst thing that someone can ever do at a bar is to stand in front of the bartender, monopolizing all of the space and ordering no drinks at all.

The best way to wreck another person's bar experience is to prevent them from drinking entirely or even sitting down at all. While we are aware that oftentimes bars are crowded and don't allow for much room to move around, but at the very least be polite enough to allow the other person enough room to elbow in. Or even better, order their drink for them.

DO NOT FLAIL YOUR LIMBS IN A CLUB

It is quite difficult after a few drinks to keep your arms and legs under control, especially in a packed club. Flailing limbs will result in flying drinks and angry people. Attempt to not let your arms and legs get out of control because you could anger someone to the point of getting your butt kicked. Plain and simple, if you've had too much, go sit at the bar or a table, and don't dance; you'll probably not only make a complete ass of yourself and knock someone over, but you'll also appear to be having a seizure.

Once wallowing in pain, Staind evolves to happier state

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

What do you when all of the pain in your music that you've drawn on for years fades away?

After three albums of misery and suffering, Staind's "14 Shades of Grey," set for release May 20, digresses from lyricist and vocalist Aaron Lewis' troubled past. The scars of heartache are still there, sure. But "Shades" shows remarkable growth for the band – if not musically, then at least emotionally. The newer elements on the album – forgiveness, acceptance, gratitude and love among them – immediately jump out.

Staind
'14 Shades of Grey'
Flip/Elektra

The change in message that Lewis penned for the album is easily explained.

"His life's changed a lot," drummer Jon Wysocki said, explaining that Lewis is now happily married with a one-year-old daughter. "You can't keep writing the same old record over and over."

Wysocki says that while "there's no sunshine on it," there are lighter sides on "14 Shades" that did not appear on the band's past albums. He attributes it to the growth and evolution of the band's members, both as people and musicians.

The Springfield natives openly experiment with parts of the new album, releasing some of the softest music they have ever touched before. While Wysocki says he thinks listeners will find the music heavier, the band comes across shockingly tender on other tracks, leaving listeners with multiple "shades of grey" to digest.

Lewis' improved outlook on life is immediately apparent with the record's third track, "So Far Away." Lewis pensively sings about the way his life has changed for the better, with swirling guitars behind him building to a chorus many listeners probably thought they would never hear from Staind.

"Now that we're here, so far away/ And I feel like I can face the day/ I can forgive, and I'm not ashamed/ To be the person that I am today," Lewis sings.

It's a revelation for the band; a song doesn't have to be brooding, angry or sad to be good. A standout track on the album, "Fill Me Up," also breaks ground for the band. While the track features the riff from hell that could compete with much of the heavy music the band has released before, the song is about being in love.

"You fill me up," Lewis sings. "You're in my veins/ Our love could take my breath away/ And all these things you give away/ Sometimes I take for granted."

This isn't to say that all of the songs with brighter lyrics are exceptional. While "Zoe Jane," a song Lewis wrote to his daughter, will probably win the hearts of mothers nationwide, many longtime Staind

Staind kicks off tour in Boston

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

With the release of their fourth album a little over a week away, Staind kicks off touring this week with two shows at the Avalon in Boston.

The first show is a sit-down acoustic set Wednesday night, followed immediately by the first of four free shows the following night. The other free shows are slated for May 17 at the Hammerstein Ballroom in New York, May 20 at the Wiltern Theatre in Los Angeles and May 23 at the House of Blues in Chicago. The band's summer tour kicks off May 24 in Indianapolis.

"No one is touring with us on the free shows," drummer Jon Wysocki said. "We'll be able to play a nice long set."

A 'Lesson' in exploring injustice, race and resistance

By Brian Castro
Collegian Staff

The UMass Theater season has come to an end. Theater De Lune's "Hamlet" transformed the dour play into a drug-induced episode; "Love in Disguise" was an enjoyably formulaic soap opera; the Mineola Twins was an all-out camp-fest; and theater's best known odd couple told their side of the story in "Rosencrantz and Guilenstein are Dead." Wouldn't the best way to end the year be on a sad note? Yes, in the case of "A Lesson Before Dying."

'A Lesson Before Dying'
Curtain Theater

"A Lesson Before Dying" is powerful commentary on race relations between Black and white society before the Civil Rights era. Its lessons and issues are applicable, even in present society. The play is Romulus Linney's adaptation of Ernest Gains 1993 novel of the same name. The novel has also been adapted to an HBO movie that starred Don Cheadle and Mekhi Phifer.

The time and place is Louisiana in 1948, before Brown v. the Board of education, and before Martin Luther King had a dream. The fictional town of Bayonne is like any other Southern town in the 1940s, it is ruled by prejudice and hate.

The main protagonist, Jefferson, is a slow young man accused of a murder that he did not commit. Being at the wrong place, at the wrong time, Jefferson witnesses a shootout between a group of robbers and a white store clerk. Everyone except Jefferson dies and he is soon found in the store, holding money with liquor on his hands. After being found guilty by an all-white jury, he is sentenced to solitary confinement until his execution.

Emma, his godmother, realizing that there is no way to talk to the withdrawn Jefferson, hires Grant Wiggins, a local teacher who schooled his way out of Bayonne. Wiggins has to get through Jefferson, and teach him to stand up to his executors, so that he may die with dignity.

Meanwhile, Grant is a character with his own problems. Ashamed of the vicious cycle in which his fellow blacks are caught, he seeks to leave Bayonne, refusing to face reality.

While the events of the novel are fictitious, the story is no less true. The program comments that, despite the community's support of Jefferson, southerners had a sense of what to tolerate from blacks. Pardons were rarely issued to save them from a death sentence and black-on-white crime was treated with more severity.

The acting was top notch. The actors portrayed their characters as believable people. The casting choices further that believability. The cast is all African-American, with the exception of Sheriff Guidry and Paul. Doris McKethan, who director Greg Allen found at a community play, appears to be in her 70s. Her excellent portrayal is enhanced by her age as she comfortably fits into her role as a worn, tired woman, who is strong willed believing that Jefferson can be redeemed.

Brian Punch effectively used his limited stage time as the racist, hard-edged Sheriff Guidry, who seeks to bring Jefferson to justice.

Oluyemi Famuyide's standout performance brings a fiery performance of a ravaged young boy. His small, narrowed eyes stare up and his facial muscles twitch in rage. When he finally speaks he sounds hateful, yet fearful of others and himself. His low brow, hunched posture, and quick-tempered demeanor, underlie his fits of rage towards a society that see him as nothing more than just a bog. He plays Jefferson as a lost soul that is seemingly beyond redemption.

Abe Henderson is equally good as a teacher who is reluctant to deal with his past or look at his fellow people. His character progresses from being withdrawn and refusing to see Jefferson as himself to helping Jefferson face the chair so that Grant may face his own demons.

What turns "A Lesson Before Dying" into such a thought-provoking experience are the themes found within the play. Redemption, heroism, running away from one's problems and self-hatred plague the two lead characters. The commentary on the injustices of America's justice system is the most timely and poignant. Delina Banks Jr., a 44-year-old black man, is sitting on Texas death row, awaiting execution after being convicted, by an all-white jury, for the murder of a 16-year-old. The pending execution of Banks draws parallels with Jefferson's execution. An all-white jury in a racist part of the South convicts Jefferson, who has no previous record.

The ending is a sad reminder of real life. We are shown Jefferson's last meal with his companions. As he leaves to go face his end, a radio that he carries plays "When the Saints Go Marching Home." Toward the final moments, the play leaves a chill as the lights go out, leaving the room pitch black. All that is heard is the humming sound of an electric chair, its sound intensifying like the approach of freight train, until it suddenly stops.

The Ataris wax nostalgic on 'So Long, Astoria'

The Ataris reminisce about the past on their new album, "So Long, Astoria."

By Johnny Donaldson

In preparation for his band's jump to a major-label, Ataris frontman Kris Roe traveled around in a van, visiting old haunts to reacquire the mists of his past; old glories and long-forgotten failures consumed by the dusts of time. Inspired by a book written by Television's Richard Hell, Roe adopted a worldview in which life was built upon the silhouettes of memory, of looking back with a cherished fondness for the past.

"So Long, Astoria" is a wander through the backroads of nostalgia, with Roe perpetually looking into the rearview mirror at what once was, rather than ahead at what will be. In Roe's world everything bespeaks his love for his own history. The Ataris were, after all, named for the classic '80s game console and Astoria is the name of the town in "The Goonies."

Roe, as a singer and as a lyricist, is stuck in a loop of remembrance, where even a note-perfect cover of Don Henley's "Boys of

'X2' retains top box-office spot

LOS ANGELES (AP) Mutants preserved their power at the box office as "X2: X-Men United" remained the No. 1 movie, taking in $41.4 million in its second weekend.

Eddie Murphy's family comedy "Daddy Day Care," in which he plays an out-of-work father who starts a toddler-tending business, opened in second place with $27.6 million, according to studio estimates Sunday.

"X2," the sequel based on the comic book about genetic mutants with superpowers, lifted its 10-day total to $149 million after an opening weekend of $85.6 million, the fourth best of all-time.

By Wednesday, "X2" should pass the $157.3 million that "X-Men" took in during its entire run three years ago, said Bruce Snyder, head of distribution for 20th Century Fox, which released both movies.

The improved box office indicates fans of the comic books drove the first film, while its exposure since then through home video and TV airings has broadened the franchise's appeal, Snyder said.

"It's grown in stature, plus this one got the kind of reviews that drove in not an adult audience and a female audience to see it, people who might not normally go to see a comic-book-based story," Snyder said.

The overall box office was down, with the top 12 movies grossing $103 million, off 11 percent from the same weekend last year, when "Spider-Man" continued to dominate theaters.

Murphy, whose early movie career was built on street-smart action comedies such as "Beverly Hills Cop" and "48 Hrs.", has bombed in his recent edgier flicks, including last year's "Showtime," "I Spy" and "The Adventures of Pluto Nash."

His hits lately have come from family movies such as "The Nutty Professor," "Doctor Dolittle" and their sequels.

'14 Shades' introduces new Staind

Lou Will returns as the end of the band's snarling persona.

Unfortunately another element to "14 Shades" that was before sold for Staind – especially in the aptly titled "I Lay Me," a song thanking the late Alice in Chains frontman Layne Staley for the positive influence his music had on the band's lives.

It had a pretty big one actually," Wysocki said of the Alice in Chains influence on Staind. "I think even more so for Aaron."

In "I Lay," Lewis directly addresses Staley post-mortem. "The words you sang/ They will always be a part of me/ The words you sang/ You made me feel like I was not alone/ The words you sang/ You gave me strength to carry on," Lewis sings.

Lewis' past does surface several times on the album despite the newer feelings expressed, and those tend to be the stronger tracks on the album. On "Fray," a dark, reflective number, the lyrics betray the older feelings. "Would you listen even if I hold you?/ Who the hell am I to say/ You're too busy with the lives they sold you/ ... While the edges slowly fray."

That song and several standouts like it, including "Yesterday," "Reality" and the first single, "Price to Play," serve as strong reminders of where the band's roots lie: Anger and frustration.

Overall, it is clear that the band's sound is gradually evolving. With the anger toned down, the throaty roars and buzzing guitars of past tunes like "Suffocate," "Mudshovel," and "Can't Believe" are gone. Perhaps half of the album would fit in on "Break the Cycle," which lamented not only personal failings, but failings in the world at large. Little of it would fit in on their older albums. "Dysfunction" and "Tormented," with the roaring rage and isolation that coursed through them.

The end product on "14 Shades of Grey" is good, but it has some weaknesses too. Several of the later tracks on the album, such as "Tonight" and "Intro," fade together into monotony. At times, it sounds the band is still trying to find their way. Staind is no longer comfortable sitting in the niche it has as one of the preeminent pained rockers on the market. While it's good that the band is trying something new, there are hits and misses with those things they try.

"14 Shades of Grey" isn't as compelling as 2001's "Break the Cycle," but if it's taken for what it is, fans will still find it worth a listen. Staind may be changing with newfound personal happinesses, but they can still put together a pretty good rock album.

Drummer Wysocki excited about Staind tour

Wysocki said the band will feel obligated to play much of their new material while touring, particularly during the free shows. On the main tour fans can expect to hear a little of everything. He said that the band will certainly play the big radio hits from "Break the Cycle" and that a few songs from "Dysfunction" will still make the set. Wysocki hopes that material from the "Tormented" the band's first album won't disappear either.

"We try to do a little bit of every thing," he said.

Wysocki says that the band will continue to make frequent stops in the area. He said Staind will play at the Meadows Music Theater in Hartford on the Fourth of July and will appear again in the area either Aug. 2 or 3 for a show in Springfield.

"Right off the bat, there's three shows right there," he said, including the free show in Boston in the mix.

So touring mates have been named for the summer tour as of yet.

Wysocki said that the band spent a little more than three months recording "14 Shades of Grey," using the same creative process that they do for every album.

"Mike [Mushok], our guitarist, usually [starts by] coming up with some ideas on his own," Wysocki said.

From there Wysocki said that he, Mushok, and bassist Johnny April "jam on them" until they have something they think is solid. The music is then turned over to Lewis, who sets it to lyrics.

"Aaron usually makes some changes on his own," Wysocki said.

Those changes happen for a variety of reasons, including to fit Lewis' vocal range and the lyrics that he has already written.

It took Mushok, April and Wysocki about five weeks in California to record the music for the album, Wysocki said. Lewis added vocals to the tracks over the next two months.

Beats concert brings all cultures together in the name of peace

By ERIC GOODMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Beats for Peace tour is just as much about resistance to the war in Iraq as it is about the music. Its main goal is to promote awareness of the money that is being taken away from education, health care, social security and welfare in order to support what is being commonly called "Bush's War." Hip-hop artists Medusa, Anwar Superstar, the Jazz Hip Hop Orchestra and Pharoahe Monch were all on hand to provide a night of great music, but more importantly, they were there to promote opposition to the war.

The night began with a refreshing performance by the Jazz Hip Hop Orchestra under the direction of Angelamia Bachemin. The orchestra featured two emcees and a DJ in addition to a guitar, bass, saxophone, drums and bongos.

'Beats for Peace Tour'
Pearl Street
May 9

The group flowed effortlessly through carbon copy covers of such hip-hop instrumentals as "Sucka Nigga" by A Tribe Called Quest and "Just To Get By" by Talib Kweli as the two emcees spit lyrics opposing George W. Bush's decision for war. The Jazz Hip Hop Orchestra is a very talented hip-hop band comparable to such well-known acts as The Roots and Soulive.

In between each artist's set, concert-goers were encouraged to check out information booths containing loads of publications opposing the war. There were plenty of pamphlets and newsletters providing detailed explanations opposing the United States' involvement in Iraq. In addition, volunteers were circulating the room with buckets accepting donations to support the Beats For Peace effort.

Next up was the duo Anwar Superstar. This group seemed to be more about getting their message across than actually being entertaining. Anwar Superstar was certainly opposed to the war and it came out in their lyrics.

After an inspirational performance by female West Coast emcee Medusa, it was time for the headliner, Pharoahe Monch, to take the stage.

The Queens-bred emcee came equipped with a DJ, two backup singers and his microphone and absolutely brought down the house with his tongue-twisting rhyme schemes. This is proof that you don't need to have 10 other guys on stage with you – like 50 Cent at the Spring Concert – if you are a truly gifted emcee.

Pharoahe ripped through a few of his well known cuts off the 1999 "Internal Affairs" album such as "The Light," "Queens," and of course, "Simon Says." In addition, he blessed the crowd with "Agent Orange," a track off his new album scheduled for release sometime later this year. According to Monch, "Agent Orange" is a track about his opposition to George W. Bush.

Throughout his entire set, Pharoahe never took time out to encourage the crowd to "throw their hands in the air" or participate in any sort of call-and-response that is standard at any hip-hop concert. Instead, he treated the crowd to one of the most complex and unique flows in hip-hop history, perhaps leaving the people too mesmerized to wave their hands like they just don't care.

The culturally diverse crowd contained young children, teenagers, college students and professional adults who were all there to support opposition to the war. The Beats For Peace concert proved that hip-hop has the power to bring all cultures together in the name of peace.

The Ataris make fun music

Summer" fits into the Ataris' musical landscapes. Though the twenty-something Roe is barely old enough to remember the actual year, Roe captures the mood of everyone's childhood summers in "Summer '79": We Are The Champions playing on the radio station/ everyone sing along with these anthems of our generation."

"Being grown up/ isn't half as fun as growing up," Roe sings on "In This Diary," as a grown-up with the wisdom of hindsight to know he should have relished youth. "All the nights we stayed up talking/ listening to '80s songs/ and quoting lines from the movies that we love/ it still brings a smile to my face" he remembers.

The songs are buoyed by the same golden harmony-soaring vocals dynamic that have helped Jimmy Eat World find success. Though The Ataris don't break free of the pop-punk fold, they mine it for sounds that are richer and more mature than the more juvenile mall-punk of Simple Plan. From the anthemic "My Reply" to the gentle "The Saddest Song" (Roe's absent-father apology to his five year old son) to the infectious "Boys of Summer," "So Long, Astoria" drips with the kind of honey-dipped melodies that the best of the genre is built on, with Roe's raspy, sandpaper vocals a change of pace from the earnest, whiny voices of many of his peers.

The grace and maturity with which The Ataris have jumped into the mainstream is as much a tribute to the band as their music. "So Long, Astoria" is a bittersweet glance to the past, where the boys always look back in affection, a snapshot of that eternal summer.

ly be taken the wrong way. Nothing says "I love you" like implying, "Honey, I think you're fat." Now, if a woman or man asked for a gym membership at some point, it is a different story. However, don't ever surprise someone with a gym membership. It could mean the end of a relationship.

AVOID HOOKING UP IN OTHER PEOPLES ROOMS

When you go to a party at someone else's house, please refrain from "hooking up" in communal areas or in the host's bedroom. It's in bad taste, and you could end up being the official party entertainment. Hooking up is never a bad thing, but go back to your own place or car.

Before we end this column the Ladies of Running with Scissors would like to thank our editors, specifically Jennifer Eastwood and the Arts department as a whole for their constant support of this column as well as those of you on campus who have taken the time to read our work. We'd also like to thank those who have allowed us to make examples of them (D.L.) We'd also like to scoff at all the emails we got regarding our column from individuals who didn't understand our humor. As columnists, if we're not pissing people off, we're not doing our job. So one last time, you can call us shallow, but we are also right.

Congratulations to all UMass Amherst leadership award winners and especially, the Class of 2003!

These are the scholarships and awards that were reported to the committee by Monday, May 5, 2003. Thank you to those offices and departments that submitted your awards and recipients for inclusion in this recognition. This, by no means, is a complete listing. If you would like your award to be included in recognition planning for the next academic year, please contact the Leadership Network Committee via email at leadnet@educ.umass.edu.

UM advances in NCAA's

Kostolansky and Jim Femminella, to just two points for the second time this season.

"Both of those guys are tremendous players, they've had great careers at Hofstra," Cannella said. "Femminella was directly responsible for putting the game into overtime last year here...and Kostolowsky has eaten us up a couple of times, they're both great shooters."

Freshman Dane Collins was impressive for the second consecutive week, winning 13 of the 19 faceoffs he took.

"Dane did a good job," Cannella said. "Thirteen out of 19, that's a hell of a day for a faceoff guy, whoever it is, but Dane's been working hard, we told him that we have a lot of faith in him, he's a young guy, he's struggled at times this year but we all stand behind him when he gets out there."

Hofstra also lost star defender Brian Zuchelli in the third quarter to an apparent knee injury. He returned later in the period, but went down for good in the fourth quarter when his knee buckled while he was covering Kevin Leveille.

"Actually, Zuchelli was covering Kevin," junior attackman Jeff Zywicki said, "but when he came back out there, the first thing I said to Kevin was, I pointed at my knee and said, 'Take him for a little run. See if you can get him to be a little hesitant.'"

The two teams battled back and forth in the first quarter, with junior Neil Lundberg picking up a pair of goals for the Minutemen, and went to the locker rooms tied at four.

The Minutemen will move on to face Maryland at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, N.Y. on Saturday. The Terrapins advanced via an 8-5 victory over Ohio State.

Kevin Leveille's hat trick helped propel the Minutemen into the second round of the NCAA tournament.

Baseball takes two from St. Joe's to win A-10 East

UMass wraps up season with title

By MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It stumbled out of the gate, got crushed by Alabama to open the season and went on to lose five of their first six games.

It lost two of three in their first Atlantic 10 series at Duquesne.

It gave up a combined 37 runs in two drubbings at the hands of rival Connecticut.

It blew a three-run lead in the top of the ninth to lose the opening game of the 2003 Baseball Beanpot, and then fell hard to Northeastern 6-1 in the consolation game to finish the tournament dead last.

It lost the final game of its season, 14-8, at the hands of a team seven games below .500.

Minus the aforementioned lowlights coach Mike Stone would surely love to forget, the Massachusetts baseball team went 22-5.

The Minutemen nearly swept a doubleheader from Big East rival Boston College. They put together a furious and dramatic rally to down Vermont. They avenged the loss to Northeastern behind a group of freshman hurlers. They won all but one of their A-10 series, sweeping two of them.

And now, by taking two of three from St. Joseph's over the weekend, they are the champions of the Atlantic 10 East Division.

"It feels good," Stone said. "[Winning the A-10 East] is what we've been trying to accomplish. We had a little bit of a struggle at times, but that's baseball. The guys hung in there and have played well. We've been focused as a team all year.

We've known what's needed to be done, and for the most part we've done it."

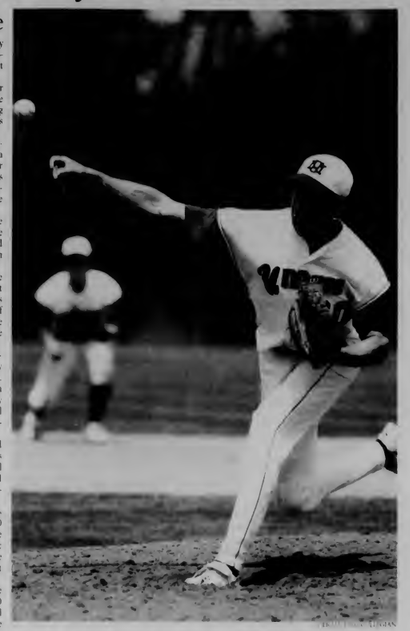
After last season, our goal all year has been to be outright champions of the A-10 East," senior designated hitter Chris Morgan said. "There's different periods throughout a season where we've struggled, but we just got back on our feet and worked to keep putting it all together."

Sunday's series finale saw an oddity for Stone and the Minutemen – National Pitcher of the Week Matt Torra struggled.

The freshman lasted just four innings, surrendering 10 runs on nine hits while walking three and striking out five. Torra was tagged with his fourth loss of the season.

The Minutemen (24-17, 14-7 A-10) grabbed an early 3-0 lead on a three-run homer off the bat of senior first baseman Jeff Alticri. UMass upped its advantage to 5-1 before surrendering 12 consecutive runs to the Hawks (17-31, 9-14 A-10).

It also marked the final home game at Earl Lorden Field for the senior quartet of Alticri, Morgan and co-captains John Seed and Tom Ellerbrock.



In Saturday's second game, Stone turned a 5-4 lead over to closer Scott Ratlif, who was dominant, but was victimized by a double off the bat of SJU catcher Mike DeLorenzo. The Fairfield, N.J. native later scored the tying run.

Nevertheless, the Minutemen capitalized on a leadoff triple by Ellerbrock in the bottom of the ninth. After juniors Mike Athas and Adam Stojanowski were intentionally walked, Morgan ran the count full before drilling the game-winning single to centerfield.

"I was looking to be patient and get my pitch," Morgan said. "I was definitely going to swing on the full count. I wasn't looking for a walk, I was definitely looking to be aggressive."

Saturday's first game saw UMass erase an early 2-0 deficit with 10 unanswered runs to cruise past the Hawks 10-2. Winning pitcher Eric Chown gave up no earned runs while scattering six hits and striking out two.

The Minutemen have earned a bye in next weekend's Atlantic 10 Championship as the No. 2 seed, and will face the winner of Rhode Island/George Washington. The tournament will be played at Dodd Memorial Stadium in Norwich, Conn.

Eric Chown fired a complete game six-hitter on Saturday for the Maroon and White, who captured the A-10 East title with two wins over St. Joseph's.

Another Atlantic 10 crown

Minutewomen capture ninth consecutive title

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

After pair of tight games against Temple, the Massachusetts softball team claimed its ninth straight Atlantic 10 softball championship.

Supported by another strong performance from A-10 Pitcher of the Year Kaila Holtz, the Minutewomen shutout the Owls 1-0 Saturday.

The only Massachusetts run was scored by shortstop Emily Robustelli. In the bottom of the fifth, Robustelli ripped a single to right field. After second basemen Hilary Puglia laid down a sacrifice bunt to advance Robustelli, senior slugger Brandi Cross, the team's leader in runs batted in, came through with a single to shallow center, scoring the winning the run.

"I just knew I could the ball get out of the infield and Emily can score on just about any hit," said Cross, who was one of five UMass players named to the all-tournament team.

In her final A-10 tournament, Robustelli was named the tourney's Most Outstanding Player. Her impressive stat line was highlighted by a .600 batting average, including a pair of doubles and a home run. The A-10 Player of Year was a factor in all six runs scored by the Minutewomen in the tournament, scoring four herself and driving in two more.

"She was outstanding," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "Emily has been like that all year for us. I can't tell you how big she was. You got have a top part of the order to show up at the regional."

"Winning an Atlantic 10 tournament is always great, but this [championship] was the probably the best," Robustelli said. "It was the toughest we had to go through. It is going to prepare us for regionals. Coming through these tough games is great time for our team."

Holtz, named to the All-Tournament Team, pitched all three toutnes games for the Maroon and White going undefeated with a 0.67 earned run average. She struck out nine Temple batters while giving up only two hits, walking one and allowing just two runners to reach scoring position.

"Kaila got stronger as the game went on," Sortino said. "I thought she pitched very smart and [catcher] Jamie [Cabalan] called a great game. They went at them more [on Friday]. You don't pitch around Temple. If you pitch at Temple, they are going to take those big swings and get them to start swinging from their heels, which you saw late in the game."

"I kept more and more at ease on the mound as we went," Holtz said. "I felt in previous games my nerves got the best and today Jamie and I kept to our game.

"The umpire was also very consistent all game, which is something we haven't seen all tournament. As a result, we could maximize the umpire, their weaknesses, and my strength. It just worked out that way."

In their first meeting of the tourney, the hero of the game was freshman third basemen KJ Kelley, also an All-Tournament Team selection. After Robustelli doubled and Puglia scarified her over to third base, Temple decided to intentionally walk both Holtz and Cross.

Kelley then proceeded to rip the first pitch she saw up the middle to give the Minutewomen the 2-1 win in dramatic fashion.

"KJ is probably a little bit better of a hitter for us right now than anybody else," Sortino said. "I put her up in the top three hitters. She's been stroking the ball with some slams out of the Complex. I have never seen so many far home runs. She had potential to knock it out to the library.

"The thing about KJ when she bats is she's very poised at the plate. She doesn't swing at pitches she can't hit especially early in the count. If you bring it in, she's going to go for it. First pitch, right up the gut."

The defensive play by both teams was impressive, but the catch of the day was made by Temple outfielder Lynsey Grace. With runners on the corners, Cabalan hit a shot that seemed destined to be a home run. Grace, however, got a good jump on the ball, reached up and made the catch, keeping the Minutewomen from busting the game wide open.

"I wasn't surprised, she's a good outfielder," Sortino said. "I expected [Temple's] outfield to come up with big plays. Grace got a great jump on that ball. I think it would have hit the top and at least been good enough for a run. She stayed with it, got the perfect step and stay right on that ball."

One down, three to go

Win sends UM to second round

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

It certainly wasn't the conventional win for the Massachusetts lacrosse team, but it was a win nonetheless.

The Minutemen will move on to the second round of the NCAA Tournament for the second year in a row, this time by way of a 9-8 victory over the Hofstra Pride yesterday at Garber Field. Senior Kevin Leveille led the way for the offense with a hat trick, while the stifling Maroon and White defense allowed Hofstra just 15 shots on net.

Sophomore Bill Schell turned aside nine of those, en route to his 13th victory of the season.

"It was a good victory over a very good Hofstra team, a very young Hofstra team," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "They really improved from the first time we played them. Their coaches did an excellent job preparing their team, keeping us out of transition as much as they could. We're really happy with the win and the way our guys settled down in the third and fourth quarters to come out ahead."

The win was UMass' second over the Pride this season. The Minutemen dropped Hofstra on the road, 14-7, on March 23. It also tied a school-record for the Minutemen, who matched Richard F. Garber's 1981 squad with 13 victories in a season.

UMass	9
Hofstra	6

"I was very proud of our overall effort," Hofstra coach John Danowski said. "To win today we would have had to play pretty close to perfect. UMass is a terrific team, playing at home, I was just proud of our guys and their effort. I thought in the third quarter our inability to clear the ball allowed us to play way too much defense and it gave UMass opportunities to score."

The Minutemen scored three consecutive goals to start the second half, opening up the first multi-goal lead of the game for either squad and sending the Maroon and White to Syracuse for a second round matchup with No. 3 Maryland. Kevin Glenz's goal at 5:33 turned out to be the game winner, as he burned Hofstra midfielder Bryan Walker off the goal line extended and stuffed a shot past netminder Matt Southard (11 saves).

"In the third quarter we settled down, we were a little more patient, we didn't throw the ball away," Cannella said. "The guys are to be commended on that, to be able to recognize how the game is going and how they need to play."

"We had some chances that normally we might try to force, and maybe it's a hit or miss play," senior midfielder Kevin Leveille said. "We played smart today, and we saw when [the fast break] wasn't there, we looked to set it up on offense."

The Pride had a golden opportunity to take the lead at the half, as freshman midfielder John Orsen took a shot from the slot with less than 15 seconds to play. But Schell was up to the task, stopping the laser with his stick and running out the half tied, 4-4.

"John had a great look at the goal," Danowski said. "In the big game, their guy made the play. John is a freshman and hopefully he'll learn from this situation. But that was a good play and players make big plays in big plays. Their guy did and our guy didn't."

"He made a big save right before the half that kept the game tied," Cannella said. "That was a huge play, I thought. If they go up 5-4, it's only one goal, but it's a big momentum play going into the half."

The Massachusetts defense, led by first team Eastern College Athletic Conference player Matt Garcia and second teamer Jack Reid, kept the Hofstra offense at bay most of the day, limiting the top two Pride scorers, Joe Chris Doyle and the Minutemen had reason to celebrate on Sunday. UMass held off Hofstra 9-6 to advance to the second round of the 2003 NCAA Men's Lacrosse Tournament.

Explosion in third does job

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

It took some time, and three big goals that sent the previously stagnant momentum into the UMass end, but the Minutemen pulled off their first round victory, thanks mostly to the work of Messrs. Kevin Leveille, Kevin Glenz, and Jeff Zywicki.

The third quarter was, by far, the best one the Minutemen played yesterday, and while they managed to score two goals in the fourth, it was the way they came out of the blocks after halftime that gave them the victory.

Prior to that, the offense that had been averaging nearly 13 goals a game struggled to score four in an uninspired first half.

Whatever the team talked about at halftime worked, though, because the Maroon and White came out with controlled, aggressive offense, and set the tone for the rest of the game with Kevin Leveille's tally at 5:08 in the third.

It was the start of five minutes of play that were all UMass, and the Hofstra team that only trailed for 2:48 in the entire first half suddenly went quiet.

Less than two minutes after Leveille's goal, Jeff Zywicki provided one of the prettiest plays of the day, though UMass coach Greg Cannella still chalked it up as a "garbage goal."

Zywicki pounced on an errant rebound 10 feet from the net, and in one motion picked the ball up, and put it high over goalie Matt Southard to make the score 6-4.

As well as the 2,031 in attendance, Hofstra coach John Danowski took notice of Zywicki's work.

"It's a big play certainly," Danowski said. "I thought that we just didn't match up in the crease and [UMass] made a good play. I thought they made a couple of real slick plays inside that good teams make."

The Minutemen took Zywicki's fireworks in stride, though.

"Jeff is very good at that," Cannella said. "It's one thing that he's been able to do, he's got such quick hands. We talked about this week that we thought Southard would give us a couple rebounds, that we had to follow shots.

"Jeff has been in tune with that all year and been able to put some of those away, so anytime you get a goal off a save, it's huge."

Then came the game winner. Kevin Glenz's quick feet got him past a defender and close enough to cram the ball in past Southard. It was the third of a series of goals that produced a lead of more than one goal for the first time all game.

Until that point, the UMass faithful, and the Minutemen themselves, were becoming increasingly tense as the Pride continued to control the game.

"I think we play a lot better when we have a lead," Zywicki said. "When we had that three-goal lead there, we started playing more comfortable, we made them play our game. That just plays in our hands. I think we definitely play better with a lead."

Zywicki's teammates agreed.

We feed off each other, we feed off when we play well," Leveille said. "It took us a couple minutes to get going there in the third, but once we got one, I said to Jeff and he said to me, let's get one, and open this game up, and we got a couple more, and that helped a lot."

What the trio of goals did was provide the Maroon and White with enough space to play the game that got it here, and the game that is taking it to Syracuse, N.Y. for Saturday's quarterfinal matchup against Maryland.

And while UMass had time to make up for the lackluster first half by finally bringing out its high-flying attack in the third quarter, it's a luxury the Minutemen may not be able to afford against the Terrapins.

Truck explodes in Northern Chechnya

By Yuri Bagrov
Associated Press

VLADIKAVKAZ, Russia (AP) – Suicide bombers exploded a truck laden with explosives at a government compound in northern Chechnya on Monday, reducing eight buildings to rubble and killing at least 41 people.

Russian President Vladimir Putin said the attack was aimed at derailing a resolution of the 3 1/2-year-old war.

Three suicide-bombers, including one woman, carried out the attack in the town of Znamenskoye, Russian Deputy Prosecutor General Sergei Fridinsky told the ITAR-Tass news agency.

The explosion, which had the force of at least 1.3 tons of TNT, wounded more than 110 people, 57 of them critically, said Maj.-Gen. Ruslan Avtayev. Nearly all the dead were civilians, including six children under the age of 12.

No one claimed responsibility, but officials immediately blamed Chechen rebels.

"All such actions are aimed at one thing: stopping the process of the settlement of the situation in Chechnya, the process of political settlement," Putin told Cabinet members in televised comments. "We cannot and will not allow anything of the kind."

Chechen voters in March overwhelmingly approved a Kremlin-promoted constitution that cements the region's status as part of Russia.

Moscow, which has refused to negotiate with rebel leaders, has called the referendum a key step on the road to peace and said it proves the situation in Chechnya is stabilizing.

But Monday's blast underlined the violence that continues to roil Chechnya. In December, a truck bomb killed at least 70 people at the headquarters of the Moscow-backed Chechen administration in the capital, Grozny.

Monday's blast destroyed a regional government administration building and damaged the two-story office of the Federal Security Service, the intelligence agency leading Russia's campaign in Chechnya.

Most victims were government employees who had just returned to work after May holidays and residents settling government-related business, emergency officials said.

Northern Chechnya has been considered the most stable district. It was the first area to come under the control of Russian forces that entered the republic in 1999, starting the second war in a decade.

The blast left a crater 16 feet deep and 33 feet wide.

Federal Security Service chief Nikolai Patrushev, speaking on state-run television, said a truck carrying explosives blew up after it was halted at a security barrier about 30 yards from a concrete wall that protects the government buildings.

However, the police chief in the district, Usman Tunguzbiyev, said the truck crashed through the barrier and soldiers standing guard opened fire.

Russian television broadcast footage of piles of rubble where buildings once stood and gutted shells of others. One building had its walls blown off to reveal the furniture inside.

An unidentified woman, whose sister and four nephews are missing, cries as she stands near what is left of the two-story building completely destroyed by a bomb blast, in the Chechen town of Znamenskoye yesterday. A truck bomb ripped through a government compound in northern Chechnya on Monday, killing at least 30 people and wounding more than 100 others, officials said.

Distinguished teaching awards ceremony to be held Wednesday

By David Grant
Collegian Staff

The top educators, researchers and advisors at the University of Massachusetts Amherst will be honored at the Annual Awards Banquet May 14 in the Campus Center. The Office of the Vice Chancellor for Research is sponsoring the event.

The Distinguished Teaching Awards, Conti Fellowships and Outstanding Academic Advisor Awards will be presented to those individuals selected for the 2002/2003 academic year.

Recipients of the Distinguished Teaching Awards are Sport Management Professor Glenn M. Wong, History Professor Carlin A. Barton and Ray J. Pfeiffer, Jr., associate professor of Accounting and Information Systems.

Wong, who just last year received the Distinguished Faculty Member award from the Alumni Association, said he is grateful and enjoys the teaching aspects of his faculty responsibilities.

"I am pleased and honored to receive this prestigious award," Wong said. "I appreciate the support of students in my classes, former students and the DTA awards committee."

Two teaching assistants, Viveca S. Greene of Communications, and Cathy I. Schlund-Vials of Commonwealth College, will also receive DTA awards.

Schlund, who has been at UMass for five years, said she is overwhelmed by the scope of the award and commends her students for making it possible.

"It is the highest recognition of teaching because it comes directly from the students, and I must say it is because of the students that I have had an incredible time in the classroom," Schlund said.

The Distinguished Teaching Awards, established in 1962, are considered the most prestigious prize on campus for classroom instruction. A committee made up of faculty, undergraduates, and previous graduate student winners receive nominations for the awards from current and former students. The committee then selects individuals to be honored with the award.

Faculty members will receive a plaque and a monetary award of $3000, while $2000 is distributed to teaching assistants. In addition, recipients of the DTA will have their name inscribed on plaques displayed in the campus center and will receive recognition at undergraduate commencement.

Other awards to be presented are for Outstanding Academic Advisors of the year. David Lenson, a professor of Comparative Literature and Susan P. Machala of Pre-Major Advising Services will be honored and will receive plaques and cash awards of $3000.

Machala credits her "Philosophy of Advising" concept for being selected to receive the prominent award. She said the challenge of helping a diverse student body succeed is by placing herself in their shoes and asking, "What would I want to know if I were this person?"

She said part of that philosophy is to probe deeply and listen carefully to each student's unique academic goals.

"The ultimate mark of a truly caring and talented academic advisor, that which sets the best advisors apart from the rest, is an intuitive ability to teach students how to assume responsibility for their education and take the next steps on their own," Machala said.

The Samuel Conti Fellowships are being presented to Joseph Donahue, professor of English, associate professor of Chemistry, Vincent M. Rotello and Daniel H. Schaubert, professor of Electrical and Computer Engineering.

The award serves to honor those individuals who demonstrate outstanding accomplishment and potential for continued excellence in research and scholarly or creative activity. Besides a $3000 cash award, those selected receive one year's leave of absence to concentrate on activities related to graduate education, research, creative work and scholarly attainment.

Pair of key Iraqi officials captured

By Pauline Jelinek
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – U.S.-led forces have captured two more important Iraqis - the scientist known as "Dr. Germ" and a top leader in Saddam Hussein's armed forces.

Dr. Rihab Rashid Taha, a scientist who helped Iraq make weapons out of anthrax, surrendered over the weekend, said Maj. Brad Lowell of the U.S. Central Command in Tampa, Fla.

Also in custody Monday was Ibrahim Ahmad Abd al Sattar Muhanimad, armed forces chief of staff since 1999, Pentagon officials said without giving details of his capture.

He was No. 11 on a list issued last month of the 55 most wanted former members of Saddam's government, the jack of spades in a card deck issued to troops.

The two could know much about any unconventional weapons the government had, but it was far from certain what kind of information they would divulge to American interrogators. Other former senior leaders have largely denied under questioning that the country had programs for biological, nuclear or chemical weapons - the Bush administration rationale for waging the war.

Nearly two dozen of the top 55 are in custody, officials said.

U.N. weapons inspectors nicknamed Taha "Dr. Germ" because she ran the Iraqi biological weapons facility where scientists worked with anthrax, botulinum toxin and aflatoxin. A microbiologist, Taha holds a doctorate from the University of East Anglia in Britain.

U.N. inspectors who searched Iraq for weapons of mass destruction in the 1990s paid Taha the dubious honor of making her one of the few Iraqis singled out by name in their final report. They said Taha's 1985 transfer from Baghdad University to an anthrax research site at the government's Al-Muthanna complex was linked to a resurgence of Iraq's research into biological weapons.

Taha is not on the list of the 55 most wanted, but among 200 Iraqis that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has said are sought but who he did not publicly identify.

In a February interview with the British Broadcasting Corp., Taha said she "played a major role in Iraq's biological weapons program in the 1980s and 90s, but it was only for self-defense and not for use."

American forces had been trying to capture her and last month raided her Baghdad home, carrying away boxes of documents but not finding her or her husband.

Taha is married to Amer Rashid, who held top posts in Saddam's missile programs and was oil minister before the war. Rashid surrendered to U.S. forces April 28, 12 days after that Baghdad raid, and Taha had been negotiating her surrender over an undisclosed period, officials said Monday.

Rashid is the six of spades in the deck of cards. The couple married in 1994 and has a young daughter.

Current and former inspectors who interviewed Taha in the mid-1990s described her as difficult and dour, and press reports said she once broke a chair in anger during U.N. questioning.

The Iraqis presented her as the head of the biological program, but inspectors suspected she may have been fronting for someone more senior.

Officials have captured a number of other former officials who they had hoped would give information on the unconventional weapons programs. Last week they reported the capture of Huda Salih Mahdi Ammash, along with Taha one of the rare women among Saddam's circle. Ammash was among the 55 most wanted and a woman officials believe played a key role in rebuild-

12:55 a.m. A caller reported that there were fireworks going off in the Northeast Quad. The responding officer couldn't find anything.

1:17 a.m. A caller reported an intoxicated person getting into a vehicle and going down Clark Hill Road. The responding officer stated the area checked out negative.

4:48 a.m. An RD in Field Hall called to report that there was somebody knocking on the window next to the front door. The responding officer stated that the person was trying to get into the wrong building.

8:58 a.m. Detectives drove out to Sudbury to speak with the victim of an alleged assault that was reported the night before.

9:41 a.m. A caller was concerned about the puddles outside the W.E.B. DuBois Library from an ongoing serious water leak. The Physical Plant advised the caller that the area was not contaminated.

11:11 a.m. A caller reported someone had broken into his vehicle in Lot 29 on Clark Hill Rd. The trunk had been opened, the window was broken and the inside of the vehicle was "trashed."

1:07 p.m. A caller reported someone removing speakers from a vehicle in Lot 32 W on Massachusetts Avenue.

3:11 p.m. A caller reported a person with a possible broken leg in the Southwest Circle. The subject was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

4:08 p.m. A caller reported her C.D. player and cell phone were taken from her unlocked vehicle in Lot 13 on Olympia Drive.

Bring your professor or TA to dinner at the Dining Commons!

Now that the spring semester is almost over, you may want to show your appreciation to your professors or TAs by taking them to the Dining Commons for a meal. The DC will be the best place since we will pick-up the tab.

Here's how it works:

During the week of May 12-16, 2003, any student on the meal plan can bring one professor or TA per day to any DC for any meal on us. All you need to do is to have the professor or TA sign-in at the cashier's station and be accompanied by a student on the meal plan. Limited to one meal per day.

ing Baghdad's biological weapons capability in the 1990s.

Although the U.S.-led military coalition that defeated Saddam's army in April has mounted an extensive search for the suspected unconventional weapons, no weapons stockpile has been found.

Chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix said last month that Taha and her husband would be among "the most interesting persons" for the Americans to question. Blix's teams pulled out of Iraq shortly before the war began after 3 1/2 months work.

In the February interview with BBC, Taha said she was involved in producing Iraq's final weapons declaration to the United Nations. She said Saddam's government was telling the truth when it said it no longer had any chemical or biological weapons.

Taha told the BBC her country never planned to use the biological agents it produced in the 1980s and early 1990s.

"We never wanted to cause harm or damage to anybody," she said. "Iraq has been threatened by different enemies and we are in an area that suffers from regional conflict. I think it is our right to have something to defend ourselves and to have something as a deterrent."

Honda Element marketing group wraps up work

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Isenberg School of Management's Promotional Strategy class will be making their final presentation of the semester to members of the Honda Corporation this Friday. They will be showing their marketing work from throughout the semester, which includes their "Brave the Elements in your Element" event on the campus pond a few weeks ago.

The marketing class has spent the entire semester marketing Honda's new outdoor-style automobile "Element," which is not to be confused with a sports utility vehicle, according to Stephanie O'Shea, a student who is helping run the promotion.

"It's not an S.U.V.," O'Shea said. "There really isn't a name for what type of car it is, but it's not an S.U.V." She went on to point out that the Element has better gas mileage than S.U.V.'s. The Element receives 21 to 26 miles per gallon depending on the type of model, compared to that of a typical S.U.V. that receives 13 miles per gallon.

The SOM class, also known as "Wicked Good Marketing," has been marketing the Element all semester around campus as part of the Honda Element College Program. The program consists of college marketing classes promoting the Honda Element on their respective campuses. The 29 different groups compete against each other in hopes of winning one of the top three places in the contest, which will win them a trip to California to present their efforts to Honda executives. The winners of that final presentation will receive $5,000 for their school.

The group's main promotional event was the "Brave the Elements" event at the campus pond on April 24th, which was a huge success. The event featured skydivers, a bouncehouse, free food and activities, which included shooting basketballs through an Element sunroof and a race against time to load the vehicle with outdoor camping equipment.

The group also conducted other marketing activities besides the campus pond event. Much of their work consisted of research and conducting surveys of UMass students about the popularity of the Element and the effectiveness of Wicked Good Marketing's campaign, including the campus pond event.

The marketing class was divided into five distinct groups for this project: research, public relations, creativity, events, and media. The group that was responsible for gathering information such as popularity statistics of the Element from before and after the Campus Pond event was the research group. The group conducted various surveys to compile their information. The public relations group was responsible for making media contacts and publicizing the event. The group that was mostly responsible for creating ideas for the campaign was the "creative" group, whose job consisted of coming up with event ideas, advertisements, and themes of the campaign. "Events" planned and coordinated the "Brave the Elements" event, which included setting up the stations around the different vehicles at the promotion. The last group was the media group, which was in charge of finding ways to advertise their cause. They were responsible for bringing the radio station "Laser 99.5 FM" to the campus pond last month.

The final UMass presentation by Wicked Good Marketing will take place this Friday at SOM. In their presentation the group plans to wrap up the semester by reviewing all the work and effort they put into this campaign for the past three and a half months.

SENIOR FAREWELLS

Spanning the years

Jesse Greenspan

Getting lied to is never a good experience, but as a journalist I suppose I should be getting used to it by now.

When I first came down to The Collegian almost four years ago, I started off covering sports, which kept me in a world of naïvete. Coaches and players on the ski and field hockey teams generally tell you the truth, and writing a sports story is a fairly simple process. You watch the game, you ask the coach a few questions, you ask the players a few questions and then you write the story. In depth sports reporting certainly exists, but it is not something seen too often, especially at The Collegian. At most, I would have coaches refuse to talk to me, like I was somehow responsible for their team's lack of skill, but even that was a very rare occurrence.

My first real taste of what it's like to be manipulated as a journalist came last semester on domestic exchange at the University of Arizona, when I wrote for the Daily Wildcat. As a newswriter, I got to cover a lot of interesting topics there, such as violence on campus and budget cuts (yes, Arizona is suffering budget cuts too).

One of my articles was on the medical technology program, which was in serious danger of being cut. I talked to a bunch of people who worked in the department, all of whom were about to lose their jobs if the program went under. They told me they were not to accept any new majors, and that the paperwork had already been submitted to cut the program.

However, when I talked to the person responsible for the cuts, he said that nothing was definite, and that he had not submitted the paperwork to close the department. Obviously, someone was lying to me, or at the very least, there was some serious miscommunication going on. Because I never did find out who was telling the truth, I was forced to put both sides of the story into my article.

A few weeks later, I went down to Residence Life at the University of Arizona to talk to the people there about the recycling program. They were upset because a previous article had said the recycling program was being cut, and they were adamant that this was not the case. The only difference, they said, was that Facilities Management and not Residence Life would now be responsible for bringing the cans and bottles to the local recycling centers. I questioned them for a while, and they continued to assure me that everything was running smoothly.

At first I believed them. But they never answered my questions about how much was being recycled, and they skirted over the issue of who was currently picking up the cans and bottles. I eventually found out that recyclable material was even building up outside some of the dorms, and that student volunteers were the only ones doing anything to get the cans and bottles out of there. The school itself had done nothing, and had not helped recycle a single can over the entire school year, despite the fact there was an administrator at the school with the title "Recycling Coordinator."

The Director of Residence Life, Jim Van Arsdel, one of the top administrators at the school, had basically lied to my face. And when I was calling around to try and find out the truth, he had instructed the people under him not to talk to me. Finally, I got the Recycling Coordinator to admit that no recycling had been done and that there were only plans to recycle in five of the 17 Arizona dorms. Basically, the recycling program had not been completely cut, but it now depended entirely on student volunteers. As a result of this, almost nothing was being done.

After this experience, I began to realize that nearly every interview I did was manipulative in some way. People were trying to drive home their point to me (such as a DEA agent who lectured me for an hour on why drugs are bad when I was writing an article on medical marijuana), and I was trying to get them to say things they probably didn't want to say.

Just a few weeks ago, I interviewed Republican Club President Christopher Carlozzi on the anti-war movement and what he was doing in response. According to Carlozzi, around 70 percent of the UMass campus supported the war in Iraq, and that it was a small but vocal activist community that was making the number of anti-war students seem like more. He also said that the two rallies the Republican Club held in support of the troops drew 150 and 200 people, respectively.

What he was saying to me seemed completely false, so I decided to take the rash step of actually checking the numbers myself. According to The Collegian, 75 people attended the second support-the-troops rally, and the first one did not even make the paper. Meanwhile, an anti-war rally in the pouring rain on March 5 drew 2,600 people, or roughly 35 times more people than came to the largest of the support-the-troops rallies. I think it is safe to say that a majority of students at UMass did not support the war.

I don't know why he said those things to me when he should have known I was going to look them up, but the truth of the matter is, I was manipulating him as well. For the interview, I stood beside 100 anti-abortion white crosses (which is not the most comfortable feeling if you're Jewish), and if he happened to spew any hate-filled Republican jargon, then my story was only going to get better.

It has taken me awhile, but I have finally learned my lesson - journalism can often be a game of people manipulating each other to try and get their points across, and both interviewee and interviewer will sometimes lie to accomplish their goals.

Lying is not really my thing, so I think I'll pass on doing it in the future. But if I am going to try this whole journalism profession after college, then I am going to have to get used to a large level of dishonesty. I'm sure people will get away with lying to me at least some of the time, but don't think that I'm not at least going to check into it.

A farewell to the place and the people

Ruth Sund

The time has come to say goodbye to my unique experience at UMass. It is sad I guess, but I can't help but feel a sense of complete and utter excitement that my journey has finally ended. It has only been three years since I came to UMass but that has been enough. No more walking from the yellow lot, financial aid conflicts, parking tickets, expensive books and art supplies, tuition increases and the many more pains of the UMass experience. I transferred as a junior and still ended up being a fifth year senior. I guess it doesn't matter if you start from the beginning or mid-way, UMass somehow traps you for longer than what you signed on for.

My UMass experience has been more about the people than the school itself. Meeting students at UMass was my main concern. As a commuting student, it takes me 50 minutes to get to campus every day. Supporting myself and paying for school required that I hold a job twenty-four hours a week or more, on top of a full course load; socializing on campus was almost impossible. I spent my time going to class and leaving as soon as I was done. After the first semester I realized that developing relationships with fellow students was not going to be that difficult. I depended on my classes to meet people, which worked very well in the long run.

Morgan Taylor, who graduated last year, was in several of my classes. Advanced drawing, graphic design II and logistics were more fun because of her. We learned that neighbors don't make good nude models in a drawing class! Lesson No. 1: don't work as a model at the school that you attend! Morgan was the first person that I developed a friendship with at UMass and I am thankful for that.

As a CPD student my experiences will be unforgettable. Completing the BFA thesis required long nights, frequent problems, a lot of money and that damn paper! It is a wonder how people live through it all! N'Yop with Rob Ryan and Leah was the greatest class to have for my last semester. From crazy drunken ladies on the subway, to unpleasant flashers, the experience has been unique. From O'Lummey's and the good looking bartenders, to Marilyn Monroe hotels, to John Mayer on the escalator, and the Marriott mission. It was all a great way to spend our last semester.

Old friends made UMass even better. Jessica Walsh was the only student from my hometown. We would meet up on campus for lunch for the first year at least twice a week. She helped me keep my sanity and made the year more fun. As one of my best friends, we have shared many memories such as bad boyfriends, the my hair-cut" Hillyard, the greatest graphics staff EVER! I will miss all of them terribly! They are a very talented group and they will go far in life. Mike Kulak, who is my most favorite boss ever, can always count on me for Wolfies, except on Sundays. I have learned a lot from Mike and I admire his hardworking ethics and appreciate the time he has put in for the newspaper. He will be a legend. The King of Graphics, The Collegian will never be the same without him. I have enjoyed working with everyone at The Collegian; advertising, the news staff and last but not least the Executive Board members. Good luck to everyone who is graduating as well as those who are sticking around.

The people who made my college experience the most enjoyable were my roommates, Liz, Corey, Bill I guess and my boyfriend Toni. The house in Turners Falls was the best experience of my life and I am sad that it is over. Toga parties, Halloween, New Years and Fourth of July's will never be the same. I will miss the cold and unbearable winters, Oscar the cat, shoveling snow, telemarketers calling for George, men on the porch, the puppet dance, Taylor's Tavern late nights, pancake breakfasts with D&D and so much more. The house in Turners was my "dorm-life" experience and I wouldn't trade it for the world. Tom and Liz are two of my biggest supporters and my very best friends and I thank them for that. I love them both, in different ways of course.

Well, I am twenty-five years old and I have finally completed my requirements for a Bachelor's degree in Fine Arts. Who knows where I will go from here. This will be the end of one chapter in my life but I will refer back to it often. Time is funny. It seems like when you are involved in something like school, it takes forever to get through it but when it is finished it seems like it went by like a flash of light. I feel as though I took advantage of my time as a college student and I have no regrets. My only regret is having wished at one point that it would all pass by quickly.

'Let's toast the night away to friends'

Mike Kulak

"Today is the first day of your life, the first day that you're on your own." - New Found Glory

Graduation is fast approaching, and the real world is looming up ahead. While I'm terrified, I also can't wait. Ever since sophomore year, I've lived in the same place – the Campus Center Basement. It seems like it's been forever and it seems like no time has passed at all. I've poured my blood, sweat and tears into The Collegian for three years. I've played in various bands, been drunk in public, and learned so much (though not necessarily from my classes). I loved college, and The Collegian, but I'm ready to go. I'm terrified about going off into the real world, but I cant wait. I will miss one thing dearly, though – all of my friends.

Melissa – How can I put our friendship into words? You are one of the most important people in my life – my best friend. You know me better than anyone. You make a bad day good, and a good day better. You're going to make a great lawyer, but you already are a wonderful person and an amazing friend. "10 Things," "Buffy," movies, nachos, hot chocolate, Dunkin Donuts, times spent discussing life. "Friends don't let friends drive with Kulak," but you keep getting into the car. You made college great. You are the Grace to my Will.

Jay – You've been one of my best friends for four years. I can't imagine how my life would have gone if we had not become friends and roommates. If it weren't for you, I wouldn't be the me that I am – well, you know what I mean. Band parties, laundry nights, "It's the same hash!" I owe you so much. I hope some day I get to pay it back.

Mark – You're not here, and you can't read this, but you made freshman year. I don't know where you are, or when you're coming back, but I support you wherever you are. We'll always have extreme sledding, the Vermont trip, HydroThunder and Super Smash Brothers. It's always 1:20. If it weren't for you, Southwest would have sucked. Fight the good fight, and come back safe. I love you like a brother.

Bokhman, Fitzie, Brad, Ethan and Liv – You guys aren't here, but you've always supported me, always been there for me. It means more to me than you can possibly know. You guys are my family.

Jen – What can I say? You are the nicest person I know. You've been a great roommate, and a great friend. You're going to go farther in life than anyone I know. You motivate me to do it right, no matter how long it takes. You'll make a great HC. I'm so proud of you.

Lizzy – Between almost killing you in my car, and going hogging, you've made college so much fun. We'll always have the screaming baseball and rides home. "There's a hornet in my lap! It's in my lap! Get it out!" Thanks for pulling over the car. In the end, we can always go to Charlie's. Club Fuel was the best.

Jamie – Who knew that I could become friends with someone so fast in one year? We had more fun, but mainly because our seat belt wasn't broken. Yay footprints in the snow! Somewhere between procrastinating and Dunkin Donuts, is us.

The Hairspray Crew of Grayson 5 – You know who you are. We melt walls with the best of them!

Dawn – Hanging out with you is one of the reasons I loved Orchard Hill. I loved "Titus," "That 70's Show," M&M's and punk music. Watch out for the, "thunk," ground!

Jolene – Tuesday night movies, Friendly's and, well, a great friendship. Go frolic in a rappatch and calm yourself! Six flags on Halloween!

Ruth – You made this year bearable, thank you so much. You are going to be a great photographer. I can't wait to own a "Ruth E. Sund Original." We should go to Wolfies sometime.

Helen – You are perpetually pink. We are the "Collegian Punks." New Found Glory was the best. You always update me on "Buffy" and "Angel." I'm really glad we're friends, and I'll visit you in Cali. Your movie will have a happy ending.

Adam Southwick – One liter of vodka, catch on the hill and a game of pool. "Come on, man."

Adam Sklar – Movies, movies, movies and more movies. 17th floor represent! Freshman trombones. Reel Big Fish and sophomore year drunkenness! Paper airplane wars rule!

Leigh Anne – Here's to every inside joke we ever had. Thank you for putting up with me. I'll see you at the beach.

Scott – You really should be a guitarist. Screw all your other aspirations. Though I expect you could be a professional lighter hacker.

Kat – We can't have fun without mud. Playgrounds in the snow are fun and Scooby Doo rocks! I'm glad we became friends. No worries, I'll roll down the screen.

Marty – You are the glue of The Collegian. Without you, we're nothing. Thank you.

Everybody who I've worked with at The Collegian, past and present – It was a pleasure, you all rock. I love you all.

Graphics – To all my staffers and co-workers. Half the fun of graphics was you guys. It was a pleasure to work with you. You all kick aSS!

All my other friends – I couldn't mention everyone, but you are all great. You've all touched my heart in so many ways. I will never forget you guys. The times we've had, and the moments we've shared. Thanks.

UMMB – I will never regret joining the band. It was one of the best times of my life. The friendships I made and the experiences I had will be a part of me forever. It was worth it.

I don't regret quitting the band either – it opened a whole new door to me – The Collegian. I owe so much to this place, more than anyone can know, and for that, I am eternally grateful. The Collegian and I have a love hate relationship. I hate loving it. I will always treasure my time here. Thank you: to The Collegian, but more importantly, to my friends.

Mike Kulak was the Production Manager of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, but he will soon be living in a cardboard box outside his friends' apartment in Boston.

SENIOR FAREWELLS

The top 10 things I learned at UMass

Helen Eggleston

With Graduation swiftly approaching and my days at UMass winding to an end, I started to think back on what I have learned during my four years here at UMass. What I came up with was considerably less than my parents would have hoped but amusing nonetheless. Here are the top ten things I came up with:

10. The college food groups are: Frozen, Ramen, Instant and Delivery.

The foods I always kept in stock were Ramen, Easy-Mac and frozen pizza. When I got sick of those things I would order something. The only exceptions were the times I wanted to get creative with my cooking skills and see what new concoction I could create with a microwave, toaster oven, and George Forman Grill. You'd be surprised to see what I came up with.

9. Don't provoke the UMass swans.

Swans are scary. They will attack you if you're not careful. A swan attacked me when I wasn't expecting it my freshman year. The damn thing was running at me with its wings spread and it was hissing. I think I actually saw my life flash before my eyes. I made a narrow escape and have avoided the pond ever since.

8. Nine times out of ten, it is not necessary to buy the books required for a class.

I have taken and passed many a class without ever opening the book I spent a small fortune on at the beginning of the semester. If a class has optional or recommended books, then those are completely unnecessary. Unfortunately there is that one class that has a book that is needed. I am sorry to say that my only advice here would be to make a friend who bought the book and then steal it away from them.

7. At college, flip-flops are worn morning, noon and night, indoors and out, as well as every season of the year.

I originally thought that flip-flops were intended for summer only and maybe for public showers, but since I arrived at UMass I have noticed a huge percentage of students who wear flip flops 24/7. I missed the memo that made flip-flops the footwear of choice. They are worn as slippers and shower shoes. Girls even wear flip-flops in the spring with dresses. I notice people wearing them in the winter outside to class. I'm not sure when or why the flip-flop craze started but I do know that it does not seem to be letting up.

6. No matter how late in the day your first class is, you are always going to have trouble getting up in time for it.

College students require more sleep than the rest of the population. UMass students not only regularly miss class because of oversleeping but they also take naps when they get home from the classes they make it to. Every time I get home from class or work my roommate is asleep. I honestly think I see her asleep more often than I see her awake. At first I thought this was strange but after asking around I learned that this is common among most students. Who knew?

5. A party without Beirut is no party at all.

No one has them because no one would go. Nuff said.

4. Instant Messenger has replaced the telephone.

If someone I want to talk to is not online I just assume they are busy or not around. Away messages are planned and thought out. Students are constantly trying to come up with a clever way of saying, "sorry I'm not here." I talk to everyone on IM, my parents, my friends, my sister, even my roommates when we're in the same room. IM is free and telephones are not. I'm a cheap bastard and I love to cheat the system.

3. Having enough underwear and socks can save you big money on laundry.

I would recommend having 30 pairs of each underwear and socks. Those are the two items I always seem to run out of. It seems that my mother needs me to come home about once a month for some reason or another, so with 30 pairs or socks and underwear, I can just save my laundry till I get home and then it's free!

2. Chanting "Yankees Suck" will always get a crowd excited.

It doesn't matter what the occasion, UMass students always enjoy putting down the Yankees. Then, of course the Yankees fans get upset and a riot will break out. Riots are a very common thing here at UMass.

And the number one thing...

1. UMass is not consistent in anything except screwing its students.

Walk through campus. The buildings don't match each other. The tuition cost is constantly changing. The courses that are offered change each semester, but one thing is for sure; every student will have a problem that is directly related to the backward-ass way things are handled down at Whitmore.

With all this said there is more serious things I learned here at UMass, and the main one is friendship. I am going to miss all the wonderful people I have met here. I'd like to take this time to say goodbye to all my friends. (You know who you are.) I'm going to miss my pals at the Collegian, the great girls on the Stage Crew Dance Team, my awesome roommates, Lindsay and Meredith, and also my sister, Molly, who I have gotten to know as a close friend and not just a kid sister. I hope that when she's done at UMass she comes up with a top ten list that puts mine to shame.

A celebration of a life

I am given an opportunity as a senior Collegian employee to write a "senior column." I wanted to take this time to celebrate my friend Todd Schwartz's life and his dedication to The Jimmy Fund and The Dana-Farber Cancer Institute. He was a student at UMass and a great friend to many of you who are reading this. The following is not something that I wrote, but I thought it gives a perfect perspective into how Todd lived his life. The following in an excerpt from a letter written to Todd's friends and family by the TJs Planning Committee:

"To say that November 19, 2002, was a sad day in the world would be an understatement. Todd Schwartz passed away, after a two-year bout with cancer, at the young age of 19 with his whole life ahead of him. Todd was never one to sit on the sidelines and we will all wonder, for the rest of our lives, what amazing things Todd would have done in the world had he only been given the fair chance to live his life for many years more. Todd lived his life to its fullest and never allowed his cancer to get in the way of a positive attitude, desire to help others fight this horrible disease, and remain the funniest, kindest, and greatest friend any of us could ever hope to have. To his family, Todd was a super hero. His family watched Todd's daily hurdles become mere bumps in the road thanks to that special way Todd had of reminding everyone that no matter how bad, things could always be worse. To his friends, Todd was still the life of the party and no amount of chemotherapy or discomfort could stop him from spending quality time with his friends in order to keep them upbeat and unafraid to join him on his difficult journey. To his doctors, Todd was, and will forever be, the reason they continue to do research and try new medications in order to help children live cancer-free lives. And to himself, Todd was unstoppable, a force to be reckoned with, and a kid who just wanted to be a kid.

Now that we have all seen the astounding way in which a teenager can take on this horrible disease and still live life to its fullest every single day, it is now our turn to show Todd that we learned the lessons he taught us. He taught us to treat others as we want to be treated, to recognize that everyone in the world needs a good friend in their corner no matter the circumstances, and to do whatever it is we can do to take cancer out of the lives of children.

The Jimmy Fund taught Todd, in the two years he battled cancer, that he could be an advocate for younger children who were not yet old enough to tell the world about their daily struggles with cancer or the need to become involved in the fight. By working with the Jimmy Fund, Todd was able to honor the staff of the Dana-Farber Clinic and simultaneously help the Jimmy Fund fight cancer one day at a time by bringing his message of hope to all who would listen."

I wanted to give the UMass community the opportunity to help continue Todd's efforts by supporting the organizations which are dedicated to fighting cancer and improving the lives of those who are currently living with cancer. Just remember every little bit helps...if everyone reading this article donated just $5 we would have raised approximately $100,000! Get the picture?

Please visit Todd's web site at www.fortodd.org to see information about making donations in Todd's name. There are links to donation pages for the Jimmy Fund, Dana Farber, and even information on receiving a special Red Sox license plate in which the proceeds are donated to the Jimmy Fund. You can also make a donation by mail to:

The best four years so far

It seems just like yesterday when I stayed in Lewis for freshman orientation. I felt excited to start my new college life, and now in the blink of an eye it's over. The four years of high school seemed to take forever, and the four years here at college have flown by.

UMass has had its ups and downs for me over the course of the four years, but I believe that I can say I have had a well-rounded college career.

Freshman year I came a week early for marching band camp (which is nothing like "American Pie"), and had no idea what I was in for. Practicing from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. every day for five or six days straight gave me the worst sunburn I had ever experienced. Many people opted to quit then and there, but I decided to stick with it and see what experiences it had to offer. Since I like to travel, I had a feeling the band would take me to places and events I would never experience if I hadn't remained. Although throughout my four years in band there were many things to complain about, I know I will always remember the significant events and performances with the band. The people in the band were great, especially the fun trumpet section on bus seven. Throughout my band years I have made some great friends along the way. My time in the "Power and Class" (when I didn't have a Mon./Wed. or Tues./Thurs. class) will be something that I will always remember.

I can also say that freshman year gave me a taste of fraternity life as well. I guess you could say I was sort of "sucked into it." I knew seven of the brothers from one of the frats, so I decided to rush, and discovered they were all a nice bunch of guys. Before I knew it I was pledging the frat. With my grades plummeting and not having time for anything else, I determined that fraternity life just wasn't for me so I had to quit.

Southwest has treated me well, from Comm TAP on 17 to my single now; it has been an enjoyable four years. I have seen the best Red Sox – Yankee riots (where we all know that no matter how well the Yankees do, they will ALWAYS suck!) to the Mardi Gras atmosphere after the Patriots won the Superbowl.

I have been lucky to get in classes with great professors, and have had the unfortunate mistakes of choosing a class with a boring professor. The crossword puzzles in the paper relieved my boredom from those classes, and sometimes just surrendering myself to the overwhelming urge to nap.

I have developed a shelf load of books from most of my classes, and some I have yet to read. I figure I may as well keep them so that someday I'll get around to reading them. If I don't read them, at the very least I can keep them like doctors do to make me look smarter.

This year I started working at The Collegian doing graphics. The Collegian staff and crew are a dedicated bunch of people who work to get the students their paper every day. I definitely have to give credit to those staff members who stay up all night to make sure the paper gets out on time, on top of doing their homework and other commitments.

My fellow UMass students have made me proud by fighting to keep this university a world-class university. I urge them to keep it up anyway they can. For instance, the other day I received one of those e-mails from the provost discussing the search for a vice-chancellor. This angered me because while we can't hire new professors and claim there isn't enough money, the upper administration is looking to hire a vice chancellor. Does this make any sense to you? I responded to the provost, whoever that person is, and asked them this question along with what responsibilities the vice-chancellor will have that the chancellor can't do. I have yet to receive a response back from whoever the provost is, I guess they are busy doing whatever provosts do.

College is supposed to be the best four years of your life. UMass has succeeded in giving me the best four years of my life so far. I have matured and developed new relationships during my college career. Now like most seniors, I am frustratingly trying to find a job, while trying desperately to prolong the "real world." What will the next four years have in store for me? I wish I could tell you, but until then, I'll see you around.

It seems so strange to me to be writing a farewell column. In part because I have already left, and am writing this column from Florida, and in part because I have mentally written this column a million times before. I apologize in the beginning for being completely selfish in writing this; it has no deeper inner meaning and no final conclusion. I am just including things and people that I will miss.

I began my relationship with news writing when I was about 14 and basically fell in love with it from the very beginning. When I got to college I got to do some stories that really made an impact on me. Standing outside in the freezing cold rain watching protests and the bright colors of a fraternity burning to the ground will be forever ingrained in my memory.

Journalism is an amazing profession and I am blessed to have worked with people with a real passion for what they do. Ken Campbell, Adam Martignetti and Ryan Benharris working with all three of you taught me more than I can articulate in a variety of different ways. Although, I think I found my calling in law I don't know if I will ever really give up journalism.

I never thought that this will be included in my farewell column, but there are a few professors and classes that have changed my life for the better that deserve mention. Professor Noland, I love your classes and always have. I think it might simply be your enthusiasm for the material and for the school in general, but I am thankful to have had the opportunity.

Professor Mednicoff, your classes both sparked my interest in law and changed the way that I think of the Middle East. But you willingness to get to know your students as people is a rarity in a big public school. Professors like you are few and far between.

I will miss a million intangible things about UMass. Both the feeling when I was a freshman that everything was new and there to be explored and the feeling I had as a senior that I was familiar with the campus and that it was somehow "mine." I will miss the anticipation of big snowstorms, meeting deadlines at The Collegian and the great feeling it was to create something through writing.

Kulak, because you are my best friend on earth, I feel that you deserve your own section of my column. Some of my best memories of college are with you. Late night coffee runs, nachos and Ten Things I Hate About You, the fact that you always made hot chocolate best and the funny way that we end up being exactly like Will and Grace. You are always the person I want on the other end of the phone when I am having the best or worst day of my life. I am beyond excited to be living with you and Brad and Bokhman in Boston (who are, as a side-note, wonderful people who, while they don't go to UMass enhanced my experience here as well).

On the whole I have never gotten along with women so it is ironic that I should have an entire section devoted to the best girlfriends anyone could ever have.

Lizzy, you are my wingman, my heterosexual life-mate and one of my best friends. Never in my life have I met anyone who is as loyal or as full of life as you are. Beyond that our column also kicks some serious butt.

Jamie, I consider myself so lucky to have gotten to know you this year although in a lot of ways I feel like I have known you for my entire college career. Now I am going to have to fly to Illinois to drive around on fog filled roads, worry in your car and discuss the finer points of SGA politics, but I know you would make it all along. You are an amazingly talented journalist, regardless of whether or not you believe me when I tell you that.

Jen, you are very likely the most positive person that I know and one of the most determined. It may sound odd but I am so proud that you are HC next year, not only is it about time that a woman became editor in chief, but I know that you will do an amazing job. I only wish that I had another couple of years at the paper so that I could work for you.

Mark, I don't know if you will ever read this but I don't think that I could write something that sumises my thoughts without mentioning you. I remember a long time ago you asked me if I saw you as a soldier or simply as Mark, well to be honest I see you as a little of both. You are the guy who takes care of everyone whether it be your friends or people you have never met before.

DI, it seems odd that we weren't friends years ago. You always have an uncanny way of making me laugh whenever I need it. That and eight hours on a couch with you is all I really need.

Dan, you have more faith that everything will turn out well than anyone I have ever met, and I feel like I picked up some of your optimism and energy just by knowing you.

All and all I learned a lot of valuable things upon moving to Florida. I learned that living your life without changing is not really living at all. I also realized that I was blessed beyond belief in terms of having the best family and friends that anyone could ever ask for. My four years at UMass have been an amazing time, and I am looking forward to the next four years wherever else I land.

UMass athletics: Finally getting noticed for all the right reasons

This past weekend our campus played host to two thrilling athletic events. The softball team hosted the Atlantic 10 tournament and won it's ninth consecutive title. They now will move on to NCAA regionals in Tuscaloosa, Ala. later on this week.

Just a short trip down Massachusetts Avenue, the men's lacrosse team welcomed archrival Hofstra to Garber Field for a first round match in the NCAA tournament. They too were victorious in their quest, advancing onto the NCAA quarterfinals this Saturday. The Minutemen will next battle the Maryland Terrapins.

For those who were able to make either of both events, they were well rewarded with the consistent hard work and dedication of the athletes. If you weren't able to make it, or felt you had something better to do, you missed out.

With one team (softball) heading to the playoffs every straight year since 1995, and the other (lacrosse) advancing beyond the first round for the second straight year, these athletes once again did their university proud on the grass and turf.

It's a pleasant surprise to see the UMass Athletic Department and its teams making headlines for positive performance on the field. This hasn't been the case recently.

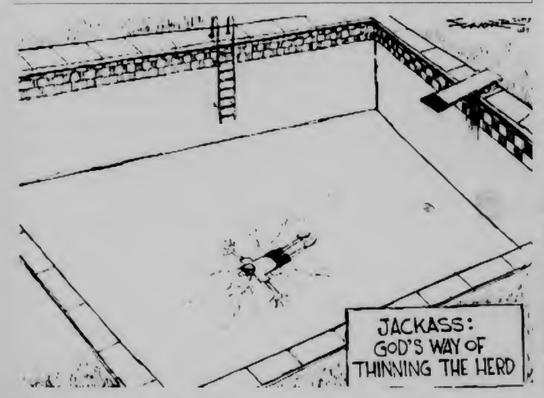
With the budget cuts last year, the athletic department sealed back its offerings from 29 teams down to 22 - sending a number of student-athletes and their coaches on their way. With more cuts looming on the horizon, rumors are a float that even more teams could be eliminated.

In the past month, more attention than ever has been focused at the mascot representative of UMass: the Minuteman. With the athletic department exploring every possible option to increase revenue and an independent consulting group recommending a change, the idea of student athletes competing as the UMass Gray Wolves has been kindly accepted by practically nobody.

Students, alumni, sports fans in general have all voiced their opinion with a resounding majority about their negative views of the proposed change.

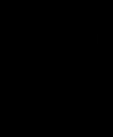
It's great to have national media attention has been focused on UMass Athletics, but this is the wrong reason.

Saturday's the softball team and then Sunday the men's lacrosse team showed us the right reason.



College athletics is a business and it is one often ripe with scandal, particularly this past year, but in the end it all gets back to student-athletes. Young men and women much like the rest of us, they have to juggle all their academic work with the immense time commitments required on the field for both practice and games. With two of the school's most successful teams in recent years playing this weekend, they are finally getting the credit that is do.

The softball team will continue to grow in prominence with each Atlantic 10 championship they win and NCAA tournament birth they garner. The men's lacrosse quarterfinal game will be shown on NESN this Saturday, proving how the Minutemen's fan base continues to grow.



It's been a while, but for once UMass Athletics is in the news for the only reason it should be: a team's performance on the field.

A college education is not acquired in a classroom. Don't let anyone fool you.

Four years ago, I arrived here terrified and excited and unsure. Now, I leave the same way, but jumbled with an ocean of different emotions. Frigid uncertainty lies ahead of me, while warm, comfortable, safe and loving memories lay behind. The thought of leaving people I love so purely and wholeheartedly tears me up inside, and I can hardly think about it without choking back tears.

I've learned more in my four years here than I did in 18 years before. I've learned to let myself be loved; I've learned to feel affection for others deeper than I ever thought possible. I've learned that looking into the eyes of someone that I love and seeing a reflection of that is the most satisfying feeling a human can experience.

I've learned that bouncing back from heartbreak enhances strength and builds character. I've learned that there's no force on this planet that can encompass a group of individuals who passionately work towards a goal together. I've learned that personal differences can be put aside in order to create the best goddamn college newspaper in the country.

Now the hard stuff, to those that I love so much and who have stuck by my side, the rest of this rant is for you.

Kulak, you were the first to suck me into this pit, and I can't thank you enough for it. From babysitting me while I was drenched in swamp water screaming how much I hated you to all those rides home to the time we made out. Thank you from the bottom of my heart.

Pierpont/Moore Res Life 2001-2002, you guys made my tenure as an RA the best it could possibly be during the worst nine months of my life. I love you all, and thanks to Britt, Jodi, and Kimberly for constantly going above and beyond (hahah, get it??) the call of friendship, and to Steve, I will never forget how you changed me.

Nothing will ever top the "Dynamic Threesome" [en. Nick, and Lizzy. Hey Nick <insert purring here>.

Our first rate Journalism Department Maddy Blais and BJ Roche, you taught me what it is to be a strong, intelligent female journalist, and you inspired my love for this profession.

Moldy, your psychoanalysis of me during rides home is something I'll never forget. Love you, schmutz.

Jaybiz, if you ever hipcheck me again I'm going to destroy you.

Scotty, the Cutlass was the end of our innocence. But the low rider is hotter. I love you like a brother. And you still ruin everything.

Melissa, my hetero life mate, wingman, and column partner. I love you. You kiss better than any Collegian employee.

Ryan, you're the most underestimated guy I have ever met. I'll break you of this dumb girl fixation if it kills me. Love you.

Courtney, you're the best-looking news editor ever.

Amy, if we had a kid its name would be Lizzy McGuire.

Lamothe, I'm always your big sister, and I will never stop hating girls that are mean to you and giving you shit whenever opportunity arises. You're the first person I've ever known to use an airplane barf bag. Honesty first.

Mitch and Joshua, best family ever. I love you guys.

Lindsey, nobody has taught me more about the meaning of loyalty and honesty than you. I love you more than words could ever say, and I can't believe that you put up with me sometimes. From the nights filled with Darla and filthy mouth Santa Clauses, you were my FIRST friend here, and no doubt in my mind the best.

Scottastic. I warned you this was going to get sappy (gag), so forgive me in advance. To think this all started with a game of Lilo and Stich baseball in the graphics room. And we're still in the 2nd inning. If you ever need a grilled cheese at 3 a.m., remember to call me. Putting our relationship into words probably won't do it justice, but I'm going to try. Your ability to see situations in such a calm and unique light is unparalleled, and your laid-back and positive approach to life is what keeps me going sometimes. I feel extraordinarily blessed to have gotten to know you and love you, but distraught that it took until my senior year. You are truly one of the finest human beings God put on this earth, and I am so fortunate and privileged to call you my friend. You always find a way to remind me that I don't know everything. You are my best friend, and I love you with all of my heart.

Jennifer. You took a chance on me, and for that I will be grateful for the rest of my life. I've found a Disney-loving aunt for my future children and a best friend till the end of time. Your patience and kindness are virtues that I admire, and I think I strive to be a little more like you every day. You're my twin sister in the most 359 degrees possible. Bless their little hearts. You're going to be the best editor in chief this paper has ever seen. And it's just the beginning for you. I love you so much. Here's to the summer.

To my beautiful and amazing sisters, Ginny, Vicky, and Sami: No one knows what it's like to be me except you. Sami, keep the Nielsen pride alive out here next year. Mom and Dad, thanks for financially allowing me to wreak havoc out here for four years. I love you guys.

"When you're too scared to look ahead, and it hurts to look back, you can look beside you and your best friends will be there."

Honesty and loyalty. Everything else is secondary.

The last hooah!

I remember being the map-quest navigator for my mother the first time we drove out to UMass to take a tour of what was to be my "safety school." Now, after 4 years of the happiest memories of my life, I am departing the beer-guzzling, all night parting, so-liberal-it kills me campus to be the navigator on a much bigger journey: the rest of my (gulp) adult life.

I am lucky enough to have more certainties in my immediate future then most of my fellow Minutemen, but what is most certain is college has been an unbelievable learning and growing experience that I will never forget. There are several special people that with this, my final Collegian column, I need to acknowledge and thank for making it all worth the ride.

Lindsey Elder

Travis: I can't even tell you how happy you make me. I never would have thought in a million years that the quiet, high-speed, grumpy guy in the MSII class my freshman year would be the love of my life someday. It goes to show that some of the best things in life are right there in front of you, but I guess the rolled-up pants must have thrown off my perspective. I love you and always know that no matter where we get sent or end up I will always be there for you.

Lizzy: My first friend in college and my best friend to the end. We're been though many a Daria episode, sketchy Santa and drunken resident together and yet there's still no one else I'd go to for honest advise and to share a laugh. I know you have a great career a head of you, just don't sell yourself short trying to get it. I intend to be mentioned in your Boston Globe column at least every month.

Scotty: Becoming the insanely busy people we both have been over the last few years leads me to my one and only regret in college: not being able to spend more time with you. You always see eye to eye with me on almost any matter and think just as highly of our UMass peers as I do. You have the best personality of anyone I know, that's probably why I know I'll be bringing my little soldiers to yours kid's bar-mitzvah. You've always been there for me to make me laugh and get me through tough decisions. Love you, Low Rider.

Deb, a.k.a. Hula 2: Now I can finally move on in life knowing that good things really do happen to good people and that hard work pays off. Since the day I met you, you have inspired me to work harder and to keep in mind that even when things don't go according to plan (Murphy's Law), there is always a way for things to work out in the end. You're going to be an outstanding officer, and, a very tan one at that. See you in Hawaii, Baby!

Moldy: Oh Shvitz, my funniest, most talented, Yankee-hating, Karaoke-loving friend of all: I will miss you so much. You've done so much to get the Doo Wop Shop the fan base it deserves and have always been there to cheer up your most important fans: your friends. When I need a wedding singer, you'll be the first one I call.

> "I walk away from UMass an officer, a graduate, and as a twenty- something ready to see what's out there."

Army ROTC MSIV's: I couldn't imagine college, or my life for that matter, without ROTC. Anyone that knows me can vouch for that I'm sure. We've waited a long time to finally become Lieutenants, and although four years ago I'd never have believed I'd stay though all the way, more than any butter bar or pay scale that may have raised an eyebrow for me, it was always the people that kept me going. I'll never forget Branch night, OP 40, and the Staff Ride. Keep in touch wherever we end up and if you ever want to get away, just give Cwalina and I a call.

Coolidge staff: Being an RA has been a real learning experience. I've learned that there are people who have no value for life or for how hard it can be for some people to have the opportunity to go to college. I've meet outstanding people who genuinely care about others and would give 100% of their time to make just a moment of someone else's better, only to get nothing in return. I've learned the value of being confident and doing what is right, and I've leaned that in some ways, you can't trust anyone. Lauren, Josette and Yusef; I wish you all the best in life; I know you already have what it takes to succeed anywhere. It's just time someone else notices.

To the ladies of Coolidge Tower's 4th floor (and Dave and Dave): I want to thank you for making my last year at UMass by far the best. It meant a lot to me that you trusted me as much as you did. Keep in mind friends will always be your friends no matter where you go, and if they aren't, then they're not worth it. Good luck in school next year, with your careers and may your lives be happy and drama free!

There are so many people left to mention that have made college what is was for me, but unfortunately, much like our time here, there comes a limit. I walk away from UMass an officer, a graduate, and as a twenty-something ready to see what's out there. I have enough pictures and memories to keep me in nostalgia for the rest of my life, but for now I'm ready to pack my bags, say my good byes and open a new chapter in my life. Here's to hoping the next chapter can have as happy an ending. Thank you.

UMass future still hazy

Dan Lamothe

It's been a heck of a year.

From the perspective of a reporter, a news editor and a University of Massachusetts student, it was tough to even know where to look this year.

War. Riots. Drug busts. Elections. All of them made news at UMass. That doesn't change what our real concern should remain.

It needs to be made perfectly clear: when we return to UMass in the fall, the University will not be the same. Budget cuts aren't a thing of the past - if anything, they're going to be bigger than ever. Right now projections have us on the receiving end of a $40 million cut to the $214.5 million the Amherst campus gets for state money. That's an 18 percent whack at the way we live our lives.

Where will these cuts be felt? What's going to be missing when we return in September? The last time the budget was cut, we got hit 11 percent and it cost us seven sports, foreign language labs and an escort service, to name a few. What's going to disappear this time?

Already the beginnings of cuts can he seen. The General Physical Education (GPE) program not posting its gym classes on SPIRE because they are not guaranteed for the fall is just one example of the ways that budget cuts could again alter our lives on campus. We're going to lose things important to us – it's just a matter of where. Get used to that idea right now.

> "When there is already warning that some students are going to need to switch majors or forego classes n the next two years because of the way things will be, what the heck is happening behind the scenes? Where's the ax going to fall?"

Chancellor John V. Lombardi said last week that he's going to try and find ways to "bridge" the budget shortfall for the next few years so that the ahrupt and immediate cancellation of programs does not occur. That's a best-case scenario that campus leadership in previous years did not strive to attain.

Nevertheless, where's the money going to come from? Lombardi said that no cuts will be announced until the second week of June when the budget is voted on by state legislators. The cuts will be made after that based on a three-category system, with activities that receive state money and don't contribute directly to teaching, and research receiving last priority. Teaching and research will receive first priority, with administrative activities, including intercollegiate athletics, falling somewhere in the middle of the puzzle.

At this point, I'm comfortable with Lombardi making these kinds of decisions. I believe he's got the basic idea that choices need to be made based on doing the best thing for the greatest number of students. But when there is already warning that some students are going to need to switch majors or forego classes in the next two years because of the way things will be, what the heck is happening behind the scenes? Where's the ax going to fall?

Right now, much of the campus is acknowledging that UMass could have a hard time, but there's no action. Regardless of how facts and figures are reported in the newspaper, it rushes past as water under the bridge because the difficulties have not been defined. The announcements will start while we're back in our hometowns, far from the problems with no chance to mobilize or rally once we realize which part of our livelihoods will be affected.

Lombardi has not defined which programs fall under which category yet. He hasn't defined how big he sees that first category of programs that don't contribute to teaching and research as, and he hasn't defined what kind of cuts to sports and administrative activities we could see. While he's probably right in assessing that doing so you spell doom for the programs he names, it does nothing to spell the uneasiness of the situation for us.

From top to bottom, the way UMass will look in six months is in a haze. That makes things easy – for now. The general student body isn't dealing with it yet, but a lack of money is slowly turning the campus as it exists on its ear. Economics will play an important role in any changes we experience, from which programs have to be altered/eliminated to whether or not the Minuteman hangs on as our mascot.

For the rest of the semester, there isn't much we can do other than to stay informed. The last time budget cuts were made, we had a leadership vacuum that ultimately probably resulted in some poor decisions that cost students a lot. Lombardi's plan is pretty clearly outlined, if vague. All we can do is put faith in that the money we do get will be spent as best it can be. Hope that changes made won't alter our lives anymore than necessary.

Dock Sues, keep your meter: Wrestling takes the ring in this poem

'Twas the week before finals, and all through the dorms,
Not a student was stirring, which wasn't the norm.
The books had been cracked for the first time all year,
With everyone shaking as finals drew near.

The prayers had been spoken that no one would fail,
And everyone's fighting for grades tooth and nail.

Corner to corner
Emilie Duggan-Hicks

The semester's behind us but finals we fear,
I'm looking at notes I didn't look at all year.

When out of my TV I heard a loud bang,
And I saw a steel chair hit a head with a clang.
My books were discarded; my notes hit the floor,
I turned up the volume so I could hear more.

The crowd it was loud at this wrestling show,
But had just happened? I needed to know.
Christian hit Goldberg; the mat was bright red.
It was dyed with the blood dripping from Goldberg's head.

Chris Jericho comes out; he's ranting once more.
But all of his raving has become a bore.
He's got his own version of old "Piper's Pit."
But everything Jericho says is just st.

Booker T! Shawn Michaels! And Kevin Nash, too!
Will fight Triple H and Ric Flair 'til they're through.
From the sledgehammer hits to the locker room brawls,
They'll fight again, fight again, fight again all!

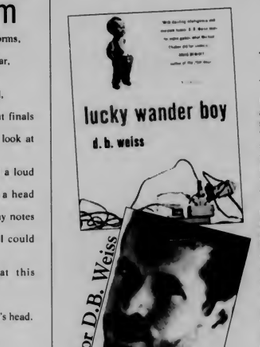
When evil takes over, bringing nothing but pain,
It's not a bird in the sky; it's just Hurricane.
Determined to cut evil down at its start,
The Hurricane's weapon of choice is his heart.

The Hardy Boyz broke up, and now Jeff is gone.
But Matt still has Shannon, the number one "Moore-on."
Now Sean O'Haire's back with his devilish grin.
He's hoping he'll soon score a pay-per-view win.

For the tag-team division, there's not much to say.
Team Angle seems lost with its leader away.
Los Guerreros are proud that they lie, cheat and steal,
But think that plotline gives them a raw deal.

On "RAW," Eric Bischoff has troubles galore
Now that Steve Austin's back, will he even the score?
On "SmackDown," the GM is still Vince's kid.
But he might not forgive her for what she just did.

Hulk Hogan is back as that "America" guy,
Though Vince is convinced that it's all just a lie.
With his face in a mask and some new blue ring tights,
Keeping his job might be Hulk's biggest fight.



Jazz made her return and is with Rodney Mack,
But all she can say is "the bitch has come back."
Sable's back too, with her sights set on Torrie.
There's only one way they can go with this story.

New talent's arrived; there are lessons to learn
The summer will bring us new plot twists and turns.
Who will keep standing, and who will fall fast?
Will there be more stars from the wrestling past?

This column is over; the semester has passed.
It might just be me, but I had such a blast.
Go have some adventures; make stories to tell.
Have a good summer! Keep safe and be well!

'Lucky Wander Boy' makes for lucky enlightened readers

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

In his debut novel, "Lucky Wander Boy," D. B. Weiss creates a fictional world that is, at times, startlingly believable. Weiss aptly sums up his novel on the jacket of the book, "A novel of videogame addiction, Hollywood serfdom, ill-fated romance, and extremely misguided notions about Japan." This book has the potential to become a cult classic with its resonating and powerfully constructed voice aimed at all "wanderers."

Adam Pennyman, the main character of the book, is a young man who finds himself adrift in life. The book starts in an autobiographical style being told by Pennyman. After his devious exploits in Poland, where he worked as a graphic designer under false pretenses, Adam returns to Los Angeles with Anya, a huge servant he fell in love with in Poland.

As Pennyman becomes more and more immersed in his private work, writing the "Catalog of Obsolete Entertainment," he and the writing style become more and more detached from the outside world. The style of writing changes throughout the story, shifting from an autobiography, expository essay and fantasy seamlessly. The structure of the book is written in three acts: "Lucky," "Wander" and "Boy."

The story takes its first major plot twist when Adam finds work for an "anti-Hollywood" multimedia company, which just happens to have purchased the movie rights to "Luck Wander Boy." Here we meet Clio, who replaces the now marginalized Anya. With Clio's help Adam begins in earnest to work on his catalog, which is more of a collection of exploratory passages that present classic video games as metaphors of society.

> "... I hope they get immersed deeply enough into Adam Pennyman's [the narrator's] worldview to actually believe some of the outlandish things he believes ..."
> -D.B. Weiss

In an online interview with Michael Oberth, Weiss was asked, "Do you think that the developers of the old Atari and Coleco games intended for their games to be a metaphoric representation of the times?"

To which he answered, "Nah, they just wanted them to be fun to play, and they did an admirable job. But no one and nothing can help being a metaphoric representation of their times, really - especially to a protagonist with manic, delusional tendencies."

When the opportunity presents itself for Adam to rewrite the screenplay for the LWC movie, he drops the catalog project and begins writing again in secret. All of this, and more side story and plot thickening takes place within the first two acts of the book. Act three is short and contains both the climax and the denouement of the story, but reader be warned though tiny this act is the most exciting, and potentially mind blowing.

During the interview Oberth asked Weiss if he shared the same video game collecting habits of Pennyman? Weiss answered, "I've got a[n atari] 2600 and an Intellivision, but I cut myself off there, before my writing productivity cooled to absolute zero."

David Benioff, author of the 25th hour, comments in the opening of the book, "With dazzling intelligence and mordant humor D. B. Weiss does for video games what Michael Chabon did for comics." Humor, laced with sadistic devotion and a desperate need to find out what is at the end of the "game," drives this book from cover to cover.

When Oberth asked, "What do you hope that the readers and game aficionados take from this novel?" Weiss said, "I hope it helps them pass a few enjoyable hours. I hope they get immersed deeply enough into Adam Pennyman's [the narrator's] worldview to actually believe some of the outlandish things he believes, if only until they close the book. I hope it makes them think about these games themselves - why we play them, what we gain from it."

One last melancholy journey up 'Dawson's Creek'

By Christy Lemire
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – For a show whose characters cling longingly to the misty, wistful days of youth, nearly everyone involved with "Dawson's Creek" is more than ready to move on.

Take Joshua Jackson, who's played perennial screw-up Pacey Witter for the past six seasons on the seminal WB teen series:

"The stories have been told – that's why it's time for the show to end. The reason all these people participated in each other's lives was high school. It's kind of a contrivance to get them to try to be a part of each other's lives now."

Or take Michelle Williams, who plays bad-girl-turned-peer-counselor Jen Lindley:

"Our contracts were up, that's a good reason. It was time – I don't know. It's been leaning that way for quite some time. It wasn't really my decision, but it's fitting."

And take James Van Der Beek, who stars as Film geek and hopeless romantic Dawson Leery:

"Honestly? I celebrated," he said, when he learned the show had been canceled. "It just seemed perfect – I'm getting married, I'm getting older. It just kind of seemed right."

Or, to paraphrase badly from the show's Paula Cole theme song, they don't want to wait for their lives to be over. They want to get on with their careers right now.

The wait is over at 8 p.m. EDT Wednesday, when the series ends with a two-hour finale written by the show's creator, "Scream" writer Kevin Williamson. He left after the second season to work on films and the short-lived TV series "Wasteland."

The final episode takes place five years in the future. It wraps up the story lines that began in the idyllic, fictional coastal town of Capeside, Mass., when Dawson, Pacey, Jen and blossoming tomboy Joey (Katie Holmes), Dawson's best friend, were 15. The past two seasons, they've attended college and worked in Boston.

Williamson based the series on his own childhood, focusing on the four characters as they grappled with growing up – something they did articulately and constantly, which set the show apart from other teen dramas.

James Van Der Beek

"It was about kids speaking eloquently and honestly about things most teenagers go through but are either too afraid to talk about or just can't quite grasp enough to put into words," Van Der Beek said. "Because it didn't shy away from anything, I think it struck a chord."

The 26-year-old and his co-stars also struck a chord with teenage girls – the core audience for both the series and the WB. Virtually unknown when they were cast (Jackson, 24, had appeared in the "Mighty Ducks" hockey movies), they quickly became heartthrobs. The melodramatic permutations of the Dawson-Joey-Pacey love triangle only made them hotter.

"I can't walk into Starbucks without hearing someone's opinion" on the finale, Williamson said by phone from the set of the horror film "Cursed," which he wrote and Wes Craven is directing. "Most people are like, 'What's it going to be? I want Dawson! I want Pacey!'"

"When I sat down to write it, I wrote it both ways and I realized I could do it all," he said.

It's precisely that level of interest that makes executive producer Paul Stupin think the series could have survived through college and beyond.

"If I had my druthers, we'd do it for years to come, but frankly some things don't work out that way," said Stupin, who created "Dawson's Creek" with Williamson. "It's better to go out in a position of real strength, and I do think we're doing that."

But WB entertainment president Jordan Levin said the network canceled the series because the stories had run their course.

"It's important to be secure as a network in your ability to replenish hit shows, to not milk them completely dry, to let them end with a degree of dignity and honor," Levin said.

"There was a certain fear that what was very special and unique about the series would become disregarded."

The end of "Dawson's Creek" also marks the end of an era for the WB. It was one of the network's early successes, with "Buffy the Vampire Slayer," which moved to UPN in 2001 and also is ending this month, and "Felicity," which ended last year.

"It means we're growing up. It means we've been around for a while," Levin said – but he added that the WB will replaced the departing shows with "Gilmore Girls," "Everwood" and "Smallville," which appeal to a similar audience.

The four "Dawson's Creek" stars also have matured as evidenced by their budding film careers.

Van Der Beek surprised audiences and drew critical praise last year as a manipulative, promiscuous college student in "The Rules of Attraction." He performs off Broadway this month in the play "Rain Dance," and is marrying actress Heather McComb this summer.

Williams, 22, has appeared in films ranging from the comedy "Dick" with Kirsten Dunst to the independent "Me Without You" and "But I'm a Cheerleader."

Jackson most recently co-starred in the ensemble drama "The Safety of Objects" and appears next in "I Love Your Work" with Giovanni Ribisi and Christina Ricci.

And Holmes, 24, has had the most prolific career away from the "Creek," appearing in such hits as "Go" and "Wonder Boys" and starring in "Abandon," written and directed by Oscar-winning "Traffic" scribe Stephen Gaghan.

Generically cute 'Daddy Day Care' depicts a washed-up Eddie Murphy

Film offers audiences a nap time more than play time

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Look how far the mighty have fallen. Years ago, Eddie Murphy was one of our most promising comic actors. A firebrand motor mouth whose rapid-fire machine gun bluster gave birth to a new generation of coiled rage comics, where would Chris Rock, Chris Tucker and Bernie Mac be if Eddie Murphy didn't exist? Murphy was raw and untamed, a man who entered into the establishment, but had little use for the social filters that came with it. Slowly but surely, Murphy was airbrushed and made safe; his "edge" was made palatable to the kinds of people who were as edgy as a soupspoon.

"Daddy Day Care"
Directed by Steve Carr
Starring Eddie Murphy, Jeff Garlin
Columbia
Rated PG
96 mins.

In recent years, Murphy has found success applying his wiry energy to the universe of children's films. Instead of abiding by the old W.C. Fields adage about not working with children or animals, Murphy discovered the opposite has worked for him. The presence of kids and animals have lit a fire in Murphy so that he seems more energized, more alive than he's been in awhile; no more so than when he's giving voice to ornery, fast-talking cartoon critters, "Shrek," "Mulan."

"Daddy Day Care," however, isn't in the same league as "Shrek." Instead, this movie, In which Murphy is asked to play straight man to a gaggle of generically "cute" tykes, continues the once-hilarious comedian on the same wretched path that leads to the inexplicable phenomenon of career suicide. Devoid of mirth and humor, "Daddy Day Care" is the kind of movie that made me long for the dismal void that was "The Adventures of Pluto Nash." That movie was a complete turkey, a would-be comedy that got lost in space, yet the movie, in its way, was a memorable experience. It plunged to new levels of ineptitude that give it a kind of epic, tragic grandeur. On the other hand, "Daddy Day Care" is awful in that anonymous, faceless way that most modern comedies have managed to lock themselves in.

There was not one moment of genuine humor throughout the 90-odd minutes of "Daddy Day Care" – well, save for a couple of minor chuckles that occurred in the closing credit blooper reels. These laughs came from some of the tiny, chubby-cheeked child actors making innocuous comments during their scenes. Strange, how a grown-up writer like Geoff Rodkey can toil and slave over a screenplay but be customarily one-upped by the unwitting ad-lib of a four-year-old boy.

Not that I'm saying Rodkey put in much of a workload to come up with "Daddy Day Care." This is a movie in which the crayoned-in writing and workmanlike direction (courtesy of hired gun filmmaker Steve Carr) are as bland and featureless as Play-Doh.

Murphy, acting as tame and sleepy as possible, plays Charlie Hinton, an ad. Exec. who has been laid off from his job after the spectacular failure of a vegetable flavored cereal called Veggie-Os. The fact that Charlie is an ad exec. Hollywood's go-to occupation for disconnected suburban men, tells us that "Daddy Day Care" is going to be one of those films in which a pre-occupied man will learn to let go and appreciate his family. Its Hollywood's leading phony lie.

> There was not one moment of genuine humor throughout the 90-odd minutes of "Daddy Day Care" – well, save for a couple of minor chuckles that occurred in the closing credit blooper reels.

Charlie and his lovable lug of a co-worker Phil (Jeff Garlin) decide to make some quick cash by opening their own neighborhood day care facility, as a cost-effective alternative to the only, implausible, competition: either a rotting trailer park or an or the expensive, high class Chapman academy, in which pre-schoolers are taught five languages and Tai Chi.

Anjelica Huston, whose career trajectory from "Prizzi's Honor" to this is even sadder than Murphy's descent, plays the villainous, scowling headmistress of Chapman unsubtly named Ms. Harridan.

"Daddy Day Care" is really just an excuse for Rodkey to indulge in a juvenile series of vulgar jokes. As staged, the antic, flatulent humor may not even entertain the core kiddy fan base. "Daddy Day Care" is as shoddy a comedy that has come along with Rodkey and Carr setting up their physical gags in the simplest, broadest terms possible.

The filmmakers fail to realize that humor is lost if the joke is telegraphed five years in advance. They also fail to realize another crucial element: hiring Eddie Murphy to be your lead does not always guarantee laughs. Murphy's been on autopilot for the past year, but even his performances in "Showtime" and "I Spy" are superb compared to his work here. Murphy may have the cushiest job in Hollywood: getting paid lots of money for as little exertion as possible.

Even with fellow talented comic actors; Steve Zahn, as a goofy space cadet with a working knowledge of Klingon, and bone-dry Jonathan Katz as an empathetic social services worker aboard to help Murphy, what "Daddy Day Care" offers is closer to nap time than play time.

There's no reminders of the quick-witted, animated Mushu or Donkey in "Daddy Day Care."

Sicily

Don't talk to strangers?

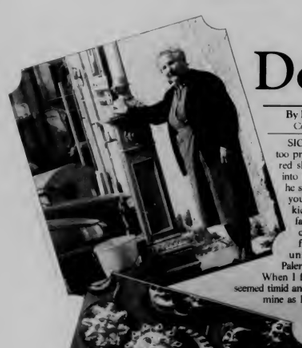
By Matthew Viglianti
Collegian Correspondent

SICILY – Joseph wore an outfit too proper to be dirtied. His plaid red shirt remained neatly tucked into the waistband of his pants as he sat quietly. Nearby, a group of young boys scampered about, kicking up dust from the surface of their soccer pitch. The clouds above blocked the sun from getting through, and an unseasonable chill entered Palermo center.

When I first approached Joseph, he seemed timid and cautious. His eyes followed mine as I wandered toward the field. He perched atop a goal post, a crooked tree trunk at one end of the dirty lot, his light brown hair standing up in the breeze. Neither one of us knew the other's language. Through gesture and repetition he agreed to a photo, and I joined him on the trunk to frame the shot.

After I snapped the photograph, Joseph dismounted his post and strolled along the edge of the field. He was beginning to relax. We continued to chat as we walked, but this time Marie joined the conversation. She learned, through Italian, that Joseph was only nine years old. Although his porcelain cheeks and short stride belonged to youth, Joseph's candidness and patience suggested maturity beyond his years. I parted with Joseph after many thanks, and felt touched by the experience. I didn't know then that Sicily would continue to reveal itself through its people's sincerity and warmth.

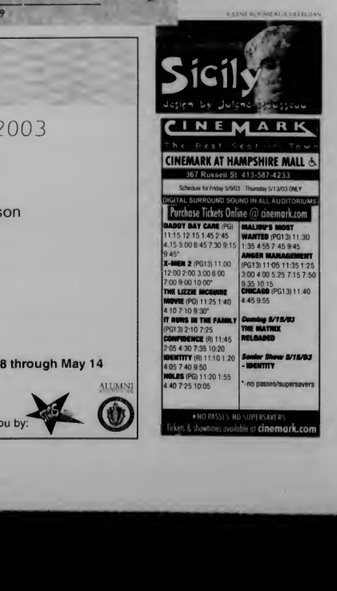
My encounter with Joseph contradicted everything I had ever known about personal interaction. I grew up hearing things like, "Don't talk to strangers," on a daily basis. I was programmed at an early age to close down when unfamiliar people introduced themselves to me. Joseph, however, had broken the rules. Many Sicilians, young and old, would follow Joseph's example, extending hospitality beyond measure, and bridging the gap between cultures and languages.



Back on the bus, we rode towards Cefalu. The highway wound with the contours of the coastline, and flowed into the countryside. Soon, Cefalu came into view. The city, pink in the evening light, laid huddled beneath a massive cliff face. Giovanni revved the bus' engine to climb a hill and obtain a better view of the city. Following a quick photo stop, we arrived at our hotel to freshen up, before heading into Cefalu for the night.

Rosa walked us through the narrow streets until we reached the Piazza Duomo. The Cathedral of Cefalu dominated the scene. Lit by street lamps and yellow spotlights, the symmetrical cathedral featured two high towers on either side, and three spectacular arches in between. Shops and cafes enclosed the square, and patio furniture provided ample seating.

We enjoyed a quick history lecture from Rosa before setting out to explore the town. I needed a rest. Sitting down on a metal chair, I observed a pack of children playing soccer on the sloped street. Their shrieks echoed off the cobblestones, filling the piazza with sound. Contented, our group relaxed and enjoyed our first sips of cappuccino.



Rosa walked straight into the middle of the contest, stopping one boy in his tracks. Smiling, she turned back towards us. Apparently, the boys were challenging us to a friendly match, scheduled to start immediately upon the completion of their current game.

Holy cannoli!

By Laura J. Curry
Collegian Correspondent

SICILY – This part-time writer and full-time connoisseur of all things sweet would sacrifice her waistline to find the best cannoli Sicily's could offer. Little did I know that on this particular journey I would also be feeding my faith.

Even though Sicily is no bigger than Maine, it tips the scales as the fifth largest island in the world. With only eight days and a shoestring budget to contend with, my quest for cannoli would have to be downsized to a ten-city stop tour. My destinations would be mixed with touristy spots like Palermo, Mondelo, and Taormina and also those places kept on the down low like Gangi, Cefalu and Erice.

To get to Sicily is no hop, skip, and jump. But really what good thing ever came easy? And after plowing through a Massachusetts winter, I figured I could handle the long trek to promised paradise. So while I endured bleary-eyed bus rides and a nine-hour plane ride from JFK to Palermo Airport I acquainted myself with the cannoli's checkered past. Until tiramisu took the crown, cannoli were the most requested dessert items in Italian restaurants in the United States.

Sicily lays claim to the cannoli which probably originally came from the Arabs, who influence so much of Sicily's cooking. Translated to English the word cannoli means 'pipes', which is not surprising due to the fact that the dessert has a cylinder shape.

Literally, cannolis are pastry shells formed on metal tubes and fried to crispness before being filled usually with sweetened ricotta cream and studded with chocolate chips.

But enough chewing on tidbits and fac-

Blood orange love, and other tales of citrus fever

By Lisa Roberge
Collegian Correspondent

SICILY – On the plane from Rome to Palermo, before I'd even set foot on the red earth of Northern Sicily, I was unsuspectingly served a glass of blood orange juice from one of those large juice box containers. "Arance Rosso di Sicilia," the box said. Little did I know, that the contents of that box would mark the beginning of a great adventure. The flight attendant handed the bright red glass to me. I sipped and immediately fell in love. The vivid sweetness of the blood orange would follow me through the duration of my nine-day visit to such a vibrant island.

My trip to Sicily was the first time I'd ever been out of the United States and the first time I'd ever traveled in a group. All together, we were 42; 29 students and 13 instructors. It was to be a trip of many firsts. The only expectations that I came with were that everything would be foreign and that everything would be beautiful. I was not disappointed. The uniqueness of Sicily is embodied in everything from the cuisine, the jewel-like fruits, to the people and the land itself.

As soon as the plane touched the ground, I found myself surrounded by a combination of colors I'd never seen before. Having only seen photos of the Mediterranean, my exhausted, jet lagged self was totally swept away by the aquamarine sky, bright sage olive trees, the blue green sea, and a landscape the color of a blood orange: warm and fertile. The sun was reflected in each yellow globe on a nearby lemon tree.

Once we collected our baggage and got through customs, our tour guide, Rosa, led us to our tour bus. It would be the one constant besides the incessant beauty of the island for the entire trip. As we headed out of Palermo, lemon and orange orchards began to appear with more and more frequency until it seemed like they went on for miles.

Craggy mountains topped with umbrella cypress resembling a line of caravan animals backed the seemingly endless parade of bright golden green trees with impossible yellow and orange fruits, like a constellation on earth. Giant prickly pear cactus also gathered along the hillsides, and their Excited, we awaited the final whistle and our turn to play.

A group of six UMass and Hartford students marched out to accept the challenge. The goals were marked and the sides were chosen. It was the United States vs. Italy in an intense international contest. The children danced and weaved, but we fought to gain the edge. Our American contingent was quick to strike, and soon the score was 1-0 in our favor.

The cobblestones at our feet were not very forgiving, and each time a boy hit the ground I grimaced with concern. Rosa assured me that the boys were only acting, and play continued on. Final score: U.S.A. 1, Italy 2. Handshakes all around confirmed the bond we'd forged. Back to the hotel to get some much needed sleep. I knew I would never forget that night. So many memorable experiences, and it was only day one of our trip.

The next morning we enjoyed some free time in Cefalu. Exploring the city was like hunting for buried treasure. Staircases and alleyways ensnared our creative minds. Locals watched our activity with an interest and curiosity. But the highlight of the morning occurred when we stumbled into Piazza Duomo.

The square was filled to the brim. The streets on the perimeter of the piazza were closed off to serve as the route for a running race. Everywhere, participants in white "ACS" shirts stood ready. Along the sidewalks, spectators cheered. The children's bracket started first, and with the "Pop" of a pistol, a horde of kids sped down the street. I fired my camera to capture the frenzy.

A handful of Hartford students had spent the morning sketching the Cathedral of Cefalu. They occupied tables at the far end of the piazza, across from the cathedral. Their drawings were fantastic. Various architectural details filled the pages of their sketchbooks, and we began to discuss the methods they employed to achieve such perfection.

Not long after the start of the race, the children returned from around a corner. They smiled as they crossed the finish line, and skipped gleefully into the center of the piazza for a group photograph. A couple of kids noticed Caleb working on his drawing. They strayed from the pack and began to congregate around him. A good sport, Caleb displayed his work for the children to see. Soon they were laughing and dodging as Caleb sparred with the more aggressive boys. The chaperone seemed to disapprove, but the play fighting continued.

I couldn't resist shooting a few frames of the playful antics. One boy noticed my camera, and almost immediately lost interest in Caleb. No older than ten, he grabbed me by the hand and dragged me into the piazza, motioning for me to photograph him in front of the cathedral. I complied. Thanking him for his enthusiasm, I began to walk towards my friends. I felt a tug at my sleeve and turned to see the lad beckoning me back into the piazza. He persisted, and the camera loved him. A few frames later, and the rest of his group spotted the action. Oh boy!

Searching for cannoli

this slightly unsure girl had arrived. The first stop, the charming fishing village of Cefalu. Now I have never been a person of many words, but the sheer splendor of Sicily doesn't just leave you speechless for a second, you're mute for hours on end.

It is a place of pure imagination, an opportunity to give all your senses a much-needed workout. There is so much to take in, but for this beach bum, it was the ocean that was the gem of the island.

Oh, the sea with its bursting blues and greens. It brings you color even when the sun decides to sleep in. It is my constant companion, greeting me when I wake and watching me while I sleep.

I walk the narrow, cobblestone streets of the town and feel like an extra in some foreign film. I find myself excited about hung laundry and children's echoing screams for some runaway soccer ball.

My gingerbread house would come in the shape of Cafe Duomo located in the plaza of Cefalu. A quaint, little corner pastry shop not run a middle-aged man sandwiched between two strapping young lads.

Cafe Duomo is comparable in size to a phone booth, but with so much literal eye candy to make your mouth water and stomach scream, you don't mind the packed joint.

With the exchange of a few crisp euros and a shaky Italian "grazie" I take a bite of my first homemade cannoli expecting the sugar police to come and arrest me.

But I am not satisfied. Now I understand that coming at night may not have been the best idea if I was worried about freshness, but this is ridiculous. Although Cafe Duomo doesn't skimp on size, with one cannoli being able to fill up two people, it leaves you with a chalky aftertaste and a bowling ball in your stomach.

I remember reading somewhere that no self-respecting Sicilian would ever let a cannoli pass through their lips without fresh ricotta put in on sight. But since I am not that particular, and couldn't ask for it even if I wanted, I decide to head back.

After all, tomorrow is another day...

shadows as well as the shadows of the trees created dappled yellow and vibrant green expanses against the terra cotta earth. All the houses, some lived in, others abandoned long ago, looked as though they all grew from the same vine, like giant butternut squash. Cream-colored sheep also dotted the landscape; goats chased a few as they munched quietly on lush green grass. But my eyes always returned to the orchards, a wealth of citrus lifeblood and a riot of color. Once in a while I spotted a herd of chestnut cows resting under the low, sparse shade the olive leaves and fruits provided. I never got tired of looking at them.

Men's lax matchup will be televised

The NCAA has announced that the No. 5-ranked University of Massachusetts' men's lacrosse team will play No. 5-ranked Maryland in the early game on Saturday at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, N.Y. Face-off is slated for 12:30 p.m. For ticket information, please call the Syracuse University ticket office at 315-443-2121. Tickets can also be purchased online at www.dometix.com.

The game will be broadcast on WMUA radio (91.1 FM). The game will also be televised by NESN, Fox Sports New York, Empire State Network and Comcast/SportsNet in the Baltimore/D.C. area.

The Minutemen advanced to the quarterfinals with a 9-6 victory over Hofstra. The Terrapins defeated Ohio State, 8-5, in their first-round game yesterday in College Park, Md. The two teams have met only once before in their respective storied histories, with Maryland claiming a 13-4 decision in Amherst in 1983.

The game will feature a contrast of styles as UMass ranks third in the country in scoring offense, while the Terrapins are third in scoring defense. The Minutemen have been held under 10 goals only twice this season, while Maryland has allowed only one team (South Carolina) to reach double-figures.

The winner will advance to next weekend's semifinal games on May 24 (played at Rosetta Stadium in Baltimore, Md. against the winner of Georgetown/Virginia quarterfinal game.

Baseball set for A-10's at Norwich

The University of Massachusetts baseball team, regular season champions of the Atlantic 10 Conference East Division, is the second seed for the 2003 Atlantic 10 Championship, which begins this Thursday, May 15, at Dodd Memorial Stadium in Norwich, Conn.

The Minutemen will receive a first round bye then play the winner of the opening round game between sixth seeded George Washington and third seeded Rhode Island at 4:00 p.m. on Friday, May 16.

The Minutemen closed out the regular season with a record of 24-17 overall and 14-7 in the Atlantic 10. George Washington stands 33-16 overall and 12-9 in the Atlantic 10, while Rhode Island is 23-24 overall and 16-8 in league play.

Other teams taking part in the tournament are top seed Richmond (42-11, 19-4 Atlantic 10), fourth seed Duquesne (25-27, 13-9 Atlantic 10) and fifth seed Xavier (23-24-2, 13-8 Atlantic 10).

The final two teams remaining in the double-elimination tournament will advance to next week's Atlantic 10 Championship Final. The highest remaining seed will host the best two-out-of-three series from May 22-24, with the winner receiving the conference's automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament.

Softball heads to Alabama for NCAAs

The University of Massachusetts softball team will be traveling to Tuscaloosa, Alabama for the NCAA Regional Tournament, beginning on Thursday, May 15. The No. 3 seeded Minutewomen will face Southern Illinois (36-12) in the first round at 5:30 p.m.

Joining the Minutewomen in the eight team regional will be Illinois, Georgia Tech, host-school Alabama, Southern, Stanford and UT-Chattanooga.

Massachusetts is 36-15 overall and just wrapped up its ninth straight and 16th overall Atlantic 10 Championship.

The winner in each of the eight regional sites will advance to the Women's College World Series in Oklahoma City, Okla., May 22-26.

Please check back to the official UMass Athletics web site at www.umassathletics.com for more information as it becomes available.

Green leads as women's track takes eighth

DURHAM, N.H. The University of Massachusetts women's outdoor track and field team finished eighth (47 points) at the New England Outdoor Championships at Durham, N.H., on Saturday. Maine won the two-day event with 78.50 points while New Hampshire finished second with 77 points and Boston College was third with 70 points.

Junior Brandy Green (Fitchburg, Mass.) led the way for the Minutewomen when she cleared 12'3-1/2" to win the pole vault. The mark set a new meet record as well as a new UMass school record. Green surpassed the 12'2" mark Kerry Teames cleared at the 1999 New England Championships and also passed the 12'0" mark she cleared last season to set the previous school record.

On Saturday Christina Huft (Springfield, Mass.) recorded two solid finishes for the Minutewomen. She placed third in the 100-meter dash at 12.06 and fourth in the 200-meter dash at 25.12.

Also performing well for UMass was freshman Ashley Creel (Sandwich, Mass.) and senior Jennifer Freemas (Wallingford, Pa.). Creel placed fourth in the high jump at 5'1" and Freemas finished fourth in the 400-meter hurdles at 1:03.32.

Next weekend the Minutewomen will travel to Princeton, N.J., for the ECAC Championships.

Leaman still a leader

That's if you don't count his obsession with golf. The one that began when he first moved here from Boston.

"I never played until I came to Amherst," says Leaman, who graduated from Boston University. "I wasn't very good. I wasn't very good for a long time. But then I got serious about it, worked at it, and got better."

He developed his game at Amherst Golf Club, which Leaman talks about in a love-at-first-sight kind of way. "It was just so friendly," he says. "One day you could play with the club champ, and the next day you could play with the worst player at the club, and have fun both days. That's the kind of club it was."

Golf, Leaman says, "made me a better-rounded person." It taught him patience. It helped him, for example, accept young players who weren't performing up to his expectations. And it taught him to relax. Taught him to keep things in perspective.

"I really learned early in my career that if I went out and played golf and just enjoyed myself for two hours or four hours, when I came back, the same problems that were there before I played were still there," he says. "But it gave me a fresh mind to attack the problems with a new approach."

On the course, Leaman can't be troubled. During a May 5 match at Hickory Ridge, the team's home course, he is pacing back and forth on the first tee, periodically checking his watch and peering toward the parking lot. It's after 12:30, the match's scheduled start time, and two players are late. When the first, a Stockbridge player, shows up and tells Leaman "I forgot we were playing today," he just chuckles and says, "I shouldn't be surprised. It's written on your schedule as big as life." Ten minutes later the second, from Holyoke Community College, finally arrives – citing traffic as the excuse – and without any warm-up, smokes a perfect drive down the center of the fairway. Leaman, in another bout with sarcasm, immediately shouts, "Right off Route 9!"

That approach is calming. Leaman knows his players aren't enrolled in Stockbridge to make birdies. Most of the guys he gets aren't even aware a golf team exists when they first arrive on campus. Watson Baker, a senior from Lebanon, N.H., figured he'd played his last competitive match in high school.

"Jack just came into one of my classes, and said there was tryouts," says Baker, currently the No. 2 player on the team. "So I started playing again."

"It's a really laid back atmosphere," he adds. "It's not like we're playing for some huge collegiate championship or anything. You can't turn down free golf."

Baker, like his 11 teammates, is a turf management major, on track to one day be a golf course superintendent – a job held by countless Stockbridge graduates throughout the country, including Bob Ruszala at Hickory Ridge and Carl Teske at Amherst Golf Club, both of whom give the squad their course time. At Stockbridge, golf is a business, first. But that's also the reason the Stockbridge team has faired typically well in the two-year college circuit.

"I am probably the luckiest coach in the area because I get a lot of good players by nature of their business," Leaman says. "They've been on the golf course, working and playing, for a long time."

With scores typically ranging from the mid-70s to mid-80s, Leaman doesn't worry too much about instruction.

"If you're a player and you know what you're going to do, I'm not going to help you unless you ask for help," he says. "I've worked with a lot of kids on putting and chipping and giving them drills and making them work that way, but I really don't take too much into the swing unless they're having problems."

Leaman's main priority is making sure his players are succeeding in the classroom. He's constantly inquiring about their educational progress, and helps out whenever he can.

"Jack is the man," says Bryan Gallagher, a senior from Attleboro, Mass. "He's a can-do kind of guy. If you need something, he'll get it for you. That's just how he is."

Gallagher's esteem for Leaman echoes through the entire Stockbridge roster, which is essentially a circle of friends. Baker says Leaman is "probably one of the best parts about coming to Stockbridge."

But that's no real surprise. Leaman has been leaving lasting impressions for centuries now. Dr. J still calls him all the time, and tees it up with him whenever he's in the area. While Karen Fitzgerald Moran, who played for Leaman during his one-year interim stint with the UMass women's hoop team back in 1986-87 season, claims to have named her son Jack after him.

"Jack is quite a treasure on this campus," says Vittum, who besides teaching many of Leaman's players at Stockbridge, co-chaired the UMass Athletic Council for seven years. "He has been a tremendous resource for the athletic department."

Vittum says she "quickly developed a great working relationship" with Leaman when he first began coaching at Stockbridge, and their respect for each other's jobs is manifest. Rarely do professors let their quizzes travel outside the classroom. But Leaman's comes out for his players, and Vittum's students, is reassuring.

Walking around the course that strange Friday, Leaman's surprisingly preoccupied with what the outcome of the match will be. But only because he knows that a poor performance on the course could have a detrimental effect on the four freshmen's test-taking abilities.

"I thought about doing it before the match and how that would affect the match and after the match, and I'm saying to myself, well, if we play badly I might even put them in the van, take the quiz home and then give it to them," Leaman says. "Let them at least recover a little."

Fortunately for Leaman, the Stockbridge boys pulled out the victory, and saved him some unnecessary aggravation. He likes to keep that to a minimum.

Remember, he's retired.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

I believe it is our fate to be here. It is our destiny. I believe this night holds, for each and every one of us, the very meaning of our lives. This is a war and we are soldiers. What if tomorrow the war could be over? Isn't that worth fighting for? Isn't that worth dying for?

Jim says goodbye to The Collegian

Jim Pignatiello

Well, it's hard to believe, but this is the last thing – other than tomorrow's Misty Eyes – that I will ever write for The Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

I've written stories about more UMass sports than I can list here. Well, let's try anyway – women's crew, women's gymnastics, men's water polo, women's track, softball, women's soccer, women's hoop, baseball, football, men's hoop and men's lacrosse. I guess that's it. Not bad.

I've been called a Lappas supporter. I've been called a Lappas hasher. I've been called a great writer. I've been called a terrible writer. I've had a heated discussion with a fencer. I've witnessed a friend choose the Waffle House over a woman. (Those two weren't related, but still funny in their own ways.) I've had John Chaney tell me to "f--k the NCAA" – not really sure how to do that.

I've formed friend-ships with amazing people. I've destroyed my grade point average.

And I would definitely do it all again in a heartbeat.

And this is farewell. Now, you didn't think I would just say "thank you" and leave, did you? Oh, no. This is one last shot at Pig's Skinny, my weekly football column that glossed over the NFL every week, making bad jokes the whole way.

Warning: this time, there is very little pigskin involved.

THANK YOU

I need to get the Oscar-winner-sounding stuff out of the way first. I know, it sounds mushy. Deal with it.

First, you've given me more love, support and understanding than I ever dreamed possible. You somehow made the most difficult and stressful year of my life also the best. I am clearly the luckiest guy in the world. The excitement of starting our new life together makes these goodbyes a little easier to bear.

To my parents, biological and otherwise, thank you for understanding my time limitations, and supporting me when I struggled into maturity – well, I guess that's a relative term, but you know what I mean. Thank you for everything. I realize how lucky I am.

To all my friends who don't attend U Mass, especially Frank, Chris and Ryan, thank you for putting up with my extreme lack of free time. There were so many times I could only be with you in spirit and I'm glad that you always understood. Hopefully, graduation will allow me a little more time for the poker room at Foxwoods.

To all the friends I've made in the newsroom – Brady, Merritt, Marz, Suds, Sacco, Amy, AMP, Meadow, Courtney, James, Scott, Dupes and God knows who else (sorry, sports only has two pages today and Suds has diarrhea of the keyboard) – thank you for making all the time down here enjoyable. It wouldn't have been possible without all of you. Sports guys, you know you'll get more ink in the Misties tomorrow. Until then, I'm still waiting for the Whatels Diner to build a Collegian room.

To my professors who actually inspired true thought and education, especially Julius Lester (everyone at UMass should take Political Change in the 60s before he retires), John Brigham, Art Keene, Steve Smurda and Stephen Pelz. There are few classes and professors I wish I had more time for, but yours were definitely the exception, even if I didn't always agree with all of you.

Sam, you've been gone a year and this place is still standing. Amazing. When I first met you I never could have imagined we'd be good friends. Now I can't imagine that we wouldn't be. Wish I could work for you again.

Casey, you're an inspiration. I feel really lucky that our paths somehow crossed this year.

MJV, your guidance and assistance has definitely put me on the path of journalistic success. You've certainly done more for me than you needed to, and I will always be indebted to you. Oh, and I would definitely name my fake band October Jones if I had a fake band that needed a name. It that makes sense.

ADVICE

To anyone who wants to be a sportswriter, the key isn't being a journalism major (although it would help), it isn't to know a lot about sports (although that does help), the key is to get down to the Collegian as soon as possible and start working on your writing. Learn how to cover a game, write a preview and put together a feature. Learn all the little rules and nuances. Learn how to deal with coaches and players. But basically, get yourself down to the Collegian newsroom and work your tail off until you graduate.

One thing I've learned in my three years here is that going to class is essential, but working on your writing is much more important. Obviously, you need to get good enough grades to graduate, but if you want to leave UMass with a full-time job writing about sports, you better be willing to put the 50-or-so hours a week in. We have people who are here every night until 2:30 a.m. They get four hours of sleep every night. They give up partying or playing PS2 every night. They have made the necessary sacrifices. A lot of schools have people like this.

Do you want to be one of them or do you want to work at Burger King?

Your choice.

STORIES I NEVER GOT TO WRITE

U Mass – conference realignment possibilities, Katie Nelson feature, why parking services is run by the devil, how much I hate the lack of windows in the Campus Center Basement, the "I wouldn't want to be the GM to choose LeBron James over Carmelo Anthony in the NBA Draft" column, what I really think of the Wolf, the Jack Leaman feature (see other story on back page), the Sanger NFL stuff, the Reshamwalla/Briggs feature, the Cahoon-a-ville stuff, and much more.

CHEAP PLUGS

If you are one of the two or three people on campus that actually reads my writing and likes it – you must be crazy – but you will be able to read a weekly column by me at www.crazyclem.com and regular sports journalism at www.thetranscript.com.

Otherwise, good luck and enjoy college. It will be over sooner than you can imagine. Ask out that cute girl (or guy) in your psychology class. Scream your head off at a hockey game. Drink too much at McMurphy's. Act stupid. Don't regret it.

Not that I ever want to write a term paper, study for an exam or try to stay awake in class again.

Jim Pignatiello was the most unlikely sports editor in Collegian history.

Jack Leaman, at 71-years-old, still holds court as the Stockbridge golf team's head coach. The man who once coached Dr. J now directs athletes on a different surface, in the game that keeps him young.

In Leaman's terms

As a golf coach, UMass legend keeps link to past

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

Inside the clubhouse at Rhode Island's Cranston Country Club, Jack Leaman makes his command. "You sit here, you sit there, you sit there, you sit over there," he says, pointing to a chair in each corner of the room. Four freshmen, minutes removed from 18 holes of brain-draining golf, are about to be tested again. This time, with an entomology quiz on turf insects.

"I'm not screwing around," says Leaman, the 71-year-old coach of the inconspicuous, UMass Stockbridge School of Agriculture golf team. "I don't want these kids getting behind in their classes."

At his age, Leaman could be living in a golf-carts-only resort in Florida. Instead, he's the coach of an athletic afterthought, playing substitute teacher in a makeshift classroom stocked with Titleist balls, Ping putters, and Nike pullovers.

The only way we could arrange for my students to take the quiz was for Jack to administer it at the golf course after the players had completed their matches," says Dr. Pat Vittum, who has been teaching that Stockbridge class for 12 years now. "It worked out just fine."

Of course it did. If Leaman thought otherwise, that foursome would have been sitting in Stockbridge Hall at 11 a.m. Not in a club-crammed van headed to Rhode Island.

Don't think Leaman is still around because of some foolish obsession with winning. If the team drops a match, "we don't go to Cooley Bridge and jump off of it," he says. "We accept it for what it is." That is, a mutual love for a game infamous for inspiring mental foolery.

But golf, Leaman will tell you, "keeps me young." He loves to play it, even though he's not as long off the tee as he used to be. And he "still can hit 80 every once in a while," which is absurd for a man his age. That, and he talks about his "six one-inch hole-in-ones" with so much passion (and surely pain), that you somehow wish you could give him one for Christmas.

He loves to watch it, too. He talks about Palmer, Nicklaus, and the Old Course at St. Andrews like a 5-year-old talks about Mickey, Minnie and Disney World.

"What's the one with the big bunker on 17 where you can't even hit it forward, you have to hit it backward?" Leaman asks, shaking his head and laughing. All of sudden, his rhythmic, gravelly tone gets louder, and you can tell he's come upon another memory.

"I remember somebody hit it about 460 yards and it rolled into that bunker, and then made a seven," he says. "To me, that's what is fun about golf. I love watching people play like that on courses like that. It's fun to watch great players play go through those situations and to even see them make a mistake once in a while. It makes them human."

This, from the so-called mortal who's been coaching in at least one sport since before they closed Alcatraz. From the guy who coached Basketball Hall of Famer Julius "Dr. J" Erving as a college All-American. From the all-time winningest basketball coach in UMass history, with a career record of 217-126 in 13 seasons, eight Yankee Conference titles and six NIT appearances. This, from the guy who, even though "I am retired, by the way," still provides color commentary for every UMass men's basketball game on WRNX 100.9, is the Stockbridge school's athletic director (it also has a basketball team), and can be found most mornings working in his office on the top floor of the Mullins Center.

"My philosophy has always been a doer," says Leaman, who also coached the UMass men's and women's varsity golf teams before they were defunded in 1984. "If there was nothing for me to do, I think I'd be lost. I really do."

Leaman doesn't care about the closet-like size of the windowless office he shares with his broadcast partner, and friend, Bob Behler. He's too busy to be bothered, as his desk clearly illustrates. There are probably 100 of those trusty manila folders, each stuffed with a glut of papers, stacked next to piles of media guides and video tapes. Schedules are hanging everywhere, in between an NCAA Tournament bracket and a score sheet for the Stockbridge golf team. And then there's the phone, which is seldom on the hook.

But to Leaman, this isn't work. "This is fun for me. I enjoy it," he says. The days of basketball-induced stress are long gone. A couple autographed pictures of Dr. I and a photo with former player and hoop celebrity Rick Pitino, which decorate his office wall, are the only lasting remnants.

Still making do

Art students have been using poor facilities for 40 years

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

It isn't easy to find the new Foundry Annex.

On the northernmost end of campus down a winding farm road, 12 sheet metal trailers sit in a row in the lonely shadows of Tillson Power Plant. The last of the trailers, No. 66, is white. The University of Massachusetts Physical Plant has added a large awning and several outlets to one side of it. The other side has been tagged with graffiti – the illegible green bubble letters stretching over the surface of the rust-encrusted white sheet metal.

Students using the trailer work with metal sculptures and welding. They lost their facility April 22 when a fire ripped through the New Massachusetts Foundry Building – an all-wooden structure that had only local fire alarms and no sprinkler system despite the welding equipment in use.

"It was a tender, dry wooden building with no interior fire protection at all," said Norman Phillips, a retired Art department professor who worked in the Foundry for nearly 30 years. "What went on there during a class with sparks flying and open flames and occasionally molten metal [splattering] ... it was just something waiting to happen."

While multi-million dollar projects have been constructed elsewhere on campus, the lean-to trailer is the latest in a series of subpar, temporary facilities that Art department students have used over the last 40 years due to a lack of money in the Fine Arts.

"It's deplorable, considering the way things are elsewhere," Phillips said.

Phillips mentioned the Art Barn, Clark Hall and Marshall Annex as sub-par accommodations that the department has used over the years for a lack of a better place to go. All three are still in use by the department.

SARAH LEIGH/COLLEGIAN

Many Art Department students in the welding program will finish their years off working out this storage trailer on Tillson Farm. The students lost their facility when the New Massachusetts Foundry Building burned down last month.

"The Art department was always clamoring for a new building," he said. "I think it's obvious the Art department got the dregs."

There is no sign of conditions in the buildings improving anytime soon, either. Dennis Garbiel, a supervisor with Physical Plant Operations, says the University has no money to upgrade. After 32 years at UMass, his job as Zone Five Supervisor is to oversee the maintenance of 33 buildings, including the Fine Arts Center, Clark Hall, Marshall Annex and several other buildings used by the Art department.

"We basically just Band-Aid the buildings," he said. "There's so many violations, I wonder how they get away with it."

Garbiel says it's likely a fire similar to the Foundry could happen again.

"It didn't take too long for that one to go up, did it? The way they spend money on those buildings, somebody's going to get hurt one of these days," Garbiel said.

MARSHALL A MESS

Marshall Annex shares a hill with the rubble that once was the Foundry. It's a gray all-wooden structure that houses both studios for graduate student painting and part of the Art department's sculpture program. Choked with vines that snake up the outside of the building and are now invading within, the building has already been condemned at least once.

John Townsend, a retired Art department professor, says that the building was brought to UMass in the 1960s as a temporary fix for a space crunch. Originally an army barracks before it arrived, it's been used for many things since, Townsend says, including the home for a quail experiment years ago that left the building "smelling like a chicken coop" for about 10 years.

Garbiel says that Marshall Annex was supposed to be boarded up last year.

"The building was scheduled for demo, and something happened. Obviously, that's [a lack of] money," he said. "They did some hodge-podge stuff just to make it where they could use it."

Dan Wessman, studio technician in the annex's woodshop, says the building was condemned after an electrical fire broke out last year in the building. The fire started with an old outlet.

According to Wessman, the Art department asked for a reprieve on the demolition of the building last spring unless the University could find another home for the facilities housed in it. A contract was taken out to update wiring, and a contractor began rewiring last summer.

"They may have finished it to the terms of their contract, but we're still working with some of the antique wiring," Wessman said. "It didn't get us to the point where we're using new wiring in the shop."

Wessman says he went to the Physical Plant in the fall to ask for updates to lighting in the building and "enough outlets to run hand tools safely."

The Physical Plant wanted about $12,000 to carry out the request, Wessman says. It was more than the department could afford.

In the meantime, students continue to use power tools with antique wiring. Unlike the Foundry, Marshall Annex does have a sprinkler system to fend off any fire. Wessman says it has local

Potential streakers warned of drastic consequences

By Amy O'Neill
Collegian Staff

In an effort to halt the traditional "Streak Night," held in the quad of the Northeast Residential Living area, the administration at the University of Massachusetts has issued a statement warning those who would participate.

The statement says that people participating could be charged with indecent exposure, and as a result may be required to register as sex offenders.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, Joanne Vanin, had advice for students who were thinking about participating in the event this year:

"In one word – don't."

The administration is saying that this event has become out of hand in recent years, and has put students in danger because of it.

"[It is] not a safe environment – people are endangering others," Vanin said. "This is not a fun event to be a part of."

Chief of the UMass Police Department, Barbara O'Connor, said that although this event took place at UMass in the 1970s and 80s, in recent years it has gotten out of hand. O'Connor said that six arrests were made during the event last year. The charges ranged from disorderly conduct to assaulting police officers to assaulting police horses.

"Indecent exposure is defined by law, and the law will be governed by police action that night," O'Connor said.

According to Chapter 6 section 178C through 178P of the Massachusetts General Law, all persons convicted of a sex offender crime and living or working in the Commonwealth must register with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts Sex Offender Registry Board. O'Connor said indecent exposure, which one could be charged with for streaking, could be considered a Level 1 offense, which would require registration.

Students who are arrested and charged with indecent exposure may have to deal with not only criminal charges, but they may be referred to the Dean of Students office as well and face suspension or expulsion.

"Students need to be aware that if they cross the line, they may be impacting themselves seriously down the road," O'Connor said.

Students living in Northeast feel that the police and the administration may try to prevent this event from taking place, but that it probably still will.

"I don't know how they are going to prevent it," said one resident of Northeast.

A Northeast Area Government House Council member, who asked to remain anonymous, said that he tried to arrange something that would distract students from streaking but still give them something else to do, but his idea was turned down by the administration. He said that he believes this event will still happen and the police presence may just make it worse.

"[Students] are definitely going to do it," he said. "It is not even a question."

He said that he went to the administration with the idea of making the night into a dance, which would be fenced off in the Northeast quad, similar to the Orchard Hill Bowl Dance. He also suggested that there be a police presence at the dance to prevent students from trying to turn it into a streaking event. The administration, however, told him they would not allow any event to take place that night, and that police would be there to ensure that nothing happened.

"[The event is] unorganized. If it was organized, like a dance, we could prevent it," he said. "It would take away the riot feel from it."

Vanin and O'Connor both pointed out that the reaction from the police and the administration is not in response to the riots held in Puffton Village Apartments on May 3. O'Connor did say, however, that these events did alert them to how students may react in a riot situation.

"In light of what has happened at Hobart, I am concerned with the level of aggression students are displaying towards police – and that will not be tolerated," O'Connor said.

Students who are arrested and charged with indecent exposure may have to deal with not only criminal charges, but they may be referred to the Dean of Students office as well and face suspension or expulsion.

"Students need to be aware that if they cross the line, they may be impacting themselves seriously down the road," O'Connor said.

Vanin said that the most important thing is the safety of the students.

"My concern is that this spontaneous event has really reached a level that is unacceptable in the last [few] years," Vanin said. "We just can't have it. I am very much concerned with the safety of these folks – we are not going to tolerate behavior that breaks the law. The university cannot stand by and let this happen anymore."

SGA closes semester

Members of the Student Government Association Senate will convene for their final meeting of the year tonight.

Leading tonight's meeting will be a question and answer period with Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

"I believe he will be speaking to us about the budget and such," Senate Speaker Dan Saunders said. "We're looking forward to having him at the meeting since it's our last one."

Saunders explained that having Lombardi present will be good for the Senate, as it continues to build its relationship with the administration.

"We're still trying to build respect with both students and the administration and this has been a real learning process," Saunders said. "It's been a challenging year and I think that we rose to the occasion and have something to build on for next year."

Elections for Speaker and Associate Speaker are also on tonight's agenda. Saunders said that as of yesterday he was unsure of who was actually running for the position.

"No one really knows anything about it. A lot of names have been thrown out there but we have a lot of good young senators who I think would do a good job," Saunders said.

Motions on tonight's agenda are still unclear. However, an amended motion dealing with the Senate's seat apportionments is expected to be presented to the Senate once again. The original motion was tabled and amended at last weeks Senate meeting.

As this year's SGA Senate activity comes to a close at 7 p.m. in room 163 of the Campus Center tonight, members are looking to the future and what is next for the SGA Senate.

"Use the resources that we have, there are so many great faculty members and students on this campus and we are not alone. We have potentially 17,000 people backing us up," Saunders said, who will not run for reelection. "We need to listen to the students and if they're not telling us anything we can't do our jobs."

Al-Qaida believed to be responsible for attack

By Adnan Malik
Associated Press

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (AP) – Attackers shot their way into three housing compounds in synchronized strikes in the Saudi capital and then set off multiple suicide car bombs, killing 20 people, including seven Americans, officials reported Tuesday.

Authorities also found nine charred bodies believed to be those of the attackers, a Saudi Interior Ministry official said.

The bombings, which took place about 11:30 p.m. Monday, constituted one of the deadliest terror attacks on Americans since Sept. 11, 2001. Secretary of State Colin Powell said the coordinated strike had "the fingerprints of al-Qaida," the group that attacked the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"Terrorism strikes anywhere, everyone," Powell said. "It is a threat to the entire civilized world."

President Bush vowed to hunt down the attackers.

"These despicable acts were committed by killers whose only faith is hate, and the United States will find the killers, and they will learn the meaning of American justice," he said in Indianapolis.

In an address to his people, Crown Prince Abdullah, quoting from the Quran, said "hellfire" awaits the attackers.

"If those murderers believe that their bloody crimes will shake even one hair on the body of this nation and its unity, they are deceiving themselves. If they believe they will shake the security and stability of our country, they are dreaming," he said.

The assailants were believed to be linked to the May 6 discovery of a large weapons cache, Prince Nayef, the interior minister, told Saudi newspapers. Nineteen people were being sought and one person surrendered. Nayef told the al-Watan newspaper the suspect had offered "limited information."

Saudi officials said the group – 17 Saudis, a Yemeni, and an Iraqi with Kuwaiti and Canadian citizenship – was believed to have received orders directly from Osama bin Laden. They had been planning to use the weapons to attack the Saudi royal family as well as American and British interests, officials said.

There were conflicting reports about the death toll. Saudi officials said 29 had died, including nine attackers. A State Department official said 91 had died but later said the actual number was closer to the Saudi figure.

"The dead included Mohammed Abdullah al-Blaihed, son of Riyadh deputy governor Abdullah al-Blaihed, who owned one of the devastated compounds, said Hamad al-Otaidi, a spokesman at King Faisal Hospital.

Saudi officials said 194 people were wounded, most of them slightly. At least 40 Americans were wounded, U.S. Ambassador Robert Jordan said.

Art students make do with sub-par facilities

fire alarms only, though — alarms that Garbiel and his staff were sent to install as a part of the "hodge podge" maintenance done following last spring's electrical fire.

THE FOUNDRY'S RISE AND FALL

The Old Massachusetts Foundry Building got its start as the Art department's student welding center in 1966, according to Art department Chair Ron Michaud. Originally built in the 1860s, it was one of the original Massachusetts Agricultural College buildings.

Townsend says that there was no art building in 1966 when the department started looking for a place to weld.

The Foundry site was being used for the storage of mattresses when the Art department made the request to use the building. Townsend says that students and faculty members alike pitched in together to move the mattresses to a barn in North Amherst.

"We never had a budget to build a Foundry, it just came," he said. "Each year we would add a little bit."

Townsend says that with the help of Physical Plant, Engineering and students, the Foundry was built up over the years. Students in the ceramics program built the kiln that fire investigators were concerned contained asbestos over 30 years ago, for example.

"It was a terrific facility, it's just that it wasn't fire proof," Townsend said. "The reason we got by with it [being legal] was because of grandfather clauses."

Townsend doesn't think the picture that Phillips and others have painted of the Foundry being a firetrap waiting to happen is fair. He says that students and faculty alike were very aware of the safety precautions necessary to use the building for welding.

"It was not built to be an industrial quality foundry," he said. "It was a makeshift operation that functioned beautifully."

Michaud wouldn't agree with Phillips, either.

"The building was inspected routinely by the office of Environmental Health and Safety (EHS) as well as by the state building inspector," Michaud said. "We employed all manner of safety precautions. I think it was just that kind of safety and security that prevented any injury or loss of life on the night of the fire."

Phillips says he had concerns with the building's safety right along. He mentioned an "escape hatch" that he had installed so students could get out of the cellar of the building, where metal scraps were stored, in the event of a fire.

"I had Physical Plant put in a trap door through one of the windows on the west side of the building," he said.

Michael Swain, fire prevention officer with EHS, confirmed that the Foundry was to code and deemed safe to use. The building was inspected annually, with the permit renewed one year at a time. No major fire prevention system was ever installed because it was not legally required on a building that age.

Lindsay Stromgren, an assistant fire chief with the Amherst Fire Department (AFD), says that if the building had either an operational sprinkler system or something more than a local alarm, the fire probably would have been much smaller because they would have responded to it much more quickly.

"When we got there, the fire was already through the roof," Stromgren said. "At that point, the building is largely a write-off."

SARAH J. MUIR/COLLEGIAN

The Art Barn is one building that could be replaced and demolished within the next five years.

MAKING THE BEST OF IT

Students in the Art department's welding program will finish their year out working in a variety of places, including the Foundry Annex and the New Africa House, according to Michaud. He isn't sure what will end up happening to the program in the future.

"It's hard to say. We're trying to see what we can do on a more permanent three to five-year basis," he said. "We're also pursuing some possibilities of connecting with the Five Colleges to see if there's something that would benefit all of our programs."

Beyond that, Michaud says that the department is waiting to see what happens with bond money tied up at the state level right now with UMass President William Bulger and Governor Mitt Romney.

The bond proposal could potentially bring a new $12 million art facility to UMass within the next three to five years, but it hangs in the balance. Bulger's office submitted a second bond proposal last week after Romney denied the first, saying too much money was being spent at UMass-Boston on dormitories.

The Art Department asked for a reprieve last spring after an electrical fire broke out and the building was condemned. The fire started with an old electrical outlet.

James Cahill, director of Facilities Planning, says that all of the original proposals that UMass-Amherst had made on the first proposal also made it into the second bond pitch as well. Another of the proposed improvements calls for an upgrade to the campus' fire loop, making it possible to have fewer buildings with local alarms. The existing system is at capacity.

According to Cahill, the new art building would house the programs currently located in Marshall Annex, the Art Barn, Milkers Bungalo as well as the Foundry's welding program and the printmaking program that is currently in the Fine Arts Center. The tentative location for it is across N. Pleasant Street from the Fine Arts Center.

"We would hope to demolish these older buildings," Cahill said.

Until then, the existing facilities will have to suffice, leaving the Art department to make the best with what is available.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, MAY 14, 2003

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Staying aware of UMass news is important this summer

As the school year comes to a close and the last issue of The Collegian is being distributed, all of us in the Campus Center basement that make this publication possible would like to thank the University of Massachusetts community for its support.

With that thank you, though, we'd like to pose a reminder and a caution to everyone who returns to Amherst for another semester in the fall.

UMass is in serious financial trouble, and many decisions will be made this summer while we as students are all in our respective hometowns, working our part-time jobs and internships and spending time with our families. The University faces a potential $40 million cut in finances, and that cut could become official when state legislators vote on the budget the first week of June.

The situation is dramatic in the extreme," Chancellor John V. Lombardi said at a Faculty Senate meeting last Thursday. "It ticks me off. I'm really angry about it and trying to keep my humor."

If Lombardi is that concerned, we should be too. The University of Massachusetts is our home for most of the year, and every decision of great magnitude affects the way we live our day-to-day lives as students on campus.

Lombardi will face many tough choices when June comes. While he has prioritized things on campus and put them in an order that he says will affect the campus least, there's the very strong potential that something the student body considers important could go. It may even be inevitable.

When these decisions are announced, the choices will be made loud and clear in newspapers and the media in general. Stay informed. Discuss them with your friends, family and fellow UMass students. Gain an understanding for what is going on.

In the past few weeks, The Collegian has reported the potential cut of the General Physical Education (GPE) program, and that the administration is considering changing our Minuteman mascot. These are the types of issues that as students, all of us will need to watch for this summer. The fact that there are already things slipping through the cracks and making it into the public sphere should tell us that there is plenty more to come in the way of changes.

It is our duty as members of the student body to pay attention to state politics. Be pro-active this summer. Write letters to the editor in other newspapers and write to state legislators and campus administrators. It can do nothing but help our campus' cause. If you have concerns, speak up. Grumbling in a corner instead of taking action will solve nothing. The decisions that are made in both Amherst and Boston could dramatically change the way parts of our campus work, and the only way to have your concerns heard are to voice them.

Above all, remember that the actions of the student body could have a big impact on the way future choices are made.

There are always consequences to the actions we take. In the case of budget cuts, the biggest crime would be taking no action at all.

Notes from the Campus Center basement

Regan McKendry

Remember your senior year in high-school when you filled out the memories section of the yearbook. There was a litany of initials and events that only needed a one-word description. College is filled with similar sorts of memories, yet the difference with putting them in The Collegian is that many more people will be reading them without having a clue.

I could write one of those cheesy senior columns about the sudden epiphany I've had now that UMass is giving me a piece of paper that is imprinted with the word diploma. I won't. Have I learned many things in college, both academically and even more so about myself? Absolutely. However, there's still so much farther to go. I'm heading west to Wisconsin in the fall for graduate school as my trip though life continues at warp speed. Now is a good time to look back and remember.

CompSci TAP people get first props. I may not have stuck it out in the major, but I'm still down there in Washington, a five-year member of the Southwest South crew. Joe, thanks for being there to provide me with another sports fan, even though you do like the Yankees. You're one of my two Big Apple teachers, even though you're as much from New York as I am from Boston.

WMUA: so much potential, so far to go. This campus is home to one of the largest college radio stations in the northeast, but how many people on this campus know that? While I still make my case that mainstream music would garner better listenership, the fact shouldn't be ignored that regardless of the music played, the station does a great disservice to this campus by continuing to focus on outsiders as much as it does.

Adam, someday the people will understand, but we can't say we didn't try.

Sports broadcasting, on the other hand, has created so many memories. From calling my first basketball game backwards for the opening 10 minutes down to this past weekend's NCAA lacrosse win over Hofstra. WMUA Sports has been an integral part of these past five years. Corey and Perrault, thanks for taking a chance on a kid with next to no athletic experience in anything. Tony, continued thanks for one of my strongest friendships made at UMass. Festo, thanks for teaching me the ropes of lacrosse. Brady, things will get back to where they were...someone will step up.

Then there's the doctor. Rose, I knew deep down but didn't want to admit it, but I've missed you so much this past year. For all the headaches and all the fights, that year we were in charge rocked. You mean more to me than you know. Who would have thought that the scrawny little guy who never played organized football, basketball or lacrosse would not only call all three, but spend two years leading the group of people whose job is just that?

Likewise, huge thanks go out to Greg Cannella and the lacrosse team, as well as Marnie Dacko and the women's basketball team. It was an honor to be the voice of the Minutewomen this year, and this program will go places. As far as lax goes, Coach, you and your team have been so kind to welcome me into that special family. I have a lifelong love for the game now, considering I had only seen a handful of games before coming to UMass. May success continue to come your way, and the country finally start to notice.

Civil Engineering brethren, we made it, we're done. Now onto the real world as we try to make all our hard work pay off. Alex, we'll be working on something together in the future, I just know it. Thanks to Professors Hancock, Shuldiner, Switzenbaum, Lardner and the rest of the faculty and staff. For the little fish in the big pond, you finally created the small school atmosphere I so desired. We are the best in the COE, no contest.

Two people deserve special mention. Jen, you helped me learn more about myself than you will ever know. Mitch, if we could start it all over again, things would be different.

And now The Collegian. You finally got the kid who always hung out down there to go to work. While I may never be a journalist nor understand AP style (a comma will always come after and in a list), you did provide me with an outlet for writing over the past year and a half, and this was an interest I neglected for far too long. Mr. McCarthy, I hope I did you proud.

Lizzy, you have so much spunk. I don't know what you'll end up doing, but I know I'll hear about it. Kulak, it was great to have someone to talk with. Marty, thanks for sharing your smiling face with us each day and providing an oasis in the sea of drama that transpires down here. Smitty, good job.

Sasco, the other half of my Gotham instructors, you will be successful at everything you attempt, I am certain. If we all could tell a story the way you do, the world would be so better off. Suds, you've put up with more crap from me than anyone else at this paper, hands down (the couch). You also approach life with such a cool, calm, laid back manner, I only hope someday that I can enjoy things half as much as you do.

Dad, you missed a lot, but you're still my father. Tom, you've been a great friend that I couldn't stand to lose. Words can't describe the gratitude I have to my mother, so it's pointless to try. Regardless of where I am or who I become, I always have been and always will be your same special little boy.

In the movie "With Honors," Simon Wilder teaches Monty Kessler that graduating cum laude is not about course work, but about lessons in life. I may not have that A average I had in high school, and I definitely could not have foreseen what has transpired over these past five years. Yet, it is all part of me for better or for worse. It may not have been in the classroom, but I still earned my A.

Streak-fest tradition shouldn't be hindered

Gilad Skolnick

Another part of UMass has been erased, and this time it's not due to budget cuts from Beacon Hill or an explosion. The old tradition of streak-fest has been terminated, and I'm not too happy. A tradition in the Northeast residential area, every year at the last possible weekend before finals, guys and girls gather at night to bare all. It's an act of absolute freedom, for a brief moment shedding off all of society's rules and taboos for the sake of some good old fun. But sadly, this is probably not going to happen this year.

As I got up this Saturday at the early hour of 11, I opened my Internet Explorer, and as my home page the Dailyjolt.com began loading, I was stunned and my eyes froze on the computer screen. In big bold letters were the words "Streak fest canceled." The site stated that "Vice-Chancellor Vanin has announced that any students participating in Streak Night will be arrested and charged with public lewdness – conviction would result in the offenders being added to the sex offender's registry."

No, I am not a nudist. I believe that in most situations people should be clothed, and no, I would not participate in such an event, but nevertheless, if people want to shed off their clothing during some hot May night once a year, let them.

Rumors are that police fear a repeat of the Hobart Hoedown, the party a that two weekends ago resulted in a riot, the burning down of a bus station and tens of thousands of dollars in damages, as well as the hospitalization of police officers and students. The difference is that streak-fest is an event occurring on campus in a more controllable environment, which has a history that does not involve riots. Further, the police need a chance to redeem themselves.

In the Hoedown police were said to have arrested students without good reason, Maced innocent bystanders and hit dozens of students who were not involved in the riot. Group punishment should only be used when there is no alternative and when there are lives in danger. If someone hurts or causes property damage let them be the ones fined and arrested, rather than punishing everyone. If someone hurts or harasses another individual, let that guilty person be the one to suffer the consequences.

> "...I would not participate in such an event, but nevertheless if people want to shed off their clothing during some hot May night once a year, let them.

The punishment for participation in the annual streak-fest is quite severe and unreasonable. If a student participates they may be added to the state sex offender's registry. Now how many people hanging around Northeast dorms on a weekend night would be offended by a girl taking her top off? If someone wants to do so, then they should be allowed to. This is a college environment, not some residential neighborhood.

In nearby Hampshire College, nude Frisbee games are held, and I am told that there are occasional nude runs throughout campus. If you take a step back and look at the world spectrum, many tribes in Africa and tribes in South America see nothing wrong with being topless. In the 19th century, American explorers reported that tribes on the west coast were composed of people completely in the nude, and the list goes on. Dozens upon dozens of tribes in Indonesia are composed of topless men and women. Should the Mentawai Tribe of Indonesia be labeled a bunch of sex offenders?

I'm not even going to start going into the fact that our society is so sexist that men are allowed to walk around topless but not women. No one should be pressured to shed off their clothing, but this is a once-a-year event, a tradition and really a bunch of college students dancing at night without cloth covering their bodies. Is it that harmful? These are just our society's artificially constructed taboos. I call on the UMass administration to reverse its decision on streak-fest and let a tradition go on living. It gets quite hot in May, the stress piles up, let streak-fest be.

It's not about the flies

Julia Maguire

When you think of Australia, what usually comes to mind? Maybe you don't really think about Australia that much so what question is moot. However, it's a place you should start thinking about because it has so much more to offer than you think (if you ever do).

Years ago, I didn't think Australia was that different from Mick Dundee's backyard, basically a desert where crocodiles grab your canteen and you're unfamiliar with the concept of being mugged. That's not an entirely false depiction, but the most interesting thing about Australia is that there are people like Dundee living right next to people who own yachts and work in office buildings. Of course, when I say right next I mean thousands of miles, but considering their variant lifestyles, they might as well be from a different country.

Seeing the Australian outback was like being in a different country after spending four months in an Australian city. It is the least populated place on earth, with one person for every 50 square kilometres. There is a cattle farm that is over a million acres. That's bigger than Northern Ireland, and not a single person lives on that land. If you're not catching my drift, it's a big place that is mile after mile of nothing. There is one highway that runs through the centre, and its most frequent visitors are road trains and tour buses.

> "That's not an entirely false depiction, but the most interesting thing about Australia is that there are people like Dundee living right next to people who own yachts and work in office buildings."

I was on the latter, driving in a big bus with no bathroom through the remotest place, where if you wander too far away from the road, it is more than likely you've invited upon yourself your own demise. Other than that it was a great place to visit.

My first tour guide was Chief. Chief was a simple man who didn't change his clothes for three days. He also happened to swim and sleep in those clothes, but who is he trying to impress? Aside from the smell, he also happened to be rather authoritarian. "Everyone on the bus right now!

You are done looking at these things you may never see again. Let's go!" I got the impression that after conducting this tour for more than three years, he didn't care if anyone saw this place. Ever. It wasn't like I needed more than a half an hour to look at some rock formation, but I would have liked the option.

That tour entailed getting from Darwin to Alice Springs. Now, again, if you've ever thought about Australia you'd know that's a long way. In three days I spent more time on a bus than all the bus trips in my whole life combined. That's a slight exaggeration, but it was a lot of time.

Plus, there was nothingness that went on forever outside my window. It was actually mesmerizing how desolate it was. And dangerous. Australia is home to nine of the ten most poisonous snakes. There are crocodiles, dingoes and intense heat. So in retrospect, the bus was the perfect venue to take in the journey.

Once we arrived in Alice Springs, we had to say goodbye to Chief, who was real broken up about it, and said hello to Donna. She eased the tension of the new group by informing us that we had been staying at the hotel where her daughter was conceived. And now that none of us felt awkward, we headed to the highlights of our trip.

That highlight was a rock. There are heaps of rocks in Australia, but there is this one rock. It's special because it is nine kilometres in circumference and 348 metres high (I don't know how many feet that is, but trust me, it's high). It's called Uluru, and it was one of the most amazing things I've ever seen. It is a spiritually sacred space for the Aboriginal people, and with good reason. Every side of the rock is different, and according to Aboriginal legend, every crack, cave and hole tells a different story about their people's creation. There's a very different feeling attached to these stories when the object you read them off of is literally attached to the earth. The only drawback to fully immersing yourself into this monolith is the fact that you are surrounded by flies. Now, there is a difference between normal bugs and these monsters. Bugs give you the illusion they can be controlled, but these flies make you feel like a beast of burden. They just sit on your head, and your only defence is a swish of the hand that dissuades them for a microsecond. But I shouldn't be distracted by these petty things. I am now able to say I stood at the base of one of the most extraordinary geological structures on the planet that I didn't even know existed six months ago. What I am saying is that if you don't think about Australia, you should start, because you never know what you can find here.

The top of the hill

Sanam Hakim

Today is the last day of classes. Take a deep breath and say that sentence out loud for a moment. "Today is the last day of classes." It really is a beautiful sentence, filled with a vast ocean of underlying implications and mysteries.

By itself, the word "today" implies so much more than just a definition. Today means that it is not tomorrow and not yesterday. It is a given moment in time, to be lived as such. If you say the word over and over again, it almost sounds like an eighth day in the week. Since last Thursday, the last day of classes has been "this coming Wednesday." Right now, at this given moment in time, the last day of classes is today.

The verb "to be" is a very underrated word in the English language, particularly the word "is." It gives the sentence life. If you think about it, this year went by really fast. It feels like only yesterday that I was holding an upside-down map, trying to figure out which Morrill Science building I was in. Now I know that they are not in numerical order. I know that Franklin is the closest dining hall to that building. I know that there is a bus stop right before them, but you have to pull the little cord or else the driver won't actually stop. I know I pass by them on my way to class everyday, but never acknowledge their presence, unless I have a review session in one of them. You live each moment in college knowing that more moments will come. Today, you realize that classes are over. The college moments are put on hold because you realize that the last day of classes "is" today.

> "You spend the entire semester going to lectures, preparing yourself for fifty questions that will determine how fast you fall down the hill."

"The last day of classes" is the most exciting part of the sentence. Every morning that you dragged yourself out of bed doesn't matter anymore because today is the last time you have to regret scheduling a class so early. Every moment you spent wondering why you never dropped that science class is gone because you never have to sit in that lecture again. Every schedule you followed for every day is abruptly broken and handed to you to put together.

The last day of classes and the "designated reading period" are, basically, a gift from the University. This gift comes with a different card for each person. For some, the card says, "Just because the sun will rise is no reason to stop drinking." These people have two handles and three cases of beer under their bed that they plan on finishing before the school year is over. For some, the card says, "work hard, play hard." These people accept that they have to study, but also understand that it's the last weekend at school. For some, this actually is a designated reading period that will be spent reading. The rest are the envied people who will excel if they study or not, and the sad and pitiful people who will fail no matter what they do. The gift is there, but has no card.

It is a day to celebrate. Tomorrow morning can easily be sacrificed, which justifies any decision making for evening plans. There are no more papers to be written or math problems to be solved. There are no more lectures or discussions. Soon, you can just wake up and go the beach and not worry about a test the next day. You will be offered chicken that doesn't bleed when you put your fork in it. You will get to see your family, which drives you crazy, but you miss anyway.

It is a day to cry. Next week, you will wake up in your own bed at home. You'll go back to your summer job, mindlessly banging on a cash register, asking a customer if they want to save 10 percent and open a credit card account. When you get home, you follow your parents' rules and not your own. Your life will feel on hold until you're back at school again in the fall. To top it off, you still have a few more tests to take.

In many ways, the last day of classes is like the top of a hill. You spend most of the school year climbing the hill. When you finally reach the top, you look down and realize that you can fall down the hill a lot easier than it took you to climb it. You spend the entire semester going to lectures, preparing yourself for 50 questions that will determine how fast you fall down the hill. College shows you that the world doesn't care how you got to the top of the hill. The only thing it cares about is how you plan to get down when you're up there. It shows you the significance of effect and the unimportance of cause.

However, when all is said and done, today is just another day. It is today, and it will be tomorrow soon. If you fall or climb down that hill, you'll get to the bottom somehow. Look at today as a learning experience. See where you end up and who you end up with. Look at the decisions you make. Count the hours you spend studying and the hours you spend partying. When you look at the world from the top of the hill, it's easier to see the big picture. The last day of classes is your chance to look at your big picture. Let your thoughts be the narration to your story and the things you do, the objects in your picture. Don't miss your chance to see it, though. The picture will always be there, but the view will be gone tomorrow.

Observations in the dating game

Ben Feder

The dating system is too complex and obscure for anyone to completely understand. Men try to figure out women, while women try to figure out men in a dizzying whirl of emotion, romance and love lust. Dating itself is defined a number of ways for both genders. I myself have made some very interesting observations while wading in the dating pool, and have come up with some theories which may or may not help break the barriers between the sexes, so that Friday nights become more fruitful and less of a battlefield.

I am, however, going to present my observations through the eyes of a straight male. Considering, as one, this is the only way I've experienced the dating scene. But if someone changes the names or genders to his or her liking, I'm sure it'll still work and make sense.

Now, here's my theory. When a guy judges a girl from first meeting her or just looking at her across the way, he starts from the top of his list of personal standards and works down. Therefore, all ladies are potentially tens, and then he will work out the characteristics, personality traits and whatever his likes and dislikes are. A girl, however, starts from the bottom, absolute zero. You have to earn your points. They aren't automatically implied to be great, like when a guy judges a girl.

Why is this? Because girls have a very large and extensive history of jerks, sketch-balls, duds and losers in their past, and they know what not to look for. You have to prove your worth and that you aren't like "all the rest." Guys see two breasts, great hips and long legs, and that's already 90 percent of what they want in a girl.

Now you may be thinking, but I am a nice guy. I've never been a jerk. I'm a great boyfriend. So why are all your female friends complaining about their jerk boyfriends while you are sitting there, trying to be noticed? Nobody knows. You've probably gotten the, "you're such a great guy, why can't more guys be like you," treatment. Or my personal favorite, "there aren't any guys like you out there anymore." And now you think, "wow, if this is true I must be special, I'm unique, so why aren't girls bursting down my door to meet me?"

The best way to actually meet a girl is to be introduced through a mutual friend. This way, the girl's defenses aren't on because she figures if the both of you have the same friend, you can't be that much of a jerk like most guys are.

When you go out to meet a girl, they all have their shields up. You are an invader to their personal space. As soon as you walk over they, plus their friends, are wary of you. I say "they" because if one of their friends doesn't like you, you're finished. Move on and don't even try anymore because another girl's opinion is worth 500 times anything you have to say.

Let's say the conversation is going well, you are talking, making each other laugh, everything seems to going perfect. Now a few things can happen. First, one of the girl's friends sees a guy she knows and wants to introduce him to the rest of her friends, leaving you in awkward zone. Second, she gives you her number. Now this is tricky. Just because she gave you her number doesn't mean you're in. You have to take into consideration if she was in the right state of mind, if she actually wants to get to know you or if she gave you a fake number to make you go away. Third, she has to leave, you both say nice meeting you, and part. No number, no nothing.

Let's assume she left the party. You, she just met, so the only way to get anywhere with this girl is if, by chance, you run into her again, the both of you recognize each other, and start talking about the previous night's encounter. The only problem is this campus has 24,000 students on it. Either the girl doesn't remember you, doesn't want to talk to you or you most definitely will never see her again.

Sure, this isn't the only way these things happen. They are, however, the most prominent. Should I give up? No, I can't. I'm a guy, and as one, all I think about are women. So the only thing I can do is sit and wait. Which, as I stated above, doesn't work. So I have to go out, hopefully meet someone new, not seem desperate, have them want to get to know me and also see them somewhere on campus, and hope that they still remember who I am and what my name is. Good luck to that.

The art of procrastination

Adrienne Bossi

As the end of the school year approaches we find ourselves rushing to complete a mountain of things. Amidst final assignments and exam preparation, we begin to get sentimental about the conclusion of yet another school year. My experiences during this time of year have also been full of desperate attempts to procrastinate. I can't get enough procrastination. I seek it. Completing those last few assignments is so utterly painful. As finals approach I find myself and many others I know trying to fill the time with any activity that's not schoolwork. In my two years at college I have come across some very successful procrastinating activities. Don't tear your hair out from finals stress; just ignore it the same ways I have.

Once at college, our lives in our rooms seem to center around AIM. So, it would seem appropriate that procrastinating also centers around the internet. My first experience with this was with a Snood addiction. I did not know one person without it on their computer. Snood is somewhat similar to the old school Atari game Ball Pop. There is really no easy way to explain it. Just download it and get addicted like the rest of us.

Another computer game I became enthralled with was The Sims. I am not proud to admit that I was part of the craze. I even had the hot date expansion set. My brother gave me the game as a birthday gift early in December – i.e. just in time to not pay attention to my finals. Not only can you build and decorate houses, you can create people and their personalities. It's the perfect game for control freaks. You get your Sims jobs, friends and lives. With my expansion set I could build a town and stores. My Sims could then call a cab to bring them and their dates to my town. Although this game is highly addictive it is also somewhat expensive. Unless someone else buys you The Sims, this procrastination device may be limited to high rollers.

This semester the computer procrastination trend continues. Those of you out there still looking for an enjoyable way to put off your work should listen up. By now half of the people reading this agree with my views while the other half thinks I am a huge nerd. But either way, I dare you to check out Fly the Copter. The simplicity of this game is where the beauty resides. The graphics consist of a cartoon helicopter, a black background and green rectangular obstacles. Although the visuals suck and there are about three sound effects, you cannot honestly tell me this game is not more addictive than crack. For now I challenge you to just try and beat my high score of 2,019. If you're an extreme procrastinator, try beating my nerdy friend Eric Jenike's score of 2,860 or his even nerdier friend's score of 5,000.

> "Those of you out there still looking for an enjoyable way to put off your work should listen up."

If this game doesn't tickle your fancy, then try out Yahoo's "Super Text Twister." You can download a trial version off of Yahoo (or, if you're hardcore, you can go gangsta and get a bootlegged version off of Kazaa). Disclaimer: this game is for huge nerds. You are presented with six or seven letters randomly displayed that you must form words out of. To proceed to the next level you must make a word using all the letters. Additional points are awarded for words made from a combination of some of the letters. I know I'm a dork, but Super Text Twister is so much more entertaining than reading for my finals. I doubt anyone can beat my high score of 96,760.

If these suggestions don't seem to fulfill your procrastination need, then you can always take the more traditional UMass route. I have found there to be three common paths to follow among all UMass students. The first is to play the only PlayStation2 games anyone ever buys, Grand Theft Auto Vice City, Madden or NBA Street. The next option is to simply drink and/or smoke away your finals. The last option is a mixture of the above two. (But really, where is option two and three going to get you in life?)

If you are a procrastinating machine looking for a way to put off finals, I hope I've offered some useful suggestions. Procrastination is bittersweet. We know we have to get our work done, but putting it off feels so utterly marvelous. Although I am not promoting blowing off exams, I understand the necessity and enjoyment of the quality time spent procrastinating. If my nerdy computer games, Snood, Super Text Twister and Helicopter don't fulfill your urges, then perhaps the more traditional (less nerdy) route is best for you. These dawdling methods must be used with responsibility. While procrastinating is cool, failing is not. I claim no responsibility for anyone's poor academic performances during finals due to my article. Good luck to you all.

Keeping two cents is practically worthless

Will Hillyard

One of the things that really ticks me off is paying for something in a store and getting a bunch of random change in return. Practically everyday I buy something that costs $5.12 or $17.61 or some other seemingly random value. This is an aggravating and altogether unnecessary problem. And pennies are what makes it all possible.

Whatever function pennies once served, they have long ago outlived it. Pennies are a living antique, a remnant of a bygone era when everything cost a fraction of what it does today. When was the last time you bought something that cost a quarter or less? The vast majority of today's products cost at least a dollar, meaning that pennies are totally unnecessary.

Of course, pennies are a vital part of our economy, but the reason why is a stupid one. Except for rare exceptions like gas and liquor, all products are priced without tax added. Which, as I'm sure you're all aware, means that the display price is less than the actual price paid at the register. There are several problems with this policy. First of all, it serves no functional purpose. Advertising a lower price does not save the consumer any money, and shoppers are already aware that tax will be included. Furthermore, it is inherently dishonest. The vendor is advertising one price and then charging another. But the biggest problem is that instead of selling something for an even $5.00, the same item will instead cost $4.99 plus tax. The actual price once you get to pay for the item will be something like $5.24. Obviously, it's necessary to have pennies in order to account for those last few cents.

But all of this is ignoring the issues surrounding pennies themselves. Perhaps the most serious is that they contain zinc, which means they are poisonous. I can attest to this from personal experience because my dog once ate a few pennies and almost died as a result.

Ever since, I've made sure to do my best to keep pennies out of my house, because she would almost certainly die if she ate another one. Other coins are not made of zinc, so they don't pose the same potential health hazard.

In addition to this, pennies are by definition practically worthless. It takes a whole handful of them even to buy a gumball. Which does not mean that you actually could buy a gumball with pennies. Vending machines won't take them, and someone would have to be a total jerk to try and use them in a store. So what are pennies good for? It's a difficult question to answer. And if tax would be included and prices rounded to the dollar (or quarter or dime or nickel) there would be no need for pennies at all.

A world without pennies would be a better one because people would no longer have to guess the price of an item they were buying. Nobody would accumulate a whole jarful of pennies that they didn't know what to do with. No longer would pennies take up space in people's wallets, cars or under couches. No longer would they be such a hassle to deal with. Pennies are a familiar feature of life, but an entirely unnecessary one. The advantages of eliminating pennies far outweigh the benefits of keeping them around. All in all, it simply makes too much sense not to do away with the penny. And ultimately, the question has to be asked: Would you really miss them? I know I sure wouldn't.

The crack of the bat

Eric Martignetti

Last week, the Massachusetts Interscholastic Athletic Association (MIAA) voted 10-6 against an initiative for the exclusive use of wooden bats for the 2004 season. It's the wrong decision.

Major injuries in the 2001 and 2002 seasons forced all Massachusetts schools to use wooden bats in this year's playoffs. In 2001, a high school pitcher in Wellesley was airlifted to a hospital after being struck in the head by a line drive. He lay in a coma before he eventually recovered. There are three reasons why wooden bats are a better alternative.

First, wooden bats are safer. Metal bats typically have a length-weight differential of minus 3, meaning that a bat 33 inches long weighs only 30 ounces. Wooden bats have a maximum differential of minus 2; most have no differential. Because of their length and weight, wooden bats can't be swung as fast as metal bats. In addition, metal bats have a "trampoline effect" in which the bat compresses on contact, then springs back to propel the ball. Wooden bats have no such effect.

Metal bat proponents would like to think that the potential for injury is just as great with a wooden bat as it is with a metal bat. And they're right. The possibility that a player will be struck in the face or head is independent of bat type. However, with a metal bat the severity of the injury is greater. Because the bat is being swung more quickly, the ball is being hit back more quickly as well (remember Newton's Third Law of Motion?). A quicker ball means a player struck by a ball will absorb more impact. The result is a more severe injury.

Second, the technology is here. Although they're dubbed aluminum, some metal bats are made of titanium, graphite and other advanced materials. Some bats are "end loaded," with extra weight and pressure in the barrel. If leagues continue to allow players to use featherweight bats that produce heavyweight power, the potential for injury becomes greater as technology gets better. Rather than invest the resources into creating such dangerous bats, manufacturers should spend time on producing a bat alternative.

> "Metal bat proponents would like to think that the potential for injury is just as great with a wooden bat as it is with a metal bat. And they're right."

A company called Metal Wood has begun to experiment with metal-wooden bat combinations. The shaft is made out of the same material as a metal bat, but the barrel is entirely wooden. Thus, a player can swing the bat almost as fast as a metal bat, but the trampoline effect is eliminated. The Metal Wood is more comfortable and more durable than wooden bats. More research and experimentation are needed, but the technological advance cannot continue if it ignores safety issues altogether.

Third, hitting with wood is more fundamental. Two big arguments against wood are durability and effectiveness. Wooden bats, though cheaper on an individual basis, are more expensive in the long run because they do not last. Metal bats can last years while a player may go through four wooden bats in one season. Again, technology is helping improve wooden bat durability. Coaches and players also point to studies at Amherst College, Brown University and elsewhere that prove batting averages are higher and home runs more frequent when metal bats are used. But the era of the 20-18 game has eroded the skill of baseball players.

The art of hitting a baseball with a wooden bat takes much more skill than waving a tech-powered metal bat. Wooden bats require hand eye coordination because a player needs to hit the ball consistently in a smaller sweet spot. Power from a wooden bat requires full arm extension. Players must throw the bat head through the ball and hit the ball in front of the plate rather than on the plate.

Last, if there is any question as to which bat may be safer, leagues should err on the side of safety. Parents would be more than willing to see their son hit a double instead of a home run if it meant that he would be safer in the field. Pitchers everywhere would be less fearful of the shot back up the middle. And purists would love to retire the ping of the swing in favor of the inimitable crack of the bat.

Must see rock shows to check out during summer

The summer is coming up. Real fast.

You know what that means? Awesome rock concerts.

Summertime is the time that I go to the most concerts, and I find that summer tours are always the best for rock n' roll. The concert is almost always outside, the weather is nice and warm and being that it's summer, your only responsibility is to enjoy the concert.

Rockin' Out

Samara Marblestone

As a rock fan, I'd like to dedicate my last article of the semester to advising you on what rock concerts you should attend this summer.

Lollapalooza '03 will begin in July and touring with the festival will be Jane's Addiction, Audioslave, Incubus, Queens of the Stone Age, A Perfect Circle, Jurassic 5, The Donnas, Cold and The Distillers. The main acts that I'm excited for are Jane's Addiction, Audioslave, Incubus and Jurassic 5. Queens of the Stone Age is nothing special, except for the fact that Dave Grohl is the drummer. A Perfect Circle is not really my thing, and I never heard of Cold or The Distillers. The Donnas, however, suck. I don't know why anyone would invite them on a tour, especially one that has a good reputation.

Ozzfest 2003 should be amazing. The tour is starting in June and will feature Ozzy Osbourne (duh), Korn, Marilyn Manson, Disturbed and Chevelle. Ozzy will, of course, be incredible. I saw him perform once in Black Sabbath, and I have to admit – he was kind of creepy. Korn is unbelievable too. I saw them perform last summer, and these guys have insane amounts of energy to share (I love it). My absolute favorite of this tour is Marilyn Manson, because like I've mentioned before, he is one of the best rockers I've ever seen. He scared the crap out of me, and I loved it.

One last tour that I highly recommend is the Aerosmith/Kiss tour starting in August. I've seen Aerosmith four times in concert, and they put on a great show. The best part of their live shows is that they perform different versions of their hit songs, which is always cool because you never know how they are going to sound. Lead vocalist Steven Tyler puts on a great show and appreciates his audience, which is key. If you're lucky, you'll be close enough to touch the scarves tied to Tyler's microphone. I've never seen a Kiss concert, but I would love to. You have to give credit to any middle-aged heterosexual man in make up. They just seem like a fun bunch of boys. I'll definitely find out this summer.

Don't get me wrong, there are tons of other rock tours making their rounds this summer. Pearl Jam, REM, Radiohead, Zwan and other such bands will be cruising around the country, but I wouldn't run out to see them unless you're a diehard fan. When I look for a rock concert to go to, I look for energy. The three tours I mentioned above are high-energy tours that will make you more excited than a dog about to go on a walk. I'm sure they will be expensive, but definitely worth it.

Enjoy your summer, and make sure that it's filled with as much live rock n' roll as possible. Listen to it while your ears still work. I know I will!

Talk to you next semester.

LISA MARIE LACKS BUT Ms. Dynamite explodes

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

Ms. Dynamite certainly lives up to her name in her debut album, "A Little Deeper."

The latest young talent to emerge from London's fertile UK garage scene, where she won the country's prestigious Mercury Prize, Ms. Dynamite is an MC with a raw talent America is just waiting to discover.

Ms. Dynamite is a true success story. She started off from the bottom rung of the music world and has worked her way up using passion fuelled by a desire to be heard and to break conformity.

Growing up as a battered black woman who had no money, Ms. Dynamite offers inspiration to those who are currently in the shoes she once was in and to those who simply need some positivity in their lives.

Ms. Dynamite elegantly blends hip-hop, reggae and dub on "A Little Deeper," Reminiscent of Lauryn Hill's "The Miseducation of Lauryn Hill," Ms. Dynamite delivers pop at its highest power: bold lyrics that focus equally on Ms. Dynamite's life (keeping a guy in check) and social concerns about the present and future.

Ms. Dynamite doesn't ask for respect, she demands it. "Musta thought that we'd always be together... U thought wrong," she spits on "Sick 'n' Tired." On "Put Him Out," Miss Thang gives advice to a female friend to kick a thug-like boyfriend to the curb.

"Dy-Na-Mi-Tee," its staccato groove draped over Ms. Dynamite's silken come-hither rap, is a deserved hit. "Afraid 2 Fly" opens with gorgeous claps of thunder behind piano strings until it finally takes off into crunchy beats where she manages to be both mournful and elevating.

Ms. Dynamite never shies away from what she has to say. "Tell me how many Africans died for the baguettes on your Rolex?" she raps on the lead single "It Takes More." This is pretty heady stuff. But don't be afraid of the content. Infectious grooves percolate under warm, silky vocals or ear-popping raps;

GEORGE LUCAS LAUNCHES FILM ANIMATION DIVISION

LOS ANGELES (AP) – George Lucas has added an animation division to his special effects company Industrial Light & Magic in an effort to gain a corner of the fast developing digital animation business.

The new operation, Lucasfilm Animation, gives more independence to a small existing animation department within the company.

"Lucasfilm Animation will now have the flexibility to develop and create its own films," said Lucas longtime spokeswoman Lynn Hale.

"It's extremely exciting to have the opportunity to start the search for directors to build projects around."

The 58-year-old Lucas, who's preparing his sixth and final "Star Wars" installment, wasn't immediately available to comment on the move.

The division's staff now includes only nine people headed by senior vice president Patty Blau, but is expected to grow.

The venture comes after Lucas spent nearly six years trying unsuccessfully to break into the feature animation business working on studio-controlled projects.

Digital animation has become increasingly competitive.

In 2001, Pixar Animation Studios and its partner, Walt Disney Studios, hit the jackpot with "Monsters, Inc." That same year DreamWorks SKG's Pacific Data Images cashed in with its film "Shrek," and 20th Century Fox's Blue Sky Studios did well with last year's "Ice Age."

Sony Pictures also recently created an animation division.

FILM PROMPTS REISSUE OF FORGOTTEN NOVEL

PHILADELPHIA (AP) – A documentary film is giving a forgotten novel another shot at fame.

Dow Mossman published "The Stones of Summer" to critical acclaim in 1972, hailed as the voice of his generation. Then he disappeared.

Filmmaker Mark Moskowitz wanted to know why. He traced his search for the forgotten author in his documentary "Stone Reader," shown last month at the Philadelphia Film Festival.

The film caught the attention of Steve Riggio, chief executive officer of Barnes & Noble, who paid $1,775 for one of the few remaining copies of the book.

Fewer than 4,000 copies of "The Stones of Summer" had been published by Bobbs-Merrill in 1972. Moskowitz has described it as a "forgotten masterpiece" acclaimed by critics but largely overlooked by readers.

Barnes & Noble announced recently that it will reissue the novel. On pre-orders alone, "The Stones of Summer" has been as high as No. 9 in sales on Barnes & Noble's Web site.

"I think it's a great American novel," Riggio said. "I felt it was right for us to do it."

Mossman, who has returned to his native Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where he worked as a welder, said he's learned to use a computer and is writing eight to 10 hours a day.

"It was thrilling to live long enough to see this happen," the 60-year-old said. "I think you have to go through 30 years as a welder to experience what this feels like."

Mossman, who never made more than $7,000 for the novel when it was first published, will get $100,000 for the reissue. Barnes & Noble is giving Moskowitz's Lost Books Club and Jet Films a $200,000 grant that Moskowitz said will be used for the promotion and release of "Stone Reader" in 30 additional markets.

"I realized that I didn't have to keep pushing to get it published. I thought this would happen, but with a very small publisher," he said. "It's thrilling. Steve Riggio's heart was totally into this thing."

OWENSBORO SYMPHONY DIRECTOR LEAVING TO TAKE POST IN TEXAS

OWENSBORO, Ky. (AP) – M. Wade Kelley, executive director of the Owensboro Symphony Orchestra since 1997, will resign later this month to take a job with a symphony in Texas.

Symphony officials began planning their search for a new executive director last week and hope to hire someone by August, said Robert Reed, president of the Owensboro Symphony board of directors.

Kelley is resigning to take the executive director's position with the symphony in Richardson, a city of about 91,000, about 10 miles north of Dallas.

The number of symphony performances increased 45 percent during Kelley's tenure, the Owensboro Symphony said.

ABC attempts to boost ratings: TGIF tradition to resume in fall

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – Struggling ABC will revive its "TGIF" Friday night comedy lineup this fall in hopes of delivering more laughs than its rivals.

The network, a dismal fourth in the ratings for most of the past few months, will introduce four new comedies and three new dramas in September.

The WB network also planned to present its new schedule to advertisers on Tuesday.

ABC's fall lineup will have 10 comedies, probably expanding to 12 in the following months, said Lloyd Braun, ABC entertainment chairman. NBC will have eight. CBS, which releases its schedule Wednesday, currently has six.

The new "TGIF" lineup will include the returning series "George Lopez" and "Life with Bonnie" and two new shows. It will be less teen-oriented than before. ABC abandoned the idea a few years ago, but will still appeal to families, Braun said.

ABC executives said they heard a constant refrain at public appearances, particularly at colleges: "Whatever happened to TGIF?"

"It was destination television," said entertainment president Susan Lyne, "and when we realized how much affection there was for the brand and for the idea of good comedies on Friday night, it was a no-brainer."

One of the Friday comedies will be "Hope & Faith," starring Kelly Ripa as a washed-up soap star going back to live with her sister, played by Faith Ford.

ABC is also keeping "The Practice" on the air, and moving it to Sunday. In something of a surprise, "Dragnet" also returns, but will be renamed "L.A. Dragnet" and introduce several new characters.

"The Bachelor" returns for a fourth attempt at matchmaking. ABC will broadcast the two-hour wedding of former bachelorette Trista Rehn and beau Ryan Sutter in the fall, with a two-hour preamble.

ABC News gets a third newsmagazine, "Primetime Monday," to air before football. The network also said John Stossel will become Barbara Walters' co-host on "20/20," replacing John Miller, who left the network.

"The Wonderful World of Disney" will move from Sunday to Saturday. ABC will air more adult movies on Mondays after football ends.

ABC's other new series:

"10-8," a drama about rookie cops in Los Angeles that will air on Sunday nights.

"Back to Kansas," a comedy starring Breckin Meyer as a New Yorker who moves to Kansas to be near his wife's large family.

"I'm With Her," a comedy about a high school teacher who dates a movie star, created by Chris Henchy – a relative unknown who's married to Brooke Shields.

"It's All Relative," a comedy about a woman, whose parents are two gay men, marrying a man with blue-collar parents.

"Karen Sisco," a drama based on the character portrayed by Jennifer Lopez in "Out of Sight," about a sexy U.S. marshal in Miami.

"Threat Matrix," a high-tech drama about the Homeland Security Agency.

Dancing with an ancient mystery: the watchful eyes of Sicily

By Lauren Aufiero
Collegian Correspondent

SICILY – One evening in Taormina, I sit perched like a tiny bird upon the orange-tiled roof of our hotel. As I overlook the surreal skyline of a white-capped volcano peak under a waning purple sky, a quote from Batman movie comes into my mind.

"Have you ever danced with the devil in the pale moon light?" This is that light, I think, repeating the joker's fast, breathy phrase over and over in my head.

What will Sicily's pale moonlight show me? What will it hide? In a blur of thoughts, I begin to frantically scribble in my travel journal. Mt. Etna watches me in my hour of enlightenment. Even as darkness creeps over the steep cliff, I can still see her towering silhouette, spying on me, provoking me. Mt. Etna herself has eyes. I cannot divert my concentration from the eyes of Sicily. Whether they are haunting me or I am haunting them, I will never know. All I can do is record what I have been shown, and write.

I knew from the start that eyes would come to embody my travels in Sicily. They seemed to call out to me from wherever I looked with a mutual curiosity only I was gifted to see. Was I crazy? Maybe. Looking a little too hard? Always. As everyone else searched for the tangible paper topic, such as fishing, religion or the isolation of island life, I discovered the utter perfection in a more fleeing and intangible theme. Eyes were not only a world in themselves, but they blended into the worlds of everyone else's topics. Why limit yourself to one topic when you can touch them all in one metaphor? The more eyes I found, the more my excitement and obsession grew. The layers of meaning were as deep as the ocean. A mystical side of Sicily was opening her eyes to me, and I wiped my lashes, and my lense, clean and opened my eyes right back.

The critical moment had to come several days into our journey. It was here that literary fate sent me a message that I will never forget. It was nightfall in Palermo and I was on a hunt. After an elaborate seafood dinner of countless courses, my sweet tooth was crying for some sweet loving. Gelato, the dessert of the gods, was what it craved. Gelato came to be my creamy, frozen delicacy of expertise after ten days of conquering cup after cup of incorrectly pronounced flavors. Spotting a gelateria in the distance, I raced from the rest of the lagging group towards its bright lights and red and green awnings.

Entering any Gelateria in Sicily is like entering a big-top circus: the dizzying colors, the lively Italian music, the stuffed animal displays and the yellow and blue tiled floor. Sheer bliss seized me when I saw the glistening case spanning almost the entire width of the store, the effect similar to that of a mind-altering drug. My eyes

Exploring Sicily: What's around the corner

By Melissa J. Eaton

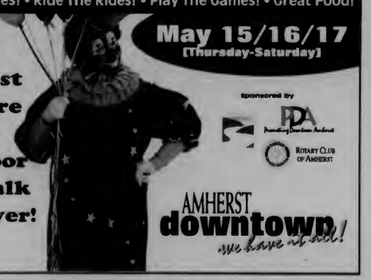
SICILY – Driving to Erice with a group of 42 travel companions, the bus winds back and forth on the many roads that look like the switchback folds of ribbon candy. With every turn, something new and amazing can been seen through the great picture windows of the bus. We pass. Passing by little farmhouses, easily overlooked while gazing at the many rows of olive and lemon trees, . . Thethe bright yellow fruit pops out, drawing our eyes' attentions on this dreary overcast day.

Coming around the corner, I get my first views of the Monti Madonie, the Madonie Mountains. "Stop the bus!".

Piling out into the gray morning light, I see that the true colors of the landscape are even more brilliant then than I thought looking through the bus windows. It must have been a sight watching almost 40 people hobbling up a hill, attempting as we attempted to sprint to the top andtop to get the best pictures of Sicily's amazing landscape. The mountains surrounding me are white from rocky summit to pointy tree line. The light snowfall from the night before looked like confectionary sugar softening the rough rocky peaks.

Splashing against the roadside, a sea of lush green grass rippled ripples in the breeze, and the sun spotlighted spotlights the surrounding valleys surrounding us. The green of the grass was is unlike anything I have ever seen in the United States- not even on well-groomed golf courses. The sight of it took takes my breath away.

Standing alone on the hillside was is an abandoned house. The light casting down through the missing roof illuminates a surprise hidden within its walls. Coming around the corner and going into the door, I see a field of wild flowers growing among the lush green of the grass. It seems like I have discovered a little hidden treasure within the Sicilian countryside to which I am the only witness. Well, me I and the other 30 students who have invaded this house's solitude.



It fascinated fascinates me to the point where I can't stop looking at it. The crumbling walls are all that remain of this mysterious structure standing guard over the valleys and hills beyond. I could sit and look at it all day, exposing all its secrets, exploring it, but the whole album's a listening pleasure. Indeed, what's so strikingly ingenious about the project is its ability to blend both a hip-shaking mainstream sound with lyrical depth and vision.

At points the album could use a bit of jolt ("Anyway U Want It," "All I Ever"), but the musical diversity (accordions? trumpets?) makes up for the low points. There's no two ways about it: Ms. Dynamite has made an album of astonishing power, strength and feeling.

She's already big in her native England; let's hope Ms. Dynamite blows up stateside.

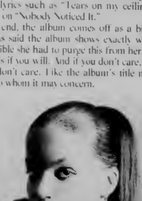
LISA MARIE LACKS HOOKS

Let's cut to the chase: Lisa Marie Presley's debut album, "To Whom It May Concern," is not as bad as one may think.

Being the daughter of Elvis and Priscilla Presley, most would believe Lisa Marie was trying to cash in on her name. Held up to public scrutiny since day one, it was only a matter of time before Lisa Marie released her own album. At 35, it took a bit longer than anticipated, but it's finally happened (although rumor has it she's been working on it for eight years).

The doubts about her artistry sprang from more than just her surname. Her image conjures up similarities to Jennifer Lopez – where the actual material takes a backseat to the image. And who can forget her embarrassing marriage to Michael Jackson, one of just three matrimonies (the latest to Nicolas Cage)?

But besides the tabloid-sensationalism, we know very little of Elvis's daughter. Now we know: don't be fooled by the rock's that she's got, this 'aint no Jenny from the block.



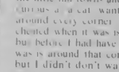
More concerned with heartbreak than materialism, "To Whom It May Concern" is a 12-song set of country-flecked rock with pockets of pop for good measure. Confident, solid and a bit deep, Presley's vocals resemble those of Sheryl Crow's. Produced by Eric Rosse (Tori Amos), Andrew Slater (Fiona Apple, Macy Gray) and Danny Keough (Presley's first husband), it's got a bit of a calculated feel, but at least Presley's trained throughout.

She lashes out to parasites with bitter lyrics on much of the album. "I'm no longer your erection, or your congregation, I'm your disease" she growls on "Better Beware." "You just won't catch me once again don't you," she asks on "Sinking In." She even takes aim at herself on "Important:" "Maybe if I got it together again I wouldn't be belligerent and such a princess."

The album isn't without its problems: most notably its disappointing lack of hooks. Hooks – those catchy motifs and refrains – make a pop song great. But the album's lack of that juice is why it hasn't exactly been selling like hotcakes. This is a woman who's a right fit with the Adult Contemporary market, but little else.

Then there's the ambiguous, if not altogether incomprehensible, lyrics such as "Tears on my ceiling/ Weren't you watching" on "Nobody Noticed It."

In the end, the album comes off as a bit self-indulgent. Presley has said the album shows exactly who she is, so its quite possible she had to purge this from her system – a form of catharsis if you will. And if you don't care, she doesn't care that you don't care. I like the album's title makes clear, this album is to whom it may concern.



Ms. Dynamite blows up on her debut release "A Little Deeper," which is already a hit in Britain.

Dancing with an ancient mystery gelateria, has one old, fixed eye and one fresh, moving eye.

The eyes of our first stop, Cefalu, greeted me on every cobblestone corner and winding coastal passageway. A tiny fishing village out of a storybook, Cefalu is the type of town in which you picture Pinocchio turning into a real boy. Maybe this is why almost every tourist tee shirt from Cefalu has a picture of Pinocchio on it and all the trinket shops sell wooden Pinocchio puppets in every size. Lost in a pristine period of time and grace, Cefalu is very much as unaccepting to modern culture, as her worn-smooth cobblestone streets would lead one to believe. Protective mothers and grandmothers clutched their children into black, lace-trimmed shawls as our group made its way through the town's labyrinth of alleys and side streets.

Suspicious eyes watched our every move. Even the curious little children were hesitant to get close like the plague of our 21st century modernism was a disease that might befall them. From twisted iron chairs outside cafes and pasteries the old men watched us, chewing on soft rectangles of golden brown panini oozing with melted white cheese and thinly sliced pink ham wrapped delicately in wax paper. Their eyes scanned each of us in hypnotic gazes. I was a dangerous stranger, my blonde hair as alien as the awkward hunk of Mitsubi metal around my neck. The doubt we raised was unnerving. Photographing these people seemed impossible, but we

Central America revealed: A portrait depicting Costa Rica

COSTA RICA – When the sun rose in the morning and the roosters began to cry, we awoke. The small square foam mattress released our imprints and our bodies rose to meet the warm air in earnest. Opening up the door to our room, I peered out to see if the Scarlet Macaws were around. A pair of brightly colored red, yellow and green birds with piercing eyes usually arrived around breakfast time to beg for food. Sensing that they were not there I took my next steps toward the small bathroom downstairs.

Five horses came running around the corner with two Costa Rican teenagers casually strolling behind them. I stopped and leaned over the railing to watch as they rounded up the horses and led them into the backyard of our neighbors' house so they could graze. The air was already hot and gave clues of the heat that the day was going to bring. We were in the beginning of the dry season, and already each day's temperature rose to nearly 90 degrees. It was best to get going early before it got too hot.

The bathroom was small and had a rubber hose draped over a cement wall for a shower. A curtain and a toilet were the room's only other furnishings. The cement floor hosted a variety of visitors each morning. Mostly worms, an occasional baby snake and toads the size of a loosely clenched fist. While I washed up, Taylor put on a pot of hot water for coffee and tea. When I was done washing and the coffee was brewing, we switched places and I finished preparing breakfast. After we ate, washed the dishes and swept the floor, the Scarlet Macaws arrived.

"I'm going to give them some left-over pancake and some peanuts," I said. I put the food on the wooden stairs that led to the second floor. Taylor took my picture and I quickly snatched away my hand just as the birds moved forward to devour the food. Their powerful beaks cracked open the shells and sliced the pancakes in a matter of seconds. Something about their yellow eyes really freaked me out.

Taylor ran past the birds and up the stairs to change. After a few moments she yelled, "Scott, the birds won't let me out of the room." I looked up the stairs and saw the two birds pacing back and forth in front of the closed bedroom door. I went up to try to help Taylor, but the birds went after my bare feet with their beaks. I ran down the stairs and grabbed the broom. The neighbors watched. When I looked up again I noticed that the birds had strategically positioned themselves so that now, one of them was in front of the door and the other was posted on top of the railing next to the stairs. They screeched each time one of us made a move. Finally, Taylor made a run for it and landed safely on the first floor, leaving the birds screaming with rage. We went to each other never to feed them again and watched our neighbors' faces glaze over with laughter.

Later that day while I was out at the store buying fresh fruit and vegetables for lunch, one of our neighbors came over and handed Taylor a plate of Yucca root, goat cheese and freshly-picked berries. I came back to our house carrying a huge bag full of food that had cost no more than three dollars. The berries looked enticing and I put three of them into my mouth before washing them off. After taking a closer look, I noticed that they all had tiny insects crawling around inside of them. The Yucca root had been cooked in lard, and the goat cheese tasted pungently fermented. We decided not to eat any more of the food, but planned to prepare a meal to bring over to our neighbors' house later anyway.

Taylor wrapped up a box of crayons and put them with some paper for the three-year-old girl next door. I put our vegetarian fried textured soy protein into a container with some rice. We walked over to the neighbors' house together. The floor inside was tattered and the walls were brown and layered with years of dirt. The small girl opened up her present and a delighted smile arrived on her face. Her grandmother accepted our food and asked us if we liked the Yucca. We told her that we did. She led us around the house and into the backyard. Her living conditions were drastically opposite to anything that I had encountered in the United States. It was as if her house were half inside and half outside. One look at the goat cheese press had me thanking God that I did not eat more than one bite of it. The unsanitary conditions of her kitchen were desperate.

The four of us stood in the backyard not entirely sure of what to talk about. Language kept us at a clear distance from each other. The exchanging of food allowed us to interact. Though we came from different places and lived completely different lives, there was something inside each of us that desired an exchange. That day we experienced the differences of our cultures, yet we felt connected in our hearts.

Exploring the nooks and crannies of Sicily

it's tiny, to go. The bus has to move on, delivering its 42 passengers to Erice including myself, to Trapani, a drive back to group travel.

All over Sicily and the world there are corners. Corners just waiting to be explored and that is just what I did do on my trip. Walking through the little hill towns and larger cities I was an as curious as a cat wanting to know what was around every corner. I always felt feel a little cheated when it was is time to turn back to the bus before I had had time to explore what was around that corner just up ahead of me, but I didn't don't want to be the one to hold everyone up, or be left behind and risk missing a whole new place. I found find amazing things around many corners and a few dead ends around others, but my hunger to explore was is not satisfied until I had looked to see what was is there.

In the hill town, Polizzi Generosa, the streets wind and turn back on themselves, leading in and out of small piazzas, creating a labyrinth easy to get lost in. My second fascination in Sicily was is the lampposts jutting out from the walls of the buildings. It could almost be said that I was am obsessed with them, and this obsession drove driven me to photograph them at the corners. It is during one of these drives that I come into a little piazza. Above my head was is a perfect specimen of iron spirals, wound around itself supporting the light fixture. Sneaking up the wall the remains of a vine from seasons past worked works its way over to the iron arm protruding from the peach cream wall. The vine's tendrils have snaked over gently tickling the lamps loops and spirals.

I bend down to compose a picture through my camera lens and release the shutter. Standing up, I notice a woman carrying a bucket come around the corner of one of the homes and go over to the waterspout. She places her orange bucket beneath the spout and turns on the water. A breeze blows more water onto the street then than into the bucket. The woman calls to me. She indicates the camera I have around my neck and poses near the waterspout. For the second times in minutes I find myself crouched near the ground, composing a picture while looking through my lens.

The woman is older with wrinkles cascading down from her dark eyes to her rounded chin. Her hair is a brilliant white juxtaposed against the orange-beige tanned skin. She flashes me a smile as she places five liver-spotted hand on top of the waterspout and looks right into the lens of my camera. I snap the picture hoping to capture the excitement on this woman's face. It is probably a common occurrence for a group of students come traipsing through this small town toting cameras and pockets full of film. I stand up and thank the woman, but she isn't done with me yet.

She calls to me and motions me to come closer. Grabbing my arms just above the elbows, she pulls me down and kisses me on both cheeks. I smile at her and am drawn deep into her eyes. She starts chattering to me at lightning speed in Italian. I smile and nod politely looking where she points. Not able to understand what she says I sheepishly explain in very poor Italian that I don't speak Italian. She stops, smiles at me again, nods, and says "Ciao" giving my elbows a small squeeze before letting go. I said say "Ciao," and walked away with a warm, wholesome feeling bubbling up inside me, warming me on this chilly afternoon.

Suds – anything I did right this year, I learned from you. Anything I did wrong was my fault. I'll always be a fan of your writing.

Sacco – since day one, you've made me strive to work harder than anyone else. You are one Red Hot Pocker. Busted.

Brady – you're my boy and you know it. We had such a good time covering football that I considered doing hockey. Good luck with the new project. I think you're going to make history with this one. I'd be privileged to play any part in this. I can't wait to see how everything turns out. Football was definitely the best beat I've ever had and you (and that little you-know-what) certainly had a whole lot to do with it.

Merritt – no one pisses me off more than you. Half of the time I want to smack you upside the head. And you know why. Because you've been referring to you as my little brother for a few weeks now and that's certainly what you've become to me. Everyone here is making my exit hard, but you are the one that I've done the most with. Any partner in crime, the only person who can really make me mad for stupid reasons. I know you'll do a great job next year and move the section in the right direction. The 2003-04 school year will be the hardest of your life. Your hair will turn gray (check mine out for evidence), your body will stop working parts around the age of 25 and your temper will shrink. And still, it will be the best year of your life. I'm sorry that I won't be here to witness it.

Marzelli – you've been like the golden child since you got here. I don't think you'll ever be able to realize all the potential you have, but as a freshman you certainly knocked all of out socks off. Awarding you as the rookie of the year was a real treat for me. Oh, and watch out for those scary AIM messages. Next year will be hard, but you guys will do great. If you live by the quote that leads the Mistys, you'll go far, man. Anything you need, don't hesitate to ask.

Boyd – I really wish you came down here earlier. You're a talented guy and I'd be privileged to think that I've had any kind of positive influence on your writing. Keep working at it and don't give up, you definitely have the skills to make it. Oh, and change that email address for crying out loud.

Anna – thanks for keeping the spurts stuff from being a complete boys club. Thank you for your professionalism and smile (and all the great tennis coverage). It's just too bad you are going back to England, you could have taken this place over.

Nick – another one going back to England. You took the ribbing as this year's British guy really well and we all appreciate it. I still don't understand the English you two write in half the time, but I'm sure someone out there got it. Good luck to both of you next year.

Todd – we've talked a lot recently, and I'm glad that you have learned from what has been a turbulent year. I know you wonder about your potential, but just remember this – you certainly have the ability in you, it is just a matter of conditioning your brain and body to be able to carry it out. We're expecting big things from you. I know you can do it.

Ari – I hope you have the time to continue to work with us. You certainly come down here with ideas I never would have come up with and I always like to keep tabs on the latest in sport management teaching. Good luck, man.

Glen – you're a traitor. The arts section will be lucky to have such a talented editor next year. I'm glad that the sports influence continues to spread throughout the paper. Now we just need to get another business manager from the section.

Amy – you entered a tough situation and made the best of it. I can't believe you managed to be assistant news editor for this long without ever really reading a news story. Very impressive.

Scott – I didn't really know you when you were hired as the managing editor last year, but once you hired me I figured you must be all right. I appreciate all the insight and respect this year. You've taken my sarcasm well, and I certainly respect that.

Dapes – I love your nickname, who came up with it? Good job in the position I created. I always felt better knowing you were on the Executive Board. Now that you are gone, I guess the old man title goes to Brady. I'm sure he'll appreciate that.

To the people that I just started getting to know, especially Kat, James, Charles, and so many more, our timing was bad, but I appreciate the fun.

All my other friends down here, thanks for making the time bearable and I wish you all the best.

I hate this place, more than I have ever hated anything. But if I could do it all again, I wouldn't change a damn thing. Thank you, Signal.

You forced me to Galway, to the most ridiculous four months of my life. To Niland House. To 202. To Crickey, D.H. and The Navigator. To all my Ireland heads. To Shop Street, to Quay Street, Guinness, Kilkenny and the Land of the Lazy. To DJ Paul Hannon. To the stage, finally. To dream again.

To Birmingham. To The Belfry, the Ryder Cup and The Red Square. To thinking Anuta, but I didn't, To Sacco's angels. To Newcastle. To the large, midget pizza. To elbow-dropping the large, dwarf pizza.

To London, to Chelsea-Middlesbrough (Thanks Geezer), to football (the non-American way), to Dream Team. To Edinburgh. And everything else, Aug. 29-Dec. 23, 2002.

Then I came home. To my family, the reason life doesn't ache. To America. To my biggest culture shock, ever. To Christmas break, Wartown, Estupido Studios (again), Heidi. To New York, New Year's, Shadow's roof, I-Love-New-York-Shirt girl. To Montreal, kick-off Roots show, MattyRay, "What if you lived...there?" Sonar, Marc Anthony, etc.

Back to UMass...The Nut, Uptown, etc. The Clap. San Francisco. Smitty. Rose. Kobo, Nomar, Anna (once Beantown, once Amherst). A-10 Shootout ('Span, we had them). MattyRay and Erratic, since 1995.

Spring Break. Dinwiddle. Charlotte. Sister Suds. Golf. Karate Kid and Ali. Teeny Weeny Green Bikini Contest. Successful search for balls. Quizno's. World Golf Village. We lost Disney World. How do you lose Disney World? "Good afternoon. Evening! Evening!" Uncle Brian. Q. Beer in the sink. Downtown Orlando, MGM. Rockin' Roller Coaster, Tower of Terror, Star Tours, the beginning of Sacco's end. Best onion rings this here side of life. Who wants to not be a millionaire? The Demars pad. Fantasia Gardens. Best golf shot of my life, E still wins shot of the day. Night one, Pleasure Island. Buckets, New Year's, Robin, Jenny from the block, cab, Tia Maria, the end of Sacco's beginning, bubble gum transformation, kick in the leg, history books. Epcot Center. Spaceship Hangover. Tacos. PI night two. Disney World. Splash Mountain. PI night three. "18 miles." Stat of the week. New York. Hofstra. Done, but the opposite.

Back to UMass, again... The single life, without motivation. Uptown, etc. Dancing in the street. Straw's birthday. Yoda, Tin Cup, Uptown cake in the face. Lacrosse tailgates. Mr. Scandals and The Ruthless Squadron. Vinny bin LaDuca. A-12. Steve visits, swimmer, sausages, slider. Spring Lake leisure. Beach Party. Celtics. Boom (for full version, refer to Sacco's). Peace to all my Sports section heads.

Cheers.

JEFF "BAD" BOYD
GRADUATING SENIOR

I for one don't understand why they call these the "Misty Eye" pages. As a graduating senior, I can't wait to finally get paid to do this crap for hours each week. I have dedicated my time to writing articles that I never get paid for. They shouldn't call these the "Misty Eye" pages, they should call them the "It's Finally Over" pages.

In all seriousness, I leave UMass with only one regret, that being that I didn't join The Collegian staff earlier. For three years I put off writing for The Collegian, and in my final year I finally decided to give it a shot. And let me tell you, the things that I have learned from writing for The Collegian are far more valuable than anything I learned in any of my journalism classes (I'm sure my professors will love to hear that).

The people that work day and night in the basement of the campus center truly don't receive enough credit. The sports staff is just as much of a team as any varsity team at this school. The people that I have met and the relationships that I have developed will never be forgotten, and I am saddened that my time at The Collegian was so short-lived.

There are so many people who have made my stay at The Collegian especially memorable so I'm just going to mention a few of them.

Mike Marzelli – I don't think that I have ever met anyone with more authentic sports jerseys than you. Do you even have any normal clothes? You are a true sports fan and your enthusiasm for sports is expressed in your writing. I am confident that I will hear your name somewhere down the road, either on ESPN or the Home Shopping Network (Yeah, you could be that guy selling sports memorabilia at 3 a.m.) In either case, I wish you only the best of luck and hope that you don't continue to dye your hair blonde.

Andrew Merritt – I hope that you fail all of your classes, too. When I'm sitting in McGuirk Alumni Stadium in my cap and gown, I will be thinking of you. A sophomore telling me I won't graduate – please! You still have two more years to go buddy, so now it's on you to get out of here on time. On a more serious note, I have enjoyed working with you for the past year and admire your maturity for such a young writer/editor. One day you will be running the show somewhere, and your staff will be lucky to have you.

Todd Foster – I swear to God that you are the Jeff Boyd reincarnate. Granted I'm clearly a better writer and much better looking, but listening to your stories is like dipping back into my own memories of freshman year. There is one major difference between us, however, that being that you actually took the initiative to join The Collegian as a freshman. The only advice that I have for you is to never take The Collegian for granted. You obviously have the passion to be a great sportswriter, and The Collegian is the perfect forum for you to expand on that. I know it's not always easy, but the time you spend writing for The Collegian will pay off in the end. Good luck, and always remember: study hard, but party harder.

Eric Soderstrom – In honor of you, I am writing this completely sh– faced. Enough said.

Matt Sacco – I don't even know where to begin? It's not like I really learned anything from you, but I will probably remember you the most. It must have something to do with the time that we spent together uptown. I still don't know who had more fun on your birthday, you or me. Our trip back to the dorms with Suds has to be one of the most memorable nights at UMass. "Hey Boyd, let's rip all this shit off the walls!" I admire your willingness to throw a few back and have a good time, but I especially admire your motivation to be successful writer. You are definitely going places in this world, and one day I will be proud to say: "I once wrote for the same paper as Matt Sacco." Best of luck to you bro, see you in the real world.

Jim Pignatiello – I don't have anything humorous to say here simply because I have nothing but the utmost respect for you. The manner in which you conducted our meetings and organized the staff is something that others should learn from. It will be hard to imagine writing under the tutelage of another editor. From you I have learned how to be a more responsible reporter and efficient writer. As I leave this university, I consider you to be my best professor. Thank you for giving me the opportunity to write for The Collegian, and thanks for making it such an enjoyable experience.

ANDY "THE KILLER" MERRITT
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

It's funny, a year ago, I was using this space to say goodbye to some people, and thank a few others. It took me a while to get all the words down, carefully selecting the memories and the people that I wanted to reflect on. And I wrote a lot, and I covered just about every important moment of my freshman year – one that started with me coming down here, bright-eyed and green, and ended with me signing off, bright-eyed and green.

But I missed something very important, and I didn't realize it until the next day, when it was too late. I neglected to mention one person in my Misty Eyes, and it's someone that should have been at the top.

I'll admit, I didn't really know who Jim Pignatiello was until second semester. And even then, I just knew the name, and saw the guy around the office every once in a while. But he became a good friend over time.

Still, somehow I omitted him from Misty Eyes, and he had a shining approval of me in his column. So here's to making up for one's mistakes (something I'm forced to do a lot).

Jim, you've been my guide this whole year. You've been my mentor professionally, and while I'm nowhere near the writer I should be, I would never have gotten to this point without you. Thank you for being there to remind me why I'm doing this.

On a personal note, you've been my best friend out here for a while now, and I never would have made it through certain days, nights, and weeks without you (Whately, boom box, 4 a.m.). I don't know if I'm ready to take the helm of this beast, but I'm completely sure I'm not ready for you to leave.

Still, you are, and you'll be missed, and that damn Transcript doesn't know what it's getting. But you won't be far, and there will obviously be diner trips aplenty. Just bring quarters, so we can have the Eminem-fest.

Moving on...

Marzelli: First of all, Jesus Christ, we went to Orono. We went from Marzelli's lower sternum to Marzelli's nipple. Good god, what a long trip. Started off in the wrong direction, because I still don't know a damn thing about this area of the state, but it got better from there. I listened to "Where the Streets Have No Name" roughly 30 times, getting goosebumps on every play. Finally got to New Hampshire...and left it. And then the odyssey that is Maine. Started off with all sorts of energy, and degenerated into G. Glove passed out in the back seat, and me passing out in the front. And then, the exits. EXIT! (20 miles) EXIT! (20 miles) EXIT! And finally, SIX EXITS IN BANGOR! Greatest thing ever.

So yeah, I didn't know who the hell you were at the start of first semester, I just know everyone thought you were "the one." Now I see they were right. It will be fantastic to have you as my right-hand-man next year, although I hear the newsroom is placing bets on which one of us snaps and kills the other one right after we send the Sports Mag to Turley. Nice job with the stepping up, rookie.

Sacco: You're still the first person I ever read when I came to UMass, even if I can't stand to read your stuff now. In all seriousness, though, you've been a big part of my college experience thus far, and since we all know you're going to end up at every hockey game next year, telling The Grille about the new transfer we got, I feel like it's not so much goodbye, as it is "see you later." But there are memories that I can't help but thinking of, like Toronto – the legend only grows with age. Numerous games of street hockey, nearly losing my kids as a result of your pinpoint accuracy, and raising my game to a higher level with you on the court, even if I still lost the lifetime series 40-0. Oh, and, Yankees Suck!

Suds: The first person I met at The Collegian, although upon our first meeting I was pretty sure I was headed for disaster. As it turned out, this wasn't the case, because you kept me in line, and while you may have given up the passion for this place, you helped me find mine. Good luck wherever you end up, which I'm sure will be far from here, and don't let BJR get ya down. I'll run anything you ever want to write. As long as it's more than 41 lines, jerk.

Brades: Not too much sentimental stuff to talk about here, since you'll be around next year. Can't think of a better person to head up the student jerseys, and I look forward to kicking people on their asses next year, both on the ice and on this campus. Make it happen, man, I can't wait to officially write this place off as a "hockey beat."

Straub: You nearly didn't get in here, somewhat because you've been MIA in The Mothaland for a semester, and more because you're crossing over to the dark side – and by that I mean arts. But you were my first beat partner on women's hoop before that little Marzelli f—er took it over when you left, and frankly, if it weren't for you, I'd probably have started every game story with, "The Minutewomen used the neutral zone well," or something. Here's to that sketchy trip to northern N.J., thank god we made it out alive, and thanks for getting us into Manhattan, even if it was just for a minute, and we couldn't find a damn 24-hour liquor store.

On to the new blood:

Boyd: I'll see you in the fall. Yeah, like I DON'T have calls into your professors to ensure you fail. Seriously though, good job this year, way to be. Still should have come down earlier. Don't ever make that mistake again, because you're a damn fine writer. Stay out of trouble, but enjoy life. And don't be afraid to come back down to the CC Basement every once and a while, I won't ask for more than 40 lines...

Foster: I know you've got it, kid, you just gotta realize it too. You're definitely going to be valuable down here next semester. Just get a better freakin alarm clock.

Bob: Same goes for you. You're gonna be one of the big guys down here, as long as you don't get your braincase cracked on the rugby pitch.

On another note:

Meadow: life is better, now that I know you. Gonna miss you like hell, damn Jersey girl. Viva Italia! (But don't viva there too long, okay?)

April: We're all gonna miss you down here, kid. Don't let the sun bleach your brain too much more, alright? And keep in touch, maybe we can get you to cover Chico's "streak night," if they even do that in CA.

And of course, the random memories (style patented by Messrs. Sacco and Suds):

By the way, remember My Cousin Vinny? Sack o' Suds, the store where the miracle happens – Sacco (n') Suds? Coincidence? Uh, yeah.

Fall...BTS...crap, back in the office already...Soccer season (yeah, I'm a sports guy, I break up the year by seasons. Get over it). Bus ride to BU with the guys, stopping off in Concord to take a picture of the Minuteman with the Minutemen (that's right, the Minutemen, always and forever), and then making sure Scuds and the other stupid freshmen don't spit off that bridge...being my own MedRel contact at BU because those idiots didn't think there'd actually be media there. Scuds and Aitch give me all the inside dirt...waiting for Deren to try the bicycle...there it is...on to Women's Hoop...trip to NJ with Glen, Lizzy and Regan...wondering if a vehicle has ever rolled off the Tappan Zee...sitting with Glen at the little press table, while 300 crazy St. Pete's fans scream behind us...SNEED!...Lombardi Rest Stop. I holy crap the self-serve BK sucks...Cage game – greatest idea ever, will never happen again...watching the Northeastern game from the stands because I was pissed about something...winter break...hockey...UNH, got there 15 minutes after pre-game started, but I got there...BU win, heart

MIKE "MIKEY EYES" MARZELLI
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

When I first came to Amherst, my goals were as follows: to study a little, try not to party a lot, and start making something of myself. So over the course of the last year I've gone two for three – I've studied a little and I think I've started to make something of myself. The partying? Yeah, hi mom and dad.

Moving along.

I started out the year as a correspondent, and that's funny to me because I remember being so nervous the first time I called a coach, or flying out of bed anxiously to see my first article in the paper, or seeing my first "staff" byline. Now I'm just as anxious to pawn off previews on my eternal beat partner and convince Eldridge to let my byline read "Collegian Sports Writer."

The point is, when the novelty of writing stuff that people actually read wore off, The Collegian evolved into my life here in the Happy Valley. My friends don't understand why I want a job that keeps me out till 2 a.m. every night, and all I ever hear from mom in our daily conversations is "I hope you're getting enough rest, Michael." But I know that when I start going to bed early, or actually start considering whether or not I get enough rest, that it'll be time to give up sports writing.

So until that point which will likely never come, here's to late nights and little sleep. Thanks to coaches O'Brien, Koch, Dacko and Stone and all the athletes who've loved me, hated me or stared me down from the mound at Fenway. My first year as a sports journalist was "wicked pissah," and next fall can't come soon enough.

Jim – what can I say? You were the first boss I ever had in this business, and I wonder if I would have been half as good as I am now without you. From the second you called me in to see if I'd take men's soccer I've tried as hard as I could not to let you down. I could have had an editor who didn't care about my writing, didn't know me personally or didn't offer me any help or guidance. Instead I got one who single-handedly did more for my writing than four years of high school English, one who was there for me through breakups, bad weeks and everything in between in becoming one of my best friends on campus and one who taught me more about how to succeed in this business in one year then I had expected to learn in all four. Every time I laid out poorly, used a bad headline, put the wrong score box in or just plain wrote like hell, you found a way to help me learn from it and treated me like you truly cared, because, well, I know you really did. So I wish you the best of luck in North Adams and with whatever you do. Not that you'll need it, though, you'll be at The Herald in a month anyways.

Mert – Ryan Center press row? My partner in crime. I guess it's you think about it, I might have always been "Jake" to you if fate, a.k.a. Jim, hadn't put us together in covering 5,489,034,890 different sports. Ryan Center press row? From soccer to women's hoop to baseball (for a little bit), we've been the true epitome of everything Lappas didn't have – a good team. And there is no other way for me to explain how you survived a stubborn ass like me other than the fact that you truly are one of the finest people I know. Ryan Center press row? From the second I got to know you, I have had nothing but the utmost respect for you, and because of that I know that if there is one person at this paper that is a surefire bid to succeed in this business, it's you. Ryan Center press row? We have a tough predicament ahead of us next year, but I can't think of anyone more qualified to lead this operation than you, you SIEVE. So rest up this summer, we got quite a life ahead of us next semester, the ninth level of the Fleet is no big deal. I'll be there some day anyway. Ryan Center press row, please hold for snow angel.

Brades – Damn you for supporting a Cy Young stealer. You were one of the first to believe in me as a writer and a reporter, and that is something I will never forget. You are definitely one of life's good people, and I like to think a lot of what I've learned this past year I've learned from you. Thanks for being a tremendous mentor, supporter and friend and never forget, "It was hockey at the Mullins Center, and it was beautiful."

Sacco – I didn't know there was such a thing as a decent kid from New York, but I do now. This paper wouldn't have run as smoothly as it did without you, and I never would have rushed Garber after the 'Cuse game if I hadn't seen you go first. Oh, and I'll think about playing hockey this Friday.

Suds – I used to like 50 Cent. Then we had a hip-hop conversation. Now I still like 50, I just like The Roots a helluva lot more. But yeah, the first thing I learned from you is don't mess with people's stories when they're better writers than you. The last thing I learned from you is that golf really isn't that bad. All in all, two good lessons on life.

Boyd – I'm still holding out for you failing and coming back to the staff next year, but if not, the hell with Ting. I know you'll do fine kid. You made it through college, you can make it through anything.

Foster – I was debating sending you this article through AIM. Stick with this, you've got a lot of potential if this is what you really want.

McGovern – Ditto. Stick with this, you can get anywhere you want if you put your heart and mind into wanting to do it.

Timmy Day – you may not be sports staff, but you're the future around here kid. Don't ever think otherwise because you've got what it takes. I just have one little bit of advice to help you get where you want to go: THROW THE F——N' FOOTBALL!

Football – Games when it was 100. Games when it was 30. Games in the rain. Games in the snow. In Krohn we trust...until he went headfirst, R.I. and the first ever successful draw on 3rd and long. Put DeShon under center and that's a damn option, or at least tell Bruce to run forward! Anton's block saved the Day. Hey did you hear Sanger has an...? Kimener-on-the-spot. Phantom offsides = heartbreak. Notre was open and we wait will next year...

Hoops – My first feature was Raheim, I guess I jinxed him. How do you blow a 50-9 lead? The same way you beat NC State I guess. There's a word for Troy Bell...Vini Vidi Viggi...Where did this home playoff game come from? REBOUND MEAH, PLEASE! Next year it is...

Hockey – WOW. Cappy beats BU, Cappy beats BC, the whole damn team beats Maine, TWICE! 6,000 for a hockey game? In Amherst? WEINER! WEINER YOU SIEVE! Winer is God, Mauldin is nasty and UNH is overrated. Next year is ours...

Baseball/Lax – FENWAY! Monster seats, the WEEI pressbox and a car full of stolen media guides. Stone doesn't want to talk and the rest are all staring at us with hate in their eyes, YEAH US! Diving on the pile after 'Cuse, turning my shirt inside out and going to interview Canella...real professional, this is the year...

ORONO – The year's most unbelievable day/night. EXIT! Where the Streets Have No Name...hey start it like ahead of us! And remember, the ninth level of the Fleet is no big deal. I'll be there some day anyway. Ryan Center press row, please hold for snow angel.

So again, to all those who have made this year all that its been for me, thanks. I've pissed off backup quarterbacks, pitchers and backup quarterbacks who pitch, all in a day's work, but in the end I love what I do and I wouldn't trade it for anything. So if the Sox don't kill me I'll be back next year, ready to do it all over again. Till then, peace and SIEVESIEVESIEVESIEVESIEVE...

MATT "THE DRIVER" BRADY
ASST. SPORTS EDITOR FALL 2002

"Much more to say than this postcard gives me room to write." – Josh Joplin Group, Waffle House Homecoming.

Misty Eyes Part IV, with Part V still to come. I have seen so many people come and go at this little rag, but the crop that is leaving this year is incredibly special to me. Time for my yearly tradition of goodbyes to four departing seniors, this time to four of the best writers I've ever met.

Jim – You were the last of these four that I got to know, but last semester you became like a brother to me. So many nights down here, so many articles written, so many harrowing moments on football flights. You taught me a lot about writing, but more about life, and for that I'm eternally grateful. And the Waffle House will always take precedence, my friend, always. Here's hoping the Transcript will let you cover UMass someday.

Despres – People's, People's and more People's. We had a conspicuous beginning, great times with Stone (legit, struggle) and many trips to and fro town. I maintain that you are the best writer I have ever worked with – you have this ability to get a reader in touch with his soul – and it is an honor to have worked with you. And I remain the only witness who can prove your innocence. "The infamous hookup" – at The Collegian party freshman year. Come out here so we can get Rao's soon.

Suds – What can I say? It has been fantastic working with you, drinking with you, partying with you, sitting in class with you...the list goes on. I've never felt more comfortable with myself around anyone than I am around you. I'm pretty sure I'm glad you got to go to Ireland, but on a personal note, I feel like I missed out on a lot of good times. And then I got married, which didn't help. If you don't go into sportswriting, it will be a shame, my friend, because you are so amazing all-around at it. I have never had more confidence in someone to blow my mind with what could have been a simple story.

Sacco – Wow. I can honestly say that I think I have wanted to kill you more times than anyone else down here, but at the same time, I've certainly smiled more times when I was with you than almost anyone else in my life. The Matts are no more, and that nearly brings me to tears. So many trips. What are the coaches going to do without the two of us? You paint a picture like no other, and your legacy will be felt down here for years to come. Thanks for everything.

I love all four of you and can't imagine what life will be like without you. Guess I'll find out soon.

Now on to the memories.

Ah, football season. It seems like years ago that you and I got into McGuirk for A-10 Media Day and met some guy named McCaw. The trips were unbelievable – especially when they featured barbecue. No rudeness. Where's the field? Oh yeah, behind that guy's driveway. Chuck taking us to the Texas Steakhouse. Getting hammered in the hotel. The sea of red. The intro. Oh, the intro. "Our band is better." Richmond – or is it Delaware? Best broadcast ever. Dinner with Behler and co. VOW-tour. Shady part of town. "This kid..." Watt, were you drinking that? Waffle House cab ride. New meaning of turbulence. Let's watch the slide show of R.I.'s run. "Yes, yes!" Did he just throw that? Wide right. Pepperoni, Cheese, Yuengling, Mr. Pibb. Yep, we got all four food groups. "Isn't it a little early, boys?" Nice ratio, Eric. How many people can we squeeze? I'll take the back (with the redhead). Waffle House decision. Enjoying the view at the game. Shannon James = clutch. Kimener pick. Slide. Jeff, slide! It's halftime, I'm leaving. Damn you, Cosentino, THROW IT AWAY! That was a pick. Windows blowing in at Rhody. R.J.'s big day. Zullo's loogie. Annoying the Delaware press box guy. Damn it, 'Nova.

Hockey – So much fun. So many tears. So many wins. Thirty-seven games. And I'm hoping I can make the exhibition game next year as well. Overtime struggles. Where's Heneroty going? Northern Ireland. He's out with suck. UNH to Maine in three hours. Gabe = stellar. Lowell sweep and Werner's emergence. Hanging out at the Gut. ECAC romp. The magic of BU. Keeping the faith. Donnie's voice crack. "Justice!" Tears. What the Mullins should sound like. Princeton, no match for Pöck. "I played well." Denino's after a win, good times.

And then there was Florida. This needs its own paragraph. Traffic on the way to NYC, not a good start. Sure, a bagel and a sandwich should be fine. I'm over my stomach flu. Sleeping to Virginia. Rest stop #1..I think my stomach flu is back. Waffle House #1. Gas station for Rolaids. Waffle House #2. Rest stop #2. Waffle House #3. Wake up, it's a Waffle House. Café Risque. We're almost in Florida, we really made good time. Does this highway ever end? Miami detour. Hummer, Hummer, Porsche, Lexus, Camry. That's my car. Bathroom the size of my room at home. Fire drill. Don't do it. Werner's nasty move. Gabe is nastier. Air/bubble hockey in the rink...heaven. Mel's Diner – yeah, Oatmeal. Out with the staff. Stalling at Wendy's...this is a good start. More Waffle House.

Winter break. Fun times indeed. "He's a Columbus Blue Jackets fan." Most uncomfortable couch to sleep on ever. "He knows a little bit about the Hall of Fame." Vice City, Vice City, more Vice City. Trip to Philly for the worst game in history. Jaunt to Villanova. Want to go see Bru? Meet My Parents at the sports bar. American Idol in the room. Lost in Philly looking for the highway. Nigel and Chauncy. Just turn around, you jackass. Hey, you look familiar.

Last bag lunch. Cappy, so cluch. No look hat trick. Maine weekend. Finally showing up on FSNE. WAM = Merrimack killers. And then, the ending. The tension, my heart can't take this. Slipping, slipping, lake's impossible goal. Most nerve-wracking three-goal lead ever. Mike's turn around shot. We're going to the Fleet! High fives all around. I've got Warner sweat on me. "Where did that shot go?" Fleet! Fleet! Fleet! Interviewing Tim. Watching them close the Alfond. In the Fleet broadcast booth, featured cameo. The boys on the bench. This game's over. Werner reminds me it's not. This game's over. Two goals in 10 seconds. Callendar, heartbreak. Hell of a run, boys.

Lax – Leveille, Leveille, Leveille, Leveille! Feato's clutch friend. Badass seats. Clutch spread at UMBC. Is this a doubleheader? Feato, grab your food and let's get out here. Gale at Harvard. I think the press box is going to blow away. Eat it, G-Town. Zywicki, Zywicki, Wicki, Wicki. Triple overtime in N.J. Got our money's worth. Wait, what restaurant are we in? What town are we in? Cheese fries, bad idea. Discovering the HE "guide to survival." Richmond isn't that far. ESPNews is not quality TV. Got a guess?

Now to the rest of the sports staff. Span, very good times indeed...original sports associates. Don't take your love of birds too far, man. Oh no, it's too late. Regan, I have a feeling I'll be able to hear you next year from Wisconsin. Yes, you are that loud. But the place will be emptier without you. Have fun, and keep on working toward your goals in life. Eldreehay, have fun in Alaska, the place will be warm for you when you get back. Vogt, enjoy England, but you'll miss hockey big time. Merz, we all have faith in you, now come through...or we'll kill you. Seriously, though, you are going to do a fantastic job running the section and I'm proud of you. Marz, the pearl of the freshman class. Keep Merritt sane as much as possible. You two should both be high up in the paper for the rest of your time here. Embrace it. Boyd, better late than ever. Good job by you putting in the effort. You'll be a much better writer for it. To all the up and coming writers, stick with it, because this is a beautiful place if you embrace it.

As much as I say I'm done with this place, we all know I'll be back. I'll miss everyone this summer, and it will never be the same, but that doesn't mean it won't be better.

BOB "THE SCRUM" MCGOVERN

After a full year working for The Collegian I have learned a lot about sports and a lot about writing. Through this experience I have grown a respect for the men and women that work hard everyday to bring the students of this campus the news. There are sacrifices that are made that I've seen, respected, and plan to make myself.

I appreciate the help that the guys down in sports have given me throughout the year.

Jim – thanks for being the best editor I could have for my first assignments. I appreciate your help and patience with me, you were a noticeable leader down there. Best of luck to you, you're a damn good writer.

Vogt – thanks for helping me out when I had no idea what was going on, I'll see you down here next year, when you get back.

Ari – it was quite the women's lax season, thanks for helping me out and I look forward to working with you again.

Brady/Marzelli/Sacco – thanks for all the help this year.

Merritt – I appreciate the talk we had, you have been extremely helpful getting me on the right track. Perhaps one day I will use, "Bolduc said," but for now, "It's been real, I'll see you guys in the basement next year." said Bob.

To the rugby team, I can't wait until the fall, it's going to be some more crazy times. (English) Matt, Ladd, Lakness, Seth, Kiwi, Casey – it has been a pleasure playing with you guys. Thanks for teaching me how to play this crazy game, and keep the good times rollin'. To everyone else, there are a lot of challenges ahead but we're the best... so it doesn't matter.

10th – good times. Anyone got a sink for sale? I've got a baby gust and my friend Genny.

Moore – keeping me smiling.

To UMass – another interesting and crazy year, I just cant get enough of this place.

Oh and please don't change the mascot. If you do what are we supposed to do with the big statue by the pond?

MINUTEMAN UMass LACROSSE

UMass Lacrosse NCAA TOURNAMENT PREVIEW

MINUTEMAN UMass LACROSSE

Bill Schell and the Minutemen look to advance to the NCAA semifinals this weekend in Syracuse, N.Y., but they'll have No. 3 Maryland standing in their way.

Classic clash at the Dome

By MATT BRADY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Up until two weeks ago, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team had scored 10 or more goals in every game it had played in 2003. But in each of their last two contests – a loss to Rutgers and a victory over Hofstra – the Minutemen have fallen short of that mark, putting up nine in each game. And things don't get any easier from here.

When No. 5 UMass (13-2) squares off against No. 3 Maryland (11-3), it will go head-to-head with the third-best defense in the nation (6.77 goals allowed per game). The Terrapins have allowed 10 goals just once this season – a 10-6 loss at the hands of North Carolina on March 22.

"That's going to be a tough challenge for us this week – to try to get to 10, to try to get to double digits," UMass coach Greg Cannella said during his weekly radio show. "Maryland is a defensive team, and don't get me wrong, they have some guys on offense who can play, but they have chosen to play more defensively and to be very conservative, and that's what we expect.

"It's going to be our job to try to open things up, try to get some easy goals, get some transition goals, get some unsettled goals," said Cannella, who is taking the Minutemen to their second consecutive NCAA quarterfinal appearance. "If we do that I think we'll be very successful. I think we'll get our opportunities to score, we'll get some shots and hopefully we can take quality shots and get them in the back of the net."

The Terps defeated Ohio State 8-5 on Sunday, but held the Buckeyes to just one goal for nearly the entire game. Midfielder Mike Mollot led the way for the home squad with two goals and an assist, while Dan McCormick made 13 saves in the victory.

"[Ohio State] scored one goal in 54 minutes," Cannella said. "That's good defense, good goaltending. That's also controlling the ball on offense. Ohio State, once they started to run there in the last six minutes, they got it to 6-5. You hope you can get some opportunities early, you hope you can get a lead in the game so your guys are confident, so that they feel they can score."

According to Cannella, the Terps' methodical offense and stifling defense has historically been successful in the NCAA Tournament.

"Tradition has shown that if you play good defense, you can win a championship," he said. "I think their scheme and the way they're playing is good because typically, when you go into an NCAA game, now you're going into a quarterfinal game, guys are tight. They may not shoot the ball as loosely as they have. Coaches become a little bit more conservative in their approach. So the games are traditionally a little bit lower scoring."

The two teams will face off on Saturday at 12:30 p.m. in Syracuse, N.Y. at the Carrier Dome. Fortunately for the Maroon and White, it has experience playing at the Dome, and will not have to play Syracuse, against whom the Minutemen are 0-12 on the road.

"That's probably the best thing about this trip," Cannella said. "We don't have to go to the dome and play Syracuse. I don't think there's an advantage for either team, this is a real neutral site. Last year we were in the quarterfinals, we go down to play Hopkins at Hopkins. That's tough, just like it was tough for Hofstra to come to Amherst last week and play us on our home turf."

Unlike the rest of the second round games, the UMass-Maryland matchup is one that is relatively lacking in terms of history. The two teams have met only once, in 1983, and Richard F. Garber's squad lost to the Terps in that contest 13-4 in Amherst.

"Our matchup – I think we've only met once before – so it's not a game that's been played a lot," Cannella said. "The guys don't know that much about either team or the tradition of Maryland or the tradition of UMass. So I think that kind of helps. It might help guys relax and just go out there and play the game."

Syracuse and Princeton will square off at the Carrier Dome after the completion of UMass-Maryland. The other half of the bracket, played at Towson University, features the host Tigers against Johns Hopkins, and Georgetown vs. Virginia.

Maryland Terrapins

NCAA Tournament, Quarterfinals
Saturday @ The Carrier Dome
12:30 p.m.

Massachusetts Minutemen

Record: 11-3, 2-1 ACC
Coach: Dave Cottle
All-Time Series: Maryland, 1-0
Key Players: A Joe Walters (32 Goals)
M/A Mike Mollot (33 points)
G Danny McCormick (6.72 GAA)
Outlook: The Terrapins enter Saturday's game as the No. 3 team in the nation. They are led by Mollot and Walters up front, but it's clear that this team is about defense. Maryland plays a heavily slowed-down style, focusing on keeping the ball away from McCormick, though the senior is certainly a competent guard of the cage.

Record: 13-2, 3-2 ECAC
Coach: Greg Cannella
Last Meeting: Maryland, 13-4
Key Players: A Jeff Zywicki (41 goals)
M Kevin Leveille (51 points)
G Bill Schell (7.96 GAA)
Outlook: The Minutemen came off a loss to Rutgers in the ECAC championship to down Hofstra, 9-6 last Saturday at Garber Field. Leveille and Zywicki have provided the offensive sparks for the Maroon and White, with Chris Fiore and Gene Tundo chipping in solidly all year. The game will feature the ultimate clash of UMass' high-flying offense against Maryland's stalwart defense.

Misty Eyed Memories from Sports

I firmly believe that any man's finest hour is the moment when he has worked his heart out in a good cause and lies exhausted on the field of battle – victorious.

Vince Lombardi

That is the way we play in the sports section. Play big or go home. Were we victorious? I don't know, but the effort was there and that's all I could ask of these guys and girl. They sacrificed dates, schoolwork, sleep, drinking time and everything else that the easy-going UMass student does with their free time, all for the good of the newspaper.

Hell, in one of the rewarding tons of space to fill, nothing but memories and personal thoughts to use. In one way or another all of our lives have been changed by this place, this year-in-the-rear, never-ending, life-altering experience. It weeds out the weak and the foolish and leaves the survivors better for their efforts.

If you know any of us, this might be worth a read, otherwise, you'll have no idea what you're looking at.

Without further adieu, it's my pleasure to bring you the 2003 edition of the Collegian Sports Misty Eyes, our tribute to the mob.

Minuteman mascot triumphs

UMass community pleased with result

By ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Score one for the history books.

After three months of careful deliberation, Athletic Director Ian McCaw announced the Massachusetts athletic mascot will remain the "Minuteman" in a press conference on May 14.

"As it was in 1775, the Minuteman triumphs," McCaw said.

The decision came as a result of the three-month examination of UMass logos, fonts and mascot images by a committee comprised of McCaw, members of the athletic staff, and other University community members.

The New York-based Phoenix Design Works came in to the process in March to aid the Athletic Department in finding new design options.

Included in those design options was a complete change in the mascot – from the 31-year old Minuteman to the Gray Wolf.

While the Minuteman will remain the official UMass mascot, McCaw alluded to significant changes in the look of school insignias, including fonts, logos and coloration. However, no changes had been introduced at press time, with potential changes kept secret until an official unveiling in late May.

McCaw said the University paid $10,000 to the Phoenix group to aid with the redesign. Phoenix Design Works has also worked with Notre Dame, Arkansas, Saint Joseph's, Tennessee, the Cincinnati Reds and a number of NFL teams for similar redesign projects.

"Our new identity system will build upon the strengths of the Minuteman, more broadly represent the University athletic program, and it will better connect with our alumni and friends and citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as we move forward," McCaw said.

McCaw said those interested in purchasing apparel with the new UMass designs should visit the UMass Athletics website, where he expects the new identity system will be displayed shortly after the official unveiling.

He also mentioned the need for support of the University during the Commonwealth's budget crisis

"With the affirmation of the Minuteman, we now encourage the entire UMass family to rally together and support an even more critical issue, and that is state funding.

"It's wonderful for us to have a new athletic mascot, and a new identity system, but it's even more important for us to have the resources we need to have a first-rate university here in Amherst, and also to have a high quality Division I athletic program," McCaw said.

The decision came after weeks of vocal outcry over the proposed mascot change from students, alumni and even national media. The Boston Herald, Springfield Republican and MetroWest Daily News ran editorials protesting the possibility of a mascot change. Tony Kornheiser, a Washington Post columnist and host of ESPN's "Pardon the Interruption," used a segment of his show to criticize the "Gray Wolves."

"If it weren't for the Minutemen," said Kornheiser, alluding to the Revolutionary War soldiers who were legendary for being ready for a fight at any minute, "there would be a University of England at Amherst."

The Massachusetts mascot has been the Minuteman since 1972, when it was altered from "Redman" due to the anti-Native American connotation. UMass athletes were the Redmen since between 1948 and 1972. Prior to that, a circulating nickname was the "Aggies," a reference to the school's original name, the Massachusetts Agricultural College.

The entire redesign project included the athletic committee, as well as a number of focus groups totaling in 85 people, which all looked at the new look of Minuteman designs, and the animal mascot option.

Protestations over the proposed mascot change appeared in many places, most visibly on a sign that read, "Save Me," slung over the arm of the Minuteman statue near the campus pond.

"It's a big relief," said Peter Trovato, a member of the UMass hockey team. "I think in general that the Gray Wolves wasn't being accepted too well. It's sticking to our roots ... as a kid from Massachusetts, I look at the Minuteman, and that is probably our most basic state symbol, and it's a historical symbol that should be recognized nationwide. When they're teaching state history to anybody. I'm sure the Minuteman's involved."

The conflict over the mascot change also garnered plenty of attention for the University, something hockey coach Don Cahoon said was invaluable.

"That's the best $10,000 this school's spent in a long time," Cahoon said. "We just got $100,000 worth of marketing out of that. It was a national issue, so you can't put a dollar value on that."

As for the nation-wide criticism, McCaw saw nothing but benefits.

"I view all the discussion as being positive, even if it was being critical, because it furthered our visibility, and the interest in this project," he said. "It demonstrated how passionate our alumni and students and citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are about the University."

He also said the design discussions have already produced results for athletic marketing.

"Dave Curley is the University licensing director," McCaw explained. "Prior to this week, for the last six months, he had received zero orders for Minuteman apparel. This week, he's already received three orders."

Not first time for mascot conflict

By DAN LAMOTHE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The presently resolved controversy surrounding the University of Massachusetts Minuteman is not the first time the mascot has come under fire.

Ten years ago, a petition started by a student group called the American Freedom Association and rallies organized by its president, Martin Jones, sparked conflict that eventually included students, Chancellor David Scott and Massachusetts Governor William Weld. The debate drew national news coverage from the Associated Press, USA Today and radio talk show hosts, including Rush Limbaugh.

Jones said in a rally on Oct. 13, 1993, that the Minuteman was racist and sexist because it portrays a "white man with a gun." He believed it was a symbol for oppression and a representation of local militiamen slaughtering Native Americans in Amherst hundreds of years before. The Collegian reported the petition also called for increased ALANA recruitment, increased financial aid for economically disadvantaged students and the renaming of the campus library after W.E.B. DuBois.

Scott said he would listen to the students' concerns initially, drawing attention and criticism in the Boston media.

Weld released a statement on Oct. 15, calling the attack on the Minuteman an example of "political correctness run amok," according to The Collegian. Weld told the Boston Herald it was fine to question authority, but the Minuteman issue was "ridiculous." A group calling itself the "University of Massachusetts Alumni and Students to Save the Minutemen" also rallied and released a statement in support of the mascot.

Scott also issued a release Oct. 15, saying his willingness to discuss issues was misconstrued as him not valuing the historical significance of the Minuteman. He attempted to formally end debate on the issue, saying that because of the misunderstandings and misperceptions in the debate, it would be virtually impossible to discuss the idea in a productive way.

Rallies both for and against keeping the Minuteman continued into November. At a pro-Minuteman rally on Oct. 27, The Collegian reported that student Dan Flynn called Jones a "Pied Piper of every fool on this campus." The Collegian ran at least eight news articles and numerous opinion pieces on the issue between Oct. 13 and the end of the month.

The University of Massachusetts has had at least three mascots over the course of its history. The school was known as the Mass. Aggies until 1948, when the school changed its identity from the Massachusetts Agricultural College to the University of Massachusetts Amherst. In 1972, the school changed its name to the Minutemen because of the potentially racial nature of the Redmen nickname after a group of Native Americans called the term derogatory.

Between 1938 and 1948, the school used numerous unofficial nicknames, including the Derbymen and the Statesmen, according to Collegian archives.

UMass braces for cuts

General Physical Ed faces uncertainty

By COURTNEY CHARLES AND FERRON SALNIKER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A semester of uncertainty brought to the University of Massachusetts concerns over budget woes, resulting in students raising their voices in action. Students on campus remained actively involved and interested in the future of the University and its many programs.

Chancellor Lombardi addressed the situation of the budget at the May 9 meeting of the Faulty Senate. He said because of the postponed budget vote, the University would not know anything definite until sometime around the second week of June, The Collegian reported.

Lombardi told the Senate that even thought the proposed budget called for "dramatic reductions" to the University, "when we get done, we will be strong, and we will be able to compete."

After months of rumors, the fate of the University of Massachusetts President's office seemed to be decided on May 8. Lawmakers cut President William Bulger's budget by 18 percent in a 109-46 vote by the House of Representatives.

The house avoided a vote to cut the office altogether, which had been part of Gov. Mitt Romney's plan to restructure Massachusetts higher education for several months.

The $1 million saved by cutting Bulger's budget will be used for scholarships for low-income students, according to the Associated Press.

On May 14, the drama was renewed, as Romney essentially cast out his plan for higher education while keeping a provision to eliminate the office. Romney insisted he harbored no personal animosity toward Bulger, the Associated Press reported.

Bulger told the AP he would take Romney at his word that targeting his office was not personal.

"I'm optimistic," Bulger told the AP. "I'll be here. I'm not going anywhere. I have a job to do. I signed on to do it, and I'll do it."

Future of physical education remains uncertain

As the University of Massachusetts prepares for upcoming budget cuts, the future of the General Physical Education (GPE) department remains uncertain. During the registration period for fall 2003, offered this spring, gym classes were not listed on SPIRE, leaving students and instructors concerned over the possible elimination of the program.

The potential to cut all gym classes would leave an average of 1,500 students per semester without gym classes. According to Andrew Effrat, dean for the School of Education, the classes were not listed on SPIRE because the University's confirmed enrollment policy prohibits listing classes on SPIRE that are not guaranteed.

Effrat said the department is taking a "wait and see" approach to the situation. The impact of the proposed 18 percent cut to the UMass budget is of great concern to both GPE and the entire education department, he added.

"I'm still digesting the enormity of the possible cuts," Effrat said. "GPE would be cut if I cannot figure out a way to save all or some of the program and if I cannot make any more cuts without harming other programs that are essential to our teaching and research responsibilities."

The cost of running GPE is about $100,000 per year.

"$100,000 may not sound like a lot of money, but every $100,000 adds up," Effrat said to a crowd of 30 supporters of GPE during a meeting last semester.

Before taking questions from students and instructors during the meeting, Effrat said he hopes people appreciate the toughness of the decisions that lie ahead, calling them hard because people's lives and jobs are on the line.

Students became frustrated last semester with the lack of communication on the issue, as many were concerned the cuts had already happened. Amanda Brown, a junior nursing major and four-time instructor, said the administration did a poor job of communicating with students.

"The infuriating part about this is that no one has told the students of this very likely possibility," Brown said.

Brown took an initiative and held a meeting in early May with the intent of organizing a group with a collective voice in support of GPE. Instructors also obtained hundreds of signatures

Lombardi pushes for academic imperative

By FERRON SALNIKER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

John V. Lombardi was inaugurated as the 27th chancellor of the University of Massachusetts on Feb. 27, bringing with him a new drive for the University to focus on the "academic imperative."

"We who live and build America's research universities belong to one of the longest and most stable traditions of Western civilization," Lombardi said during his inauguration. "Although the content of research university life has changed over the centuries, its academic imperative remains focused on students, faculty and the pursuit of understanding."

JAMES STAMBOULIDES/COLLEGIAN

Chancellor Lombardi addresses the Mullins Center audience at his inauguration.

For the busy week of his inauguration, Lombardi made imperative the theme and defined its goal by saying, "Before we can do anything else, before we can reach for grand designs and society-changing influence, we must teach our students well and do our research effectively."

A massive effort to raise the type of money that "buys universities the opportunity to create quality" would be crucial to the success of the campus within the University system, "although money by itself does not necessarily produce quality," he said.

Concerning UMass' competitive edge in the world of research universities, Lombardi named time as the University's greatest challenge.

"If money matters, performance counts and time is the enemy, how then do we know what to do first? The answer is simple; we focus on the academic imperative," he said. "Because the University is so competitive and each day offers an opportunity we must take, a challenge we must meet."

During late February, UMass was seen on the front page of papers across the state because of events surrounding the inauguration and because community members, faculty and students were all eager to hear Lombardi's plans for the future of UMass. Lombardi, as he often does, praised the University and not himself for beginning to focus on what students consider as their needs.

"What students want to know when they come to an institution is that the institution is focused on their need to get a first class education," he said. "Students are real smart. They know we have problems. They're not confused that there are financial difficulties. What they want to know is that the institution is making adjustments and paying attention to the core mission of educating students."

So far, Lombardi has overseen the opening of two recreational facilities on campus, the Blue Wall Bar and Union Billiards in an attempt to bring more student activity to the UMass campus.

"Most universities find a way to do this," he said. "They have activity; they have life; they have a band; they have stuff; they have comedy night. There's commotion. That's what we want: Commotion. I want commotion.

"I don't want to walk into the Campus Center on a Friday night and not see anybody," he said. "I want to see people moving, shaking. I want noise."

Rallying in support of Higher Education

SARAH LUTHCO/COLLEGIAN

Tom Juravich, a professor at the UMass Amherst Labor Center, plays the guitar and leads a series of chants before handing the microphone over to the days speakers at the Save UMass Rally held outside the Massachusetts State House on Beacon Hill.

on petitions from students taking GPI classes and wrote letters to Chancellor Lombardi and government officials hoping to make an impact on the budget.

Many students have raised concerns over the increase in tuition and asked Efrat during the May meeting if the money could possibly be used to save programs like GPI. Efrat said while some of the revenue generated by the increase in tuition will go to pay debt services, he certainly did not want to speak on behalf of the chancellor.

Efrat also said his staff is exploring the idea of offering GPI classes through continuing education for $100 per credit. Most GPI classes are one credit. Most GPI supporters were opposed to this idea, arguing that the point of the program is the peers-teaching-peers model. They also said the cost of hiring part-time instructors would be too high.

Linda Griffin, the faculty coordinator, said it's only one of the ideas circulating right now. When asked if the program was save all or nothing, Griffin said her office has been talking about ways to preserve some classes in the program.

"We will look at trends to determine participation rates, how facilities are used, when classes are offered and times instructors can teach," Griffin said.

Efrat said his staff is considering sending surveys out to determine if students would be willing to take GPI courses through continuing education.

Brown and supporters are continuing to write letters, e-mails and ask students to fill out surveys to prove the value of the classes. Katie Grassa, a senior elementary education major who works part time in the GPI office, is calling for continued support for the program.

The letters and emails are making a difference, it really has," Grassa said.

Students take it to the Statehouse

A repeated 3,000 students, faculty members and staff from public higher education institutions throughout the state of Massachusetts met outside the Massachusetts State House in Boston April 30. They were all there for one purpose: To protest against the 18 percent budget cuts that public higher education institutions face statewide.

Despite the negative reasons for their presence, the reaction to the rally was positive. Janice Staab, an out-of-state undergrad at the University of Massachusetts Amherst agreed.

"I think it went really well, and hopefully the enthusiasm of the people here will get the legislature to listen to us," she said. "Higher education is such a big issue at the moment.

UMass Engineering Junior Scott Bellner, who attended last year's rally as well, thought this year's rally went more smoothly.

"This year the organization was better. The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) of UMass Amherst did a great job to get us out here. Statewide, we are seeing an ignorance as the administration is ignoring people's voices, so hopefully we were heard today," Bellner said.

Edward P. Sullivan, the Executive Director-Treasurer of the Massachusetts Teachers Association (MTA), saw the rally as being a significant step in the right direction.

"[The protesting students, teachers, and staff] will make a difference; political action by students to advance their interests could have a remarkable impact on the destiny of how students are treated as well as the institutions they attend," Sullivan said. "The key is for students and faculty to continually expand their active political action."

After the rally, a legislative hearing on the Governor's proposal to reorganize public education was held inside the State House. In attendance at the hearing were several UMass students and staff.

Matthew Saradjian, UMass graduate student majoring in Public Policy was in attendance at the hearing.

"The rally outside and the hearing inside showed that Romney's plan for higher education is not in the interest of students and workers," Saridjian said. "Now, more than ever, we need to increase the opportunity for education, not cut it."

Thousands of students rally for the 'Books not Bombs' campaign

By KELLY FARRELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Over 2,500 students walked out of classes at the University of Massachusetts on March 7 as part of the national "Books not Bombs" campaign. Students participated in a rally, teach-ins with panels of speakers and a march to Amherst center in opposition to a war with Iraq.

The rally, originally planned for the Student Union steps, was moved inside due to poor weather. Students overflowed the Student Union Ballroom with a standing room only crowd.

"I thought no one showed up for the walkout because of the rain," said UMass student Shannon Greer. "I almost didn't walk up to the [Student Union] steps, but then someone yelled that the rally was moved inside.

"I couldn't believe it," she said of the crowd of thousands, who stood shoulder-to-shoulder in the Ballroom and poured out into the hallway.

Springfield poet Magdalena Gomez was featured as a guest at the rally.

"I'm writing to remember ... the land of the brave and the land of the free, where nothing is free," Gomez read, until silenced by 500 more students entering the room.

The students, from Amherst Regional High School, came streaming in late after trekking through the rain. The already-present crowd cheered them loudly and parted to let the new group of students into the Ballroom.

Due to the larger than expected turn out of about 2,600 students total, many of the scheduled panels had to be moved into the Student Union Ballroom.

One panel featured Peter Pellet, a member of a United Nations taskforce studying the health effects of sanctions on Iraq, and Jo Commerford of the American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker organization.

"I thought Pellet was particularly informative," said Caroline Eckert, a member in attendance. "He really came from a scientific perspective. I didn't get the sense that he was fulfilling his own agenda when he explained the consequences of sanctions on the Iraqi people. I had no idea that Iraq was an industrialized nation before the sanctions ruined their economy. I had the sense that they were always a Third World nation with a crazy leader."

Pellet said the sanctions are only part of the cause of the economic and political situation in Iraq.

Commerford said Iraqis "saw us, the American people, as different than George Bush, and many wanted to know why Bush couldn't see them as different than Hussein."

About 1,600 people from the local schools, as well as residents of Amherst, Northampton and other nearby towns held signs and marched to the Commons afterwards from the Haigis Mall. Police blocked N. Pleasant Street, E. Pleasant and Main Street as the march and vigil proceeded down the streets. Another rally blocked Amherst center traffic for about one and half hours after the march yesterday evening.

Protestors held signs at the Amherst Center rally with statements like "Pro America Not Pro War," "Regime Change Begins at Home" and "Support Our Troops: Bring Them Home."

Members danced, sang and chanted, as they bobbed their signs up and down. Many of the people who were downtown at the time of the march honked their horns and waved in a gesture of peace to show their support for the protestors.

UMPD acquires Max, the police dog, on its force

By KELLY FARRELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last semester in March, Officer Mark Shlosser and his new canine partner, Max, met with University of Massachusetts students for the first time in Southwest's Washington Tower.

Shlosser and Max continued to visit with other dorms throughout the semester to give students the opportunity to get acquainted with Max and to ask questions about how the canine officer will affect students who live on campus.

Students' curiosity and concerns began last December when the University announced a crackdown on crime that includes 10 new police cadets, a potential satellite police station, and Max – a drug-sniffing dog. The decision to expand the police department was made by a committee on campus safety, appointed by UMass Chancellor John Lombardi last November. The cost of the expansion is about $150,000, but Max is a small part of that cost, Police Chief O'Connor said.

SARAH LUTHCO/COLLEGIAN

Max, then new canine officer on campus, visits residents halls with partner Officer Mark Shlosser.

O'Connor said Max would not be used for random searches in residence halls. She added she would supply the Student Government Association with a written document confirming Max would not be used for this purpose.

"We can't do random searches at all," O'Connor said in early March. "It's not even legal. I have that in writing for the SGA, and I better get that to them soon. Our job is to protect the students, and Max is a tool to aid in that mission."

On the job, Max is often patrolling campus in a police car from 7 p.m. to 3 a.m. with Shlosser. The two will not likely be on duty in the winter, because dogs are unable to track scents well in the snow.

"Max is here to help solve crimes as well as help in prevention," O'Connor said. "The appearance of a dog on campus has a tendency to lower crime rates."

Shlosser said Max's main roles on campus would be to "protect him [Schlosser], track scents, and search areas and articles of suspects."

Max will not search anyone or anywhere without probable cause and/or a search warrant, he said.

"I thought the dog was just for drugs, but he can help with crimes like people breaking into our room," said Courtney Cormier, a sophomore resident of Washington Tower.

"Once people meet Max, they'll get to know him and like him, and realize he's an asset more than a detriment," O'Connor said.

Blue Wall bar brings back student life at UMass

SARAH LUTHCO/COLLEGIAN

After two decades of as a dry establishment, the Blue Wall opened it new pub last spring, providing a full service bar and bringing student nightlife back to the center of the University of Massachusetts campus.

Now at UMass students and community members over 21 years of age have access to a full liquor selection, a number of bottled beers, a locally brewed beer on tap and several wines. The Blue Wall Pub also provides two 50-inch screen televisions and entertainment that includes live bands, DJs and interactive giveaways.

Bottled beers provided at the bar include Miller Lite,

Rolling Rock, Michelob Ultra, Heineken, Guinness, Corona, Bass, Budweiser and a locally brewed selection from the Berkshire Brewing Co., as well as the non-alcoholic O'Doul's and Mike's Hard Lemonade.

The bar had a large turnout on its opening night in early April. Hundreds of students enjoyed the live bands and the promotional entertainment throughout the night. Crowds gathered around the two 50-inch screen televisions, cheering on the two games with Massachusetts sports teams: The Boston Red Sox vs. the Baltimore Orioles and the Boston Celtics vs. the Sacramento Kings.

The programming schedule for the spring semester included interactive promotions on Thursday nights, live music on Fridays and a DJ on Saturdays.

"Our students can go anywhere in the area for similar entertainment," said Chancellor John V. Lombardi before the opening. "We believe that a responsible and effective pub with good entertainment and a quality atmosphere will serve many of our students well. In the past, I am told, the Blue Wall Pub or its equivalent was a very good part of campus life. We will see if it works for this generation of students."

The creation of the pub originated from an effort to attract more of the student body to the Campus Center.

"We want it to revitalize the Campus Center," said Brenda Ryan- Newton, Retail Food Services operations manager before the opening. "It should be a safe environment and a gathering place for students."

Managers are working with Public Safety and Environmental Health and Safety to provide appropriate security. A team of non-student security personnel is on hand during bar hours and alcohol sales and consumption are within a roped-off area. The Blue Wall uses different glasses for alcoholic beverages, allowing security to easily identify who has them.

Managers also met with the University of Massachusetts Police Department before the opening.

On nights when live entertainment is provided, there is one officer on duty at the pub.

"Their only responsibility is keeping an eye on the Pub to make sure things run smoothly," said Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

Students have had mixed reactions to the bar, and many have offered suggestions for improvement.

"I'm glad there's a bar on campus, but I think the whole blue lighting thing is kind of weird," said junior Joe Drury.

"I think it's going to be fun this weekend, but for the rest of the time there's going to need to be a lot of advertising to keep [it] going," said senior sports management major, Nick Morash, while attending the opening.

Many students have found the new bar to be a good place to hang out and are glad to see it come back.

"Years ago the Blue Wall was the place to be, and I'm upholding the tradition at UMass," one student noted. "I want to make our alumni proud."

"I think it's going to be fun. It's a great beginning and it will make a lot of money for the school," Amanda Degen, a junior, said at the opening. "Campus life will definitely improve."

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

SUMMER ORIENTATION 2003

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Newspaper unites students and surrounding community

Starting your first semester at the University of Massachusetts may be a daunting experience. The campus has nearly a 100 buildings, around 20,000 students and over 200 clubs – more extracurriculars than you could handle in a lifetime. Students are as diverse as the course subjects available at this University. However, one source of communication ties all together: The Daily Collegian.

The Daily Collegian is the major newspaper read on campus. Ninety percent of the campus and local community report to read the paper at least once each week. The offices are organized and run solely by over 100 hard-working, campus oriented students. Editorial coverage includes news from the campus and its surrounding community, student issues and (inter)national events. The Collegian is funded on its advertising revenue, and 14,000 copies are printed on each day of the UMass academic calendar.

This past year, our news section covered topics such as anti-war rallies, budget cut issues and the burning of the New Massachusetts Foundry Building. Sports highlights included the hockey team's rise to the Hockey East semi-finals and the ski team's triumph at Nationals. Concert highlights like John Mayer and 50 Cent highlighted Arts & Living. Both news and Arts & Living feature weekly calendar listings of upcoming events.

New columns this year included "Sex-iversity," a student advice and information column on sexual health and relationships, covering topics such as HIV risks and dating abuse. A campus-wide favorite was "Micrology," a column dedicated to the delicate art of microwave dining. This is a common theme for college students and teaches a reader how to whip up Chicken Divan, Pumpkin pastries and gourmet hot chocolate – all from the comfort of your dorm microwave.

The Ed/Op section boasts over 35 columnists who voice their opinions on personal, political and world issues. The Collegian, here, acts as a direct form of communication, uniting thousands of students. Campus-wide issues are debated through these columns and in published "Letters to the Editor," written by our readers.

International columns, new this year, feature submissions monthly by UMass students taking a semester abroad. Their stories give the campus exposure to the work of fellow classmen, as well as varied perceptions on other cultures.

This fall, the staff launches an exciting new program for the campus: MDC Design. The department will offer the creative services of The Collegian's graphic designers. Individuals, including students, looking for flyers, banners, advertisements, pamphlets or newsletters made for any number of student businesses or class projects can commission these artists.

The Collegian newspaper is available in most campus buildings and on the Internet at dailycollegian.com. The organization welcomes many new staff members each semester. Students with varying degrees of experience can begin work at The Collegian immediately in the fall as reporters and columnists. Getting involved with and reading The Collegian is the best way to stay informed on current issues.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Collegian Editorial Board.

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of The Collegian.

50 Cent hits UMass

Nick Ames

I think it's only fair this article concentrates on someone other than myself. This is certainly not my first article written about 50 Cent, nor will it be the last. While some might say I am capitalizing on his name to get people to read this article, I assure you these next few paragraphs are here to glorify 50 and not myself.

Like many on campus, I was absolutely thrilled to hear 50 would perform at Spring Concert 2003. It just goes to show that however many times our school shafts us, they always find some way to with our hearts back. What makes 50 so appealing to our age group is his sheer energy. He's one of the few entertainers out there today who can match the intensity of thousands of lude college students. He can bring it nice with "21 Questions," and he can bring it mean with "Patiently Waiting." He can tear the place down with whatever the hell he wants. We love him like we love Eminem, because they're both unpredictable. You don't know whether he'll dap you or cap you.

Before his show, I was somewhat worried 50's meteoric rise to fame might not leave anywhere for him to go but down. As of 11 p.m. that night, I realized I was gravely mistaken. He deserves every good word said about him – and then some. This guy did what Ludacris couldn't accomplish in an hour and half in 45 freakin' minutes. He got the crowd behind him; he got the crowd involved. He didn't stand back and let his friends do the show – He stood on speakers, ran down the front row, became so pumped that he took off from his bodyguards and ran a lap around the whole floor.

This man took off his trademark Teflon bulletproof vest five minutes into the show, because he knew he was among friends. Even his sense of humor was top notch, as he pretended the show was over and walked halfway off stage before turning around and busting into a new song.

Only a few shows into his touring career, and 50 knows how to work the crowd. He must have thrown away four or five of his hats to the crowd by the time the show was over, not to mention giving away a hotel's worth of what appeared to be white washcloths and towels. There are few people in the world I would throw down with anyone over one of their washcloths, but this guy is one.

For Pete's sake, I know some of you who can't even wake up in the mornings; give this man some credit.

I can still feel the excitement even now; that's how much of a good time I know we all had. It is so nice to finally see a musician who enjoys what he does. Even in my shwag balcony seat, I could see this man's smile. He doesn't take any audience for granted. He translates the excitement we give him by showing up 10,000 strong into the show of a lifetime. Even if I am unlucky enough to never see 50 perform again, I will go to my grave knowing I saw someone who is destined to be one of the great legends of our generation.

For those who complained he didn't play long enough, know he performed on Saturday Night Live the night before, at SUNY Oswego the next afternoon and then hoofed his ass all the way to Western Massachusetts to show us his love that night. For Pete's sake, I know some of you who can't even wake up in the mornings; give this man some credit.

I would like to thank 50 Cent for his performance, the University for paying for him to come, my fellow students for bringing the ruckus and The Collegian for putting up with my offbeat articles.

UMass urban legends still haunting the campus

Jamie Loo

Have you ever been on campus late at night and got a chill looking at the Old Chapel? Maybe it happened in a stairway at Mary Lyon or walking up Orchard Hill? It's possible you weren't alone.

One of the great fall traditions in New England is to tell ghost stories. UMass is over 100 years old and has its share of history and, of course, ghosts. Everyone has heard at least one UMass urban legend from a friend or has claimed to have a close encounter with something strange. But what is fact and what is fiction?

I decided to find out. I took a ghost tour with the UMass History Club. The history club based their stories on research done in library and through Collegian archives.

We began our tour at the Old Chapel. Back when the Old Chapel was still open, students used to ring the bells before and during services. One day, one of the bell ringers was running late. He wasn't watching the road carefully and was struck by a car and died.

On Halloween night, the bells can be heard ringing; they say you can see the silhouette of the young man sitting up by the bells. A moaning and knocking noise can sometimes be heard coming from the crypt in the Old Chapel.

Urban legend: A young woman committed suicide in the bell tower and that you can see her hanging there on the anniversary of her death. There was also a young man who fell down the stairs and died. You can hear his spirit walking up and down the stairway.

Draper Hall used to be a residential hall. Apparently, the ventilation system in the building was never very good, and the kitchen was always very hot. One spring during a heat wave, the kitchen heated more than usual, and two of the cooks began arguing. As tempers flared, one of the cooks snapped. He grabbed a kitchen knife and stabbed the other cook to death. Every year on the anniversary of the cook's death, you can hear crazy noises coming from the old kitchen in Draper.

As tempers flared, one of the cooks snapped. He grabbed a kitchen knife and stabbed the other cook to death.

Each dormitory used to have a housemother. The housemother in Greenough was a widow and had a small boy, whom all of the residents adored. One winter, he fell very ill and died, devastating his mother and the dormitory.

A resident assistant used to hear this constant noise of residents playing ball in the hallway. She opened the door to tell her residents to stop playing hall sports. No one was in the hallway. One night the RA came home really late. She saw a little boy holding a red ball standing in the middle of the hallway. Then he began to slowly disappear. Residents in Greenough supposedly still hear odd noises, especially sounds of someone playing ball, when there is no one there.

I think one of the most chilling stories is that of John Brooks Howard Jr., because it hits close to home at the newspaper. He was the campus news editor at The Massachusetts Collegian.

On the morning of April 27, 1929, Howard and his friend John Andrew Jr. were climbing trees in the apple orchard on Orchard Hill. Howard fell 70 feet from the tree, fracturing his leg. When Andrew went to check on him, Howard said he couldn't see, even though his eyes were wide open. When they finally reached Health Services, Andrew said Howard was losing ground quickly, and the doctors couldn't do anything.

Howard's ghost has been seen hobbling down the trail between Orchard Hill and Northeast. Is it possible The Collegian is his piece of unfinished business? Maybe, but from what I have learned about Howard, he wouldn't want students wasting their time trying to figure that out or to go looking for his ghost, or any others, on campus. He would want us to live our lives, a life he didn't get to live.

Rest in peace John Brooks Howard, and don't worry. We're trying hard to take care of the newspaper.

University Dining Commons: serving meals of deceit or delight?

Erika Lovley

The transition from home to college life in the dorms is always a drastic change. We are suddenly torn from our most reliable, steadfast support system: The family kitchen.

There, for many of us, the refrigerator is always stocked, the cupboards are full of snacks, and Mom is always ready to whip you up a sandwich. Nutritionally stranded on our own for the first time in our lives, we dorm dwellers scavenge for food, subsisting on Ramen Noodles, Dominoes and Pop-tarts.

Thank god for the UMass Dining Commons – a place where you can get a hot meal of waffles, pizza and ice cream, all for breakfast. This is the wonderful establishment that brings us the Grab n' Go, Restaurant Night and free Starbucks.

Nevertheless, lately our major food source has recently been getting a bad rap. People seem to believe that with the termination of the school year comes the demise of edible DC food. Most recently criticized has been the DC hours, the food selection and the quality of the food it serves.

Some of these complaints are hard to validate. The Food Service staff works extremely hard to provide us with a variety of hot and fresh foods 12 or more hours a day. First of all, if the quality of the food is so horrible, then why are we eating so much of it? Both girls and guys alike can be seen coming out of those buffet lines with as many as three plates of food on their trays and up to four different drinks. What are we here? Famine victims?

The setting of the dining halls is perfect. They are all in central locations and easily accessible. Our dining halls are well lit, creatively set up, and well decorated. Who else would bring us restaurant night? We are also very fortunate to be a Coke school, boasting unlimited quantities of Coke, Cherry Coke, Sprite and all the essentials.

Secondly, what other school has a dining hall where sushi, pasta, sandwiches, fast food, ice cream and cereal bars are available around the clock? I traipsed through many different dining halls during my prep school days. Some of the finest private school dining facilities cannot hold a candle to those at UMass.

It looks like the salad bar on the east side went to war with the fast food on the west side, resulting in an all out slaughter.

Some people argue the DC hours should be adjusted. A common complaint is that the dining hall doesn't serve dinner long enough or that it should be open until all classes end at 10 p.m. for a midnight snack. The dining room staff has a life besides for serving us food 24 hours a day.

Most dining halls open at 7 a.m. and close at 7 p.m. or later. If you do not have enough time to grab a full meal somewhere during that time span, there is something seriously wrong with your schedule.

The Food Service staff deserves our respect and admiration, not our ridicule and criticism. If you don't like the hot meal of the day, just smile and say, "No thank you." The cooks do not want to hear that you think their food looks disgusting.

A growing number of people have been getting up and leaving stacks of dirty dishes sitting on the tables after eating. This is not creating jobs; it is just making more things to clean-up for the staff. In Franklin Dining Commons, someone has decided it is fun to splatter the stairwells with all sorts of waffle toppings, salad dressing, ice cream, etc. This happens on a daily basis.

As soon as someone cleans up the horrific mess, another appears. It looks like the salad bar on the east side went to war with the fast food on the west side, resulting in an all out slaughter. If the dining commons have to shut at 7 p.m., it's probably because they have to start cleaning up the horrendous messes.

As a community of mature, well-educated adults, it is shameful we treat the workers with such immature disrespect. It's time we begin to commend the Food Services staff and give them the praise they truly deserve.

Letter to the Editor:

Support programs need to stay

To the Editor:

I am a black female student in the CCEBMS program, and I am writing in regards to your opinion piece on the stand that ALANA Affairs has taken to reinstate minority programs as academic services to campus.

What the ALANA Affairs organizations is trying to accomplish is not only the survival of these programs, but also the survival of diversity on this campus.

Without minority support programs, it will be harder to attract minority students to a campus that cannot give them adequate support, especially those bilingual programs that are so greatly needed.

Finding comfort in an environment is a major key to a learning experience, and if I don't feel comfortable with the academic support networks or other aids available to me this is a pressure that hinders me, emotionally and mentally. And I think we all know what stress can mean to our academics, regardless of race.

But I think I have to explain to you what pressure means to a minority. As a black women, I understand that many white people may see our racism protest as repetitive. However, the issue of the non-minority understanding the minority struggle is still misunderstood by many students.

We, as minority students, not only have to confront the pressures of the everyday student and human beings like family, school, job, mental and physical health, but we also must add the pressures of being black, Chinese, Puerto Rican, Vietnamese or of mix race parentage.

We often have to confront racist slurs, proving ourselves against social labels and stereotypes, being accepted into a society that often negates us – and much more.

These programs, their counselors and directors and their academic and personal support, gave us stability, but the University dismantled that. I am not saying we don't have other important issues on campus – only heaven knows what they are doing with the security these days. However, we need others to care about our struggle, and it can't just be the minority students protesting all the time. It has to be all people – white, black, Asian, Latino, rich, poor, middle class, whatever it may be.

Let me put it this way. If the students had a protest about the library hours and their support networks were cut, I would be right there by my peers' side screaming for our rights. But if I protest to rehire my CCEBMS counselor because she was mine and other minority students' support, would you be next to me?

Collegian, you said it yourself in a past column, "... the student body and the administration needs to look for alternative ways to reestablish a program of some kind that both has value and gives the students who need it one-on-one advising that they can trust."

CCEBMS, BCP, NASS and UALRC – these were the programs we "trusted." They were our backbone.

Annual Amherst housing tour displays wealth of local history

By JENNIFER EASTWOOD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Aging red bricks pieced together to form a puzzle-schemed walkway. Maturing fireplaces with paint layers spread over old wooden planks ...

We associate these images with old homes – antique spaces with co-existing modern conveniences and relics. We see these fragments of living history, hot spots honoring different heritages, and we know. These are the historic houses of Amherst.

Because such homes are often privately owned, the general public rarely has a chance to step inside these proud structures and absorb their atmospheres. However, thanks to the Amherst Historical Society, locals gain this opportunity each fall.

The most recent of these self-guided touring programs, held last November, allowed patrons to visit seven private Amherst addresses. The tour began four years ago as a historic homes expedition. All buildings were within walking distance of each other, explained Fiona Russell, Director of the Historical Society. Over time, the Historical Society expanded the types of featured homes. Annually, a new set of seven makes the list.

Carol Kaminsky's 1859 Victorian farm home presents the quaint atmosphere of child's dollhouse.

The House Committee of the Amherst History Museum begins searching for the stops by word of mouth, said Ellen Melley, a museum board member on the Committee.

"We try to have a mix of different styles, pick houses that are interesting," Melley said. "I was the one who thought of this house."

She gestured around the Deacon Kellogg home on Route 116 – the oldest house presented last November.

Walking into the tour homes, especially older ones, proves emotionally overwhelming for avid fans of housing decor. One tour stop, a Queen Anne Victorian home dating back to 1892, proves that instantly.

The home first strikes observers with its interior rose-colored walls and furniture. A staircase sets a few yards from the front door. Yellow light streaming through a high stained glass window spreads its tint over these rose-carpeted steps. A playful crisscrossed sectioned of mahogany wood railing faithfully lines the case. The view catches attentions immediately, and we know. This place has personality.

A large, three-bay window protrudes the building's front, undeniably singling its Victorian style. Built and then originally owned by John L. Lovell – who launched the first Western Massachusetts photographic studio – the home highlights its unique style with an intricate, back-yard garden and accompanying porch.

As current homeowner Suzannah Fabing said, the garden marks the best aspect of the property.

"On the back porch in nice weather, we just live out there," she said. "It's what makes the house particularly wonderful."

A more lavish stop, the President's House at Amherst College, sits hidden behind a row of tall evergreen bushes. Three sets of stairs, a short white picket gate and an old brick walkway lead to its front door.

Inside, one finds a grand antique fireplace in practically every downstairs room – and in four upstairs. Special treasures abound here. Fans of detail smile at things like custom-built window shutters that, when open, appear as part of the windowsill's paneling. But their smirks grow upon further inspection, when they notice the shutters have, over the years, been painted so many times they can no longer fully close. The imperfection marks a beautiful flaw, whispering of the home's lived history.

An impressive drawing room – sectioned into thirds by white Greek-style pillars – also welcomes visitors to the home. A color scheme of white and light pink brightens the space. And although the room appears as if it was once three separate, smaller rooms and then renovated, housekeeper Sabra Mott will say otherwise. Since the building's original design by Warren S. Howland, she said, the basic interior design has remained constant.

Shifting tastes, an 1859 Victorian farm home presents a living dollhouse. With library bookshelves over its parlor doorway, the home is quite welcoming. A four-bay-window sits as a backdrop to a petit couch. Quaint doily curtains shimmer in the sun. A hidden wooden staircase lines the back dining room. A brick wall showcases white and blue china plates. With all this and playful door trims to boot, the house has more angelic charms than conceivable.

But it's the intricate, colorful wallpapers that really dazzle the eye, said homeowner Carol Kaminsky, the one responsible for many of the home's fun attributes.

"There's a lot of blue and a lot of red [in the color scheme of the wallpaper of her favorite room], and I guess it's the combo of the two that's my favorite," she explained.

The house tour was designed to profit the Amherst History Museum. Over 200 tickets sold for last year's tour, and homes centered closest to the Amherst town each received 195 visitors. The final revenue, nearly $4,000, substantially exceeded past profit margins, Russell said. The money annually benefits the museum's operations budget.

JENNIFER EASTWOOD/COLLEGIAN

The Amherst College President's House features a lavish design by architect Warren S. Howland.

The museum, set in a historic home of its own, can be found at the Strong House. Twenty-five volunteer tour guides aid the museum. The home itself, dated 1750, stands as one of the three oldest homes in Amherst. Tours detail the history of the house itself, Russell said, but also of the entire town's progression over time.

It only takes that extra moment to let the history of Amherst catch our attentions. But in that moment, it becomes clear. Stories of days past and aging remnants in the forms of homes and gardens seize our attentions, and we know. This town offers something special.

NASCAR and baseball games rock the system

By MATTHEW F. SACCO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you're tired of driving around in circles but crave the advantages of an official racing game, F1 2002 is the game for you. Electronic Arts takes all of the advantages of its NASCAR franchise and doubles the fun in a sleeker, faster and broader Formula One version.

NASCAR fans who are making the switch won't have to worry about losing many options. You can still play as almost all of the popular drivers on the F1 circuit. And the game features 17 of the top road and oval courses including Madrid and Indianapolis.

But unlike NASCAR which features stock cars that are built to run the same, F1 takes advantage of the differences and nuances of Indy cars, their drivers and their teams.

Not only are handling and maintenance different for each team, but the details all the way down to the decals on the car, the voice of the crew chief on the radio and the sound of the engine are unique. Obviously, EA had the very parsimonious race fans in mind while making this game.

People are very protective of their cars, and fans are even more protective of their sport. That's why EA gives you the whole racing experience. From grid girls and cheering crowds to 22-man pit crews and real weather effects, EA pulls no punches on realism.

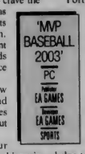
And for those gamers who crave the game beyond the game, EA has included its popular EA Sports Cards and rewards system. You'll be able to earn different types of team-specific rewards depending on your performance in each game mode.

These rewards will allow you to improve your car and unlock different game modes that weren't available right out of the package.

And you can prove your skills against some of the best drivers in the world in 11 new challenges.

But most gamers will simply enjoy taking a no-name driver from the back of the grid to the winner's circle in the extensive season mode.

The simple fact is that with F1, you won't get bored anytime soon; it'll drop your jaw to the floor and make you want to pull your hair out at the same time.



The graphics, motion-capture animation and visual renderings in this game are way beyond anything that's ever been released in a baseball game. The stadiums look absolutely authentic, the players move like real players and the motions rarely look repetitive. You'll likely find yourself walking into the room while the game is on and asking who's playing, not realizing that it's just a game.

MVP Baseball 2003

But like all video games, that beauty and perfection can be smack down but just a few minor glitches. Unfortunately, MVP Baseball is one of those games.

There is no dive button. There hasn't been a legitimate baseball game on the market since Baseball Stars came out for regular Nintendo that didn't feature a button to dive and leap in the field. But in MVP, the computer does it for you.

As the user, it is your responsibility to run toward the ball and if your close enough the computer will dive or leap for you. Now it's up to you to decided whether this lack will ruin your game experience or not.

But one has to admit that it's disturbing with all this technology, that the user has to feel like he or she has less control over the game.

It completely eliminates "what if?"

Part of the fun of baseball games is pulling off amazing plays while in complete control of the fielders. But now, the user will start questioning itself as to whether the ball could have been retrieved or not by a dive or a leap. Even though the computer did not see the play fit for an attempt.

Fortunately, MVP negates negative attention from the controls, with a multitude of wonderful options and game modes. Honestly, franchise mode is as close as most will ever get to being a baseball general manager.

During the mode, you will receive trade offers, make trades, resign players, put players on the disabled list and so on. The options are limitless. One of the more fun things that helps to make a 162 game season seem a little less daunting is the franchise goals.

Each team has specific goals set for its season and over a five to 10 year span. Obviously, those goals are harder for better teams like the Yankees, expected to annually win the World Series. (As opposed to the Tigers who would just like to finish with a winning record).

MVP does an amazing job of giving the baseball enthusiast everything he or she could possibly want. Problem is, the fun is in playing the game. And with the lack of a dive or leap button and some dry broadcasting, EA has taken some of the fun out of it.

Staind turns over new leaf

feelings expressed, and those tend to be the stronger tracks on the album. On "Fray," a dark, reflective number, the lyrics betray the older feelings: "Would you listen even if I told you? "Who the f— am I to say/ You're too busy with the lies they sold you/ ...While the edges slowly fray."

That song, and several standouts like it, including "Yesterday," "Reality" and the first single, "Price to Play," serve as strong reminders of where the band's roots lie: Anger and frustration.

Overall, it is clear that the band's sound is gradually evolving. With the anger toned down, the throaty roars and buzzing guitars of past tunes like "Suffocate," "Mudshovel," and "Can't Believe" are gone. Perhaps half of the album would fit in on "Break the Cycle," which lamented not only personal failings, but failings in the world at large. Little of it would fit in on their older albums, "Dysfunction" and "Tormented," with the roaring rage and isolation that coursed through them.

The end product on "14 Shades of Grey" is good, but it has some weaknesses too. Several of the later tracks on the album, such as "Tonight" and "Intro," fade together into monotony. At times, it sounds the band is still trying to find their way. Staind is no longer comfortable sitting in the niche it has as one of the preeminent pained rockers on the market. While it's good that the band is trying something new, there are hits and misses with those things they try.

"14 Shades of Grey" isn't as compelling as 2001's "Break the Cycle," but if it's taken for what it is, fans will still find it worth a listen. Staind may be changing with newfound personal happinesses, but they can still put together a pretty good rock album.

Comin' at you hot 'n fresh: Micrology plays guess the retired food slogan

The following advertising slogans have been used for over the past 50 years to describe some of the nation's most popular foods. Try to figure out what the slogan was actually used in advertising and which ones are phony. Who cares if you cheat?

A) Ready to Eat
B) Boring as Hell
C) Give it a Try
D) Drown Them in Sugar, They're Not So Bad

First introduced in 1941, Cheerios burst onto the scene with the slogan "Ready to Eat." It's about as colorful as the cereal itself, which should give you some idea of how basic the product actually is. Long ago, the breakfast item had Cheeri O'Leary, a bright-eyed, pig-tailed Irish lass, as a mascot. The cute little chick was kicked to the curb before the end of the decade, when the Lone Ranger became the long-standing spokesperson for Cheerios. When last contacted, Cheeri had checked herself into the Betty Ford clinic for detox. It's a sad, sad fate, which befalls these beloved mascots.

Jessica Pelletier

A) Fat thighs are underrated
B) A kid will eat the middle of an Oreo first and save the chocolate cookie outside for last
C) Oreo: making the world a better place, one day at a time
D) Oreo: we know where you live

The turn of the century brought about many interesting changes in America, perhaps none so profound as the introduction of a chocolate cookie sandwich named Oreo. Without the consultation of American youths, advertising reps quickly decided their slogan should focus on the creamy white frosting betwixt two dry wafers. Several tests have been done to refute this slogan (no I'm not kidding, look it up) and many researchers have discovered children prefer dunking the cookie into a tall glass of milk.

A) A little Coke-aine will do ya
B) Pepsi tastes like Poo
C) The Great National Temperence
D) Coca-Cola: Jesus would drink it.

No, the Messiah wouldn't drink the fizzy beverage, but millions of Americans would before the century would come to a close. In 1905, the soda was marketed as "the great national temperance." One thing was certain; burping contests would never be the same. As for the cocaine reference, the rumors are true. Though you'll never discover the fact on the Coke company website, the name Coca-Cola was derived from the two plants used to flavor the beverage: kola nuts and coca leaves. The precise amount of cocaine in the early beverages cannot be determined, however a strain of the drug was present in the first years of its marketing. But worry not, straight edgers, the soda has been drug free since 1929.

A) Choosy Mother's Choose Jif
B) Peanut Butter Makes It Better
C) Yummy Happy Good Spread
D) Sticks to your mouth like a good morning kiss

Ok, so this was an easy one. The slogan for the peanut spread first appeared in 1977. The actress hawking the sticky protein was none other than Bibi Osterwald, who played Jewish mother Sophie Steinberg in the television sitcom "Bridget loves Bernie." The slogan has undergone some change over the years and has more recently morphed into "Moms like you choose Jif." Wouldn't a marketing technique such as this one make those who simply prefer the taste of a peanut butter product being endorsed by a flying man-child feel badly? By the way Peter Pan, let's drop the act. You're pushing 100 right now; the tights and pointy shoes are getting old and scary.

A) Beef: Let's Eat a Critter
B) Beef: The Atkins Thinner
C) Beef: Tastes like Baby
D) Beef: It's What's For Dinner

Another easy one, for some reason babies and critter consumption didn't fly in the boardroom discussions. Believe me, no one's more surprised than I am. This slogan got the panties of every animal rights group in a twist. Connections with beef and cancer/mad cow disease/heart disease have left the cow carcass with a bad rap. In an effort to boost purchases, the USDA began running commercials with savory beef meals in the late 1990s. The bottom line to the slogan has left many wondering why the anonymous voice commands that they consume something that they have no particular interest in. But if T.V. says it's good for me, what could be wrong with that?

Gallery A^3 opens its doors to all

Abutting the Amherst Cinema Center is Gallery A^3- one of the six art museums in downtown Amherst that participate in the Amherst Gallery Walk. Once a month under the program, galleries display new art and open their doors to the public free of charge. The program takes place on the first Sunday of every month from 5 – 8 p.m.

In May, within the modest space inside Gallery A^3 three local abstract artists are displaying and selling their work. Keith Hollingworth, Cathy Oswan and Dorothy Osterman all utilize the media of oil on canvas, but they each have unique way of creating their art.

All of these artists will be on display through the end of May. The other galleries in the Amherst Gallery Walk program will open their doors again to the public with new work on June 5. Until then, Alfredo's Photographic Gallery, the Burnett Gallery, the Fiber Art Center, the Mead Art Museum, the R. Michelson Galleries and Gallery A^3 will show their May collections.

Support local artists in the Amherst community and expand your horizons by visiting the downtown galleries. Not only is it an opportunity to see some potentially stunning art work, but there is also free food on opening nights.

Are you ready for the revolution?

Ashley Sharpton thrown in the mix, it should translate into success with this guard-heavy team that will once again compete for an A-10 title.

And then there is Toot, because Toot knows.

Hockey coach Don "Toot" Cahoon is more aware of the revolution that will hit campus next fall than anyone, because for all intents and purposes, he started it.

It was his hockey team that went out and beat Boston University, and then Boston College, and finally, Maine. It was his team that made its first-ever appearance at the FleetCenter, and nearly knocked off New Hampshire, the eventual Hockey East Champion. It was his team that packed over 6,000 fans into the Mullins Center. And it will be his team that will sell it out next season.

Is UMass a hockey school now? No.

Will it be when the puck drops on Thursday, Oct. 9, and UConn hits Commonwealth Avenue? You bet.

You have never seen anything like what next year's hockey season will bring to Western Massachusetts. This is a squad that finished sixth in a top-heavy Hockey East, and advanced all the way to the conference semifinals. This is a squad that missed out on the NCAA tournament by an eyelash. This is a squad that lost just two players to graduation. This is a squad that is the first bona-fide Hockey East title contender in school history.

The "WAM" line is back, with NHL draftee Greg Mauldin and last year's freshman gems, Stephen Werner and Matt Anderson a year wiser. The core of solid young defensemen, led by Marvin Degon and Team MVP Thomas Pock, is also back. And a more experienced Gabe Winer returns to the net, with 6-foot-1 backup Mike Waidlich ready and able to fill in.

The Mass Attack has become a team capable of skating with, and beating, every team on its schedule, including the big four: BC, BU, New Hampshire and Maine.

So if you witnessed bedlam in the form of an overtime win over BU, or were part of the televised "white out" of Maine, you know that every hockey game you miss is one you'll wish you hadn't. And I haven't even mentioned Cahoon-a-ville.

But don't take my word for it.

Come see for yourself what I've been spouting off about for quite awhile now. Frequent McGuirk, and the Softball Complex, and Garber and Mullins. Wear maroon, paint your face and scream your head off. Chant "sieve," learn the words to the fight song, travel to road games, or just root like hell. But whatever you do, be a part of the revolution. You'll be lucky if you do, because if you ask those who have been around for a while, they'll tell you they've been waiting on it for a long time.

If you're a sports fan, I declare being a part of the revolution to be your heathen duty. If not, I simply encourage it greatly. Because when it is all said and done, the University of Massachusetts will be back on the map, and if you don't hear it now, or see it for yourself this fall, you'll regret not being a part of it.

And don't you ever say you didn't hear it from me.

Mike Marzelli is a Collegian Columnist.

On February 21, UMass students came out en masse for "White Out" night. The UMass hockey team responded by defeating Maine 4-2. One month later, the Minutemen swept the Black Bears out of the Hockey East playoffs.

The Daily Collegian Wants You

Over 100 people, three full-time professional staff members and over 100 undergraduate students, produce The Daily Collegian. Our offices are organized into the three departments of Business, Newsroom and Graphics, each with its own staff and managers. All departments work together under the direction of the Executive Board to produce a newspaper that reaches approximately 20,000 people daily. In addition, we print an annual sports magazine in the fall and an edition of The Scene, the Arts & Living magazine, in the spring. The Collegian is a non-profit undergraduate student organization. It operates on advertising revenues and receives no funding from the University or student fees.

Come fall 2003, we'll be looking for reporters to cover events – as well as those seeking to write in-depth feature stories for the sections of News, Arts & Living and Sports.

The top UMass sports stories of 2002-2003

Jekhabs Redlihs coughed up the puck trying to make a play in the neutral zone. Capraro gathered up the rookie's early Christmas present at the blue line and raced in alone on BU netminder Sean Fields, beating him five-hole to send the Minuteman bench into a frenzy.

"I saw he was the last defenseman back, and he was trying to make a move at the red line, so I just stepped it up," Capraro said.

Down 4-2 entering the final frame, the Maroon and White power play, clicking at 16 percent entering the game, netted two crucial lamp-lighters to send the game to overtime. Greg Mauldin cut the deficit to one on a four-on-three advantage with a rocket from the point that beat Fields top-shelf. Less than three minutes later, blueliner Marvin Degon's slapper off a feed from Mauldin gave UMass the equalizer.

"I was at the right place at the right time, and it was a beautiful pass by my roommate [Mauldin]," Degon said.

When Capraro and Degon were asked if their goals ranked as the best in their careers, both answered simply, "by far."

The Minutemen's Orange crush
By Matt Brady, Collegian Staff

It was his 35th goal of the season, his first on the afternoon of April 26. It was a blistering shot high past the opposing goaltender, but in form it was not far different from a number of goals he had scored in his first 12 games of the year.

But this goal was different. Jeff Zywicki's goal with 1:10 to go in overtime accomplished something that no other member of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team had done in 22 years: it toppled Syracuse.

"I had [Syracuse's Dan DiPietro] on me the whole game and he was on me in the overtime," said Zywicki, who led the team with 53 points at the time. "I just took him right, got a little step on him to the strong side and I just ripped it. It looked real nice, went top shelf, but it's a goal and a win and I'm just happy about that."

Seniors Kevin Leveille and Chris Fiore and sophomore Chris Doyle each scored hat tricks as the Massachusetts lacrosse team dumped the seventh-ranked Orangemen (7-5) in overtime, 14-13. It was the first time UMass (12-1, 3-1 Eastern College Athletic Conference) beat Syracuse since a 12-8 victory in 1981.

Co-captain Leveille, who lost to Cuse in each of his three varsity seasons, was overcome with emotion following the victory.

"I don't even know what it feels like right now," he said. "It hasn't really sunk in. I don't know. I don't know."

The Maroon and White trailed only once in the game and held a one-goal edge with just over a minute to play in regulation. But Fiore was called for a slashing penalty with 1:03 to go, giving Syracuse a one-minute extra man opportunity and a chance to tie.

The Orangemen were thwarted on their initial shot sequence by the Minuteman defense, but following a timeout with just over 20 seconds to play, they set up the play they wanted. Junior and leading scorer Mike Powell found a cutting Sean Lindsay, who dumped home a point-blank goal to tie the game with 5.3 seconds to play.

"We told the guys going into the overtime period not to change the way they play," Cannella said. "I thought we played under control pretty much the whole day, there were a couple instances where we played out of control and took some poor shots but I thought we were very controlled at the end. We played great defense and we didn't use a timeout. I thought we might use a timeout there but the guys were under control. I had a lot of confidence in their ability out there in that situation."

Syracuse won the opening draw of the extra session and kept pressure on the Maroon and White defense, which held strong behind the lead of sophomore netminder Bill Schell (16 saves) and gave the home squad a chance to come away with its fifth straight victory, and second in a row over an opponent ranked in the top 10.

"Once we got the ball up the field and the offense got the ball I had total confidence in them," Schell said.

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

Chris Doyle celebrates the UMass men's lacrosse team's 14-13 overtime win over Syracuse on April 26. It was the first time the Minutemen had beaten the Orangemen in 22 years.

Despite giving up a late lead, the Minutemen kept positive going into overtime.

"We talk about that all the time – poise and composure is one of our keys to victory every week," Cannella said. "We've done a good job with that over the last five weeks, I'm very proud of what these guys have been able to accomplish in that part of our game."

Despite being overjoyed at topping the Orangemen, Leveille was quick to remind everyone of the other significance of the win. It all but assured the Minutemen at least an at-large bid in the NCAA tournament, and a home game in the first round.

"It was another big game in a season of big games," he said. "We want to win them all and I think we have a lot of work in front of us. We're going to beat down and keep moving on. Maybe we'll have something bigger to celebrate."

Men's lax plays keep away with Georgetown
By Andrew Merritt, Collegian Staff

AMHERST – The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team does a drill in practice where one man has the ball, and the rest of the players use any means necessary to take it away.

It's called the survival drill, and fans were treated to a public exhibition of it on March 19, as the Minutemen held off each and every Georgetown rally, downing the Hoyas 11-8 at Garber Field.

The drill came in handy, as the Minutemen spent the last two minutes and 30 seconds holding the ball in their offensive zone. This was highlighted by the stubborn work of Neil Lundberg, who had defenders chasing and abusing him behind the net for nearly a minute.

Junior Jeff Zywicki scored four goals, and sophomore Bill Schell stopped 40 of Georgetown's 48 shots to hand the No. 5 Hoyas their first loss of the season, dropping them to 8-1 overall (3-1 Eastern College Athletic Conference).

The Minutemen, who jumped to No. 4 in the nation with the win, improve to 11-1 on the season (3-1 ECAC).

"The emotions are huge right now," said Zywicki, a box lacrosse veteran from Napean, Ontario. "We're feeling real good. We came out strong, we played strong the whole game, and then we finished them off."

Freshman Steven Byrnes, who looked a little over-exuberant in a failed scoring chance against Harvard last Wednesday, scored the game-winner 29 seconds into the fourth quarter.

"That was big," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "[Byrnes] against Harvard, he runs in there and he's tired, and he shoots, the goalie makes a save, and we yell at him. Today, he didn't want to shoot that, no one picked him up. Fortunately he took a better shot, he wasn't as tired, and he scored."

The Hoyas came close on a number of occasions, bringing it to 10-8 with 7:05 remaining when Mike Hammer found Phil Vincenti cutting to the net, and Vincenti quick-sticked the ball in. Georgetown would not score another goal.

Vincenti scored two goals in the game, as did Hammer and Neal Goldman.

It was Zywicki, however, who broke the Hoyas' back. With 2:49 remaining, he broke into the zone, got to within 10 feet of the goal, put on a quick fake, and popped it over the head of Georgetown goaltender Rich D'Andrea. The goal was the 11th for the Minutemen, and more than Schell and the UMass defense would need.

"Billy is awesome," Zywicki said of the sophomore netminder. "Any time I'm in the midfield, watching the defense, I'm just hoping they'll shoot the ball, because I know he'll come up with it. I have every confidence in him, our whole team does. We're so glad to have him on our team."

McKenzie makes it happen
By Matt Brady, Collegian Staff

AMHERST – Over its first six games, the Massachusetts football team showed the college football world that it possessed a solid and methodical running game, a consistent and sometimes fantastic passing attack, and a strong defense that was up to any challenge.

What it showed the world on Oct. 25 was that it also has a flair for the dramatic.

Anton McKenzie blocked a potential game-winning 38-yard field goal with 43 seconds remaining to hold off the fourth-ranked Villanova Wildcats (6-2, 3-2 Atlantic 10) in one of the best games in McGuirk Alumni Stadium's history.

"I knew they didn't expect me to go, so I told [UMass] Coach [Mark Whipple] to let me go. Lamarr [Monterrio] was outside of me, and kept the wing wide," McKenzie said. "[Jeremy] Cain kept the end inside, so I just had the gap in the middle and had to make the play.

"It was a great call at the right time. I hadn't gone the whole game on an extra point or field goal block."

The block was an enormous relief for the Minutemen (5-2, 3-1 A-10) after backup quarterback Tim Day shocked everyone by throwing an interception on second-and-10 with less than two minutes to go, giving the Wildcats the ball at the 28 yard line.

"[Anton] saved me big time," Day said. "I made a mistake and these guys picked me up. All the older guys told me they would pick me up and were behind me. I'm not going to make any excuses, it was a stupid decision, and I apologize for giving anybody a heart attack."

The interception shocked even Coach Whipple, who called an entirely different play.

"At the end I called the play and I said, 'You're running the ball,' and he nodded his head at me," Whipple said. "When he let go of the ball, that's the most shocked I've ever been in my career of coaching."

On the previous drive, Villanova moved the ball methodically downfield, throwing mostly short passes and running the ball to combat the southerly wind which was gusting throughout the game upwards of 30 m.p.h. After the Minuteman defense forced the Wildcats into fourth-and-goal from the 13 yard line, Nova quarterback Brett Gordon threw a fade to top receiver Brian White, who made a one-handed circus catch and stayed in bounds to score the touchdown and trim the deficit to 17-16.

"That's a Sportscenter highlight and that's A-10 football," Whipple said. "He made a great play."

But the snap for the extra point was low, the hold was not perfect, and Adam James' extra point attempt glanced off the left upright to preserve the UMass lead.

The win, which came in front of more than 11,000 fans, was obviously another step for the Minutemen, who have beaten top five teams in each of the past two weeks and now are in a position to control their own destiny for the A-10 title.

"The great thing was the effort and the atmosphere," Whipple said. "I think the people in the stands really helped us. Our kids just got better as the game went on. Outside the playoffs, this is as good as we've had. With the home win and the atmosphere this was as good as any.

"These kind of wins are what you can build a year on and build a program on," he continued. "We've got a long way to go, but this was a solid step, as solid a step as we've taken all year."

Lasme leaves UMass
By Jim Pignatiello, Collegian Staff

AMHERST – The 2002-03 Massachusetts men's basketball season was a failure on most counts. The team finished 11-18, its worst since a 10-18 record in 1988-89, was bounced from the first round of the conference playoffs for the first time since the 1990-91 season and saw attendance drop to scary-low numbers.

But UMass coach Steve Lappas and Athletic Director Ian McCaw were able to consistently point to the bright future of the team, as evidenced by strong first season's from Lappas' first recruiting class: freshmen Mike Lasme, Gabe Lee and Jeff Viggiano.

But Lasme asked for his release on March 31 and will transfer to another school at the end of the spring semester.

Lasme played in 27 games this season and became the starting shooting guard in December. Despite playing through a broken wrist and elbow and ankle injuries, the Abidjian, Ivory Coast native managed 7.5 points, 3.1 rebounds and 2.6 assists per game. His 27.5 minutes per game were second on the team, but therein lay the problem.

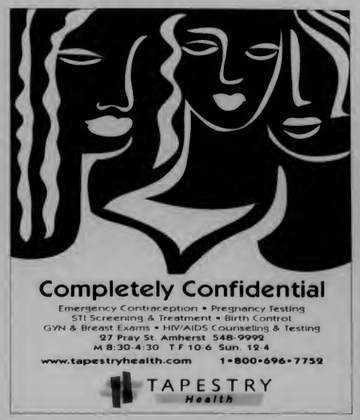
Sophomore Anthony Anderson led the team with 36.1 minutes per game at point guard, Lasme's natural position and the one he believes is vital to his chances of making the National Basketball Association (NBA).

"Mike believes that in order to play in the NBA he needs to play point guard on a full-time basis," Lappas said. "I told him that he could easily compete for that position in our program.

"He chose not to compete for it, so he will move on," Lappas added. "I expect he will try to find a situation that better fits his vision of what is important."

Anderson, who won last year's A-10 Rookie of the Year Award, finished second on this year's team with 11.8 points per game. He also led the team with 3.5 assists.

Lasme's departure will open up significant playing time in the backcourt next season.



Artie Bowers, a 6-foot-4 high school senior from New Jersey, has signed a letter of intent with UMass. Ranked the 32nd best high school senior in the nation by ESPN, Bowers is currently the highest-ranked recruit signed by an A-10 school.

Also competing for time will be senior Marcus Cox, who transferred from Connecticut and debuted with the Minutemen this season after sitting out the 2001-02 year. Cox averaged 4.8 points and 1.9 assists last year, but lost the starting job to Lasme.

Lappas signed high school shooting guard Maurice Maxwell of Philadelphia and junior college transfer Chris Chadwick of Cecil Community College in mid-May to solidify his backcourt for next season.

The revolution in UM sports

Mike Marzelli

Do you hear that?

Turn your good ear toward campus and listen well.

Still can't hear it? Well, keep trying, because it's coming ... and soon. This fall, to be exact, and you need to be ready for it. Because the revolution is ready for you.

Still no luck? Maybe you were abroad this past year or simply never left your room. Maybe you were busy with work or other things or just didn't get out much. Or maybe you're a freshman-to-be and have no idea what you're walking into.

No matter what you've been doing or plan to do, you need to hear it, because it will be an integral part of your UMass experience in the years to come whether you want it to be or not.

Maybe you forgot about Anton McKenzie blocking a Villanova field goal to preserve a 17-16 win one cold October Saturday afternoon.

Maybe you didn't hear about Chris Capraro slipping the puck through Sean Fields' legs in overtime to beat BU in the greatest hockey game ever played in the Pioneer Valley.

Maybe, when Jeff Viggiano's breakout night was good enough to outlast No. 24 North Carolina State, you weren't paying attention.

Or when Jeff Zywicki's golden goal beat Syracuse and hundreds of soaking wet students rushed the field, you just weren't there.

Now's the time to make amends.

Remember the Minutemen you used to love? Marcus Camby's "Refuse to Lose" Final Four team, or Marcel Shipp's National Championship squad? Well, they've been gone for years, replaced by scaled-down versions of themselves that, barring few exceptions (read: coaches Cahoon, Sortino and Cannella), have given you little to get excited about.

But that sound you hear is the revolution, and UMass athletics as you remember it is back.

Football coach Mark Whipple knows it. His team got off to a 7-2 start. If it wasn't for two freak injuries to his golden-armed quarterback, Jeff Krohn, UMass would have won the Atlantic 10. An annual struggler for fan support, the football boys watched the home stands fill more and more each week, with capacity crowds for games with Villanova and Delaware. Only torrential rain and snow kept fans away from barnburners against Maine and Hofstra.

Offensive juggernaut and Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year R.J. Cobbs is back. And with roughly 30,162,537 plays designed to get him the ball, the gridiron crew has a certain game in Chattanooga, Tenn. in its sights. With all the talk of moving the ball – Krohn, Raunny Rosario, Jason Pechler and Jimmy Howard are back too – it'll also be the best defense you've ever seen in these parts that will make this group of Minutemen worth your time, and fill the purple and yellow lots with grills, coolers and football fans come fall.

Basketball coach Steve Lappas knows, too. Yes, Lappas, the guy who brought you two consecutively losing seasons. Two years when you'd only go watch his teams play if he bought you dinner and let you take the floor in the fourth quarter. He knows because for him, more than anyone else, the revolution needs to be here. His team went 11-18 last year – the worst mark for a Maroon and White men's hoops squad since 1989 – but it graduated only one-and-a-half players, the one being leading scorer and Team MVP Jackie Rogers, the half being Micah Brand.

Yes, former Top 100 recruit Michael Lasme is supposedly gone, although rumors have him in limbo as to whether he is truly going to transfer or not, and that hurts. But the recruiting class the former Villanova bench boss has brought in is a must-see. This year's class is headlined by another Top 100 recruit in Delaware native Artic Bowers, but the stars on the list of newcomers may be a pair of 6-foot-9 blue-chippers who are already here.

Stephen Briggs, who was kicked off the team and then reinstated last winter, and Rashaun Freeman, who was an academic non-qualifier, will both will begin their careers in Amherst this year as redshirt freshman, and an order of "In big men we trust" T-shirts could soon be on the way. If either of these two is as good as advertised, you could be looking at an NIT birth this season, with a possible return to national prominence on the horizon.

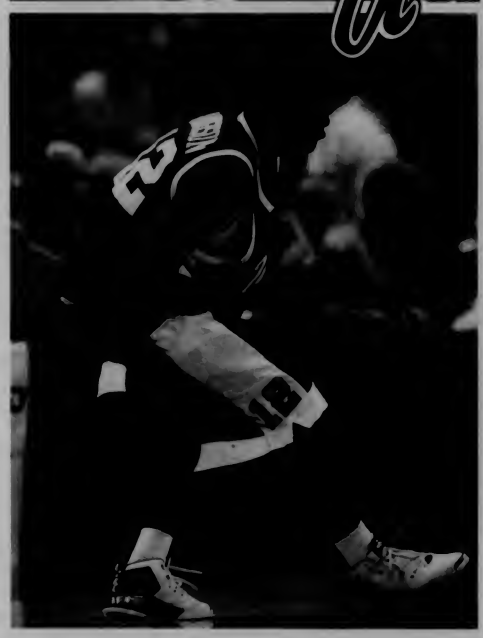
Softball coach Elaine Sortino already knew it. Her squad doesn't need a revolution, but it will be happy to come along for the ride. The Minutewomen have won nine consecutive Atlantic 10 titles, and with the duo of Kelli Arnold and Jenna Busa back on the mound for another spring campaign, number 10 isn't just a possibility, it's a probability.

Lacrosse coach Greg Cannella already knew it, too. His Minutemen had their revolution years back, and are now just hitting their stride as one of the nation's premier lacrosse programs. They'll still be a part of it though, as long as his teams continue to give you a reason to jump on them after wins like the one over Syracuse, or turn on the TV on a Saturday afternoon in May to watch them battle the likes of Maryland on NESN.

They'll certainly miss all-world midfielder Kevin Leveille and his offensive firepower, as well as the beast that is Tom Fallon annihilating unsuspecting opponents. But don't you expect them to miss someone every year? Did this year's team truly miss Matt McFarland, for instance?

Next year's squad should be no different, with the likes of Jeff Zywicki and Sean Morris taking over the reins of Cannella's high-powered attack, and Bill Schell a year older and wiser in between the pipes. If it weren't for a season-ending loss to Rutgers this year, I'd be telling you to watch out for a fourth consecutive Eastern College Athletic Conference title next spring. Instead, be ready for another run at a National Championship.

Women's hoop coach Marnie Dacko knows, as well. The former Cornell coach will enter her second campaign patrolling the Minutewoman bench, and while she will have a tough time overcoming the loss of WNBA-bound center Jennifer Butler, the future remains bright as long as point guard Katie Nelson is running the show.



Dacko has now had a full year to implement her improvise-first system, and with UNC-Ashville transfer

A year to remember

2002-03 was a memorable year for sports at the University of Massachusetts.

In the fall, UMass football provided thrills on the good days, and chills when things ended abruptly on a snowy November afternoon.

The big story in the winter came from an unexpected place: The ice. The UMass hockey team rolled into the Hockey East playoffs and swept the vaunted Maine team at Alfond Arena – one of the tougher places to play in the conference.

The spring became a competition between softball and men's lacrosse to find out which UMass spring team would be the best. Softball kept on rolling, making it impossible for an opponent to win on the Minutewomen's home turf.

Men's lacrosse, meanwhile, had one of its best years in recent memory, defeating powerhouses Georgetown and Syracuse, and advancing into the NCAA tournament.

The Collegian Sports Department has covered it all – from players coming and going to a mascot staying right where it belongs. Now we bring you our top stories of 2002-03:

Mass Attack sweeps Maine at Orono
By Andy Vogt, Collegian Staff

ORONO, Maine – Many predicted a sweep in the Massachusetts hockey team's playoff series, but few foresaw which team would be holding the broom.

The sixth-seeded Minutemen made history for the second consecutive evening, knocking off third-seeded and national No. 4-ranked Maine 4-2 to sweep the Hockey East quarterfinal series. With the early March sweep, UMass earned its first-ever trip to the FleetCenter for the conference semifinals.

"This is what we're aspiring to be, a program that is well thought of, and to hang in the circles of the great programs in this country," a beaming UMass coach Don Cahoon said after the historic win. "We've got a long ways to go, but this is a pretty darn good place to start off."

Mike Warner's power-play goal with 8:15 remaining in the game gave UMass an insurance tally and sealed the fate of the Black Bears, who had been buzzing up to that point. Warner gobbled up Thomas Pock's blast and roofed a shot just under the crossbar for the two-goal lead.

"It was definitely my biggest goal since I've been at UMass. We haven't had a lot of games where we've been in that situation, so it was awesome to get that," Warner said.

The Minutemen jumped out to an early 3-0 lead after the first period to quiet the raucous Alfond Arena crowd and chase Maine netminder Jimmy Howard for the second straight evening. Pock got the Maroon and White on the scoreboard three minutes into the game off a failed Black Bear clearing attempt. The Klagenfurt, Austria, native chased after the loose puck and fired it back at the net. The puck caromed off a Maine defenseman's skate and past Howard for the 1-0 UMass lead.

Chris Capraro doubled the advantage eight minutes later, as Warner crossed the puck to Capraro, and the freshman one-timed the feed into the bottom left corner. Stephen Werner capped off the first frame when he tipped home Pock's blast from the blueline to send Howard to the showers after only 16 minutes of action.

"Credit has to go to UMass for being opportunistic and popping those pucks in the net," Maine coach Tim Whitehead added. "They're going to be a dangerous team down the stretch."

Maine would soon jump back into the game, however, as Todd Jackson slipped Robert Liscak's rebound past fallen UMass goaltender Gabe Winer to put the 4,100 in attendance at Alfond on their feet. The goal electrified the Black Bear bench, as the final six minutes of the second period were played almost entirely in the UMass end.

Maine was finally able to crack Winer again early in the third period, as Derek Damon stuffed home a loose puck to cut the deficit to 3-2. But the Minutemen held off the Black Bears the rest of the way, sending Maine to its first Hockey East quarterfinal defeat since 1994.

"It can't happen to a better group of guys, and the fact that we came here and swept Maine in the first two games is astronomical," Turner said.

A surprise win at the Mullins
By Andy Vogt, Collegian Staff

AMHERST – Chris Capraro's breakaway goal with 41 seconds left in overtime capped a furious UMass rally and gave the Minutemen a 5-4 victory on Dec. 6 over Boston University in front of a raucous Mullins Center crowd.

Down 4-1 six minutes into the second period, the Maroon and White scored three unanswered goals, including two power play tallies in the third period, to set up Capraro's heroic efforts.

And despite dropping the back end of the home-and-home series to the Terriers in Boston the next evening, the program undoubtedly made a statement with the victory. The win marked only the second time UMass (9-6-0, 4-5-0 HE) had defeated BU (8-6-2, 5-4-0 HE) in 29 opportunities.

"It's a real exciting win, and it's the reason a lot of people love college hockey," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It's real important for us to have this success tonight, but it's equally important to stay grounded."

Meanwhile, BU leader Jack Parker was dismayed at his team's collapse in the latter stages of the contest, which had been the Terriers' fifth loss in their last seven outings.

"We got beaten by a much better team tonight," Parker said. "They dominated, I told Don after the game it would have been a shame if they didn't win."

The game-winner came after BU freshman defenseman
